in 1813 as a war tax, to continue during the war, and for one year after its termination. At the end of the war it was continued, with other taxes, to pay the debt of the war. Thus all claim to the continuance of the tax, as a protection due to the manufacturers of salt, entirely vanishes, and leaves that argument without a particle of foundation to rest upon.

It is now above eight years (continued Mr. B.) since I began this war upon the salt tax. When I first began it, the venerable and venerated Mr. MAÇON was a member of this body. From his detestation of this tax I learnt to abhor it; and to his sagacious mind, to his enlightened experience, and to his philosophical observation, I am indebted for many of the arguments which I have used against it. I was, comparatively, young and sanguine; he aged and considerate. I expected my speeches to put down the tax; he counted but little on the effect of speeches against interest and numbers. On one occasion, when I had signally failed of my expected results, getting no votes in return for many good arguments, he said to me, in the tone of despair, that we should never succeed: New York and her forty votes was against us. This indeed was discouraging; it brought him to despair, and me to doubt. But despair now vanishes; hope breaks in; light appears in the very quarter where lately the black cloud hung. New York is for us! and this very movement—this bill itself for the instant, and total abolition of the impious tax—is a New York movement. The Senator from that State, chairman of the Committee of Finance, (Mr. Wright,) brings in the bill. He supports it with the distinguished ability, and the disinterested zeal, which illustrate his character. His exposition, at the presentation of his bill, was the guaranty of its success; and I sent off that exposition, as a tribute worthy to be offered, to him who was the oldest and noblest opponent of unjust taxation, and the wisest and steadiest friend of the rights of the people. He sent me back, in reply, these characteristic words: that the repeal of this tax would be a proof that righteousness had not yet left the earth. To the good work, then, let us all stand. Cheerily, let us stand to it. Let us suppress this odious tax. President Jackson, in his last annual message, recommends the task: New York leads off: MAÇON bestows his benediction: the productive classes await the result! And in this first movement,—this auspicious commencement,—we all see the earnest of the future, and the wisdom of that policy which has taken, for our next President, the friend and supporter of the present one; and taken him from a State whose lead is as powerful and efficacious as it is patriotic and judicious.

—The foregoing speech on the salt duty, from the suddenness of the occasion, and the incidental manner in which it was delivered, is more deficient than the author of it could wish in the facts and evidences which are necessary to sustain his positions, and which are so necessary to convince the understandings of others. Several years ago Mr. BENTON had taken up the subject of this duty, and made three speeches, at different times upon it, all bottomed upon facts and evidence; and being sensible that his speech of the 21st inst. was deficient in his favorite logic—the logic of facts and figures—he has had recourse to one of his former ones, and now republishes it to supply the defects in the one just delivered. This former speech was delivered seven years ago, to wit: January 8th, 1830; and he hopes will present something valuable to that most meritorious class of the community—the agricultural—whose position in the body politic is that of, front rank for service—rear rank for reward! and which, receiving but little of the honors, emoluments, patronage, and favor of the Government, should certainly be exempted, in the pursuit of their rural occupations, from the evils and mis-chiefs of unwise, injurious, and unnecessary legislation.

Mr. BENTON rose to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the duty on Alum Salt. He said that this kind of salt was not manufactured in the United States; that it was indispensable in curing provisions, and had to be bought at whatever price it might cost. He said that the uses of salt, and the injury done to the community by taxing it, had commanded the attention of the British Parliament, and occasioned a committee to be appointed in the year 1818, whose labors were a monument to their honor, and a title to the gratitude of their country. They had taken the examinations in writing of more than seventy witnesses, comprehending men of the first character in every walk of life, of whom he would mention Lord Kenyon, Sir Thomas Bernard, Sir John Sinclair, Arthur Young, and Sir John Stanley, whose testimony, with the reports of the committee, extended to four hundred folio pages. He would read some parts of their testimony, and believed that the Senate would perform a great service to the American people if they would direct a committee to make an abstract of the whole, and publish some thousand copies for distribution among the people.

Mr. B. then began to read a part of the extracts which he had made, when he was interrupted by Mr. Foor, of Connecticut, who made several points of order, one of which was, that Mr. B's motion was not seconded. The VICE PRESIDENT said that it was not usual to have motions seconded in the Senate; that the rule was a formality which had not been attended to in practice; but, if any Senator made it a point, the rule must be enforced. Mr. B. then appealed to the Senators from the south of Mason and Dixon's line to furnish him a second. Several rose, and observing among them Mr. WOODBURY of New Hampshire, he gave him the preference, because he was from the north of Mason and Dixon's line, and because he had been the first to open the campaign against the salt tax several years ago. He said that the report and speeches of the Senator from New Hampshire against the salt tax would remain as monuments to his honor when his own poor exertions were forgotten; and he took pride and pleasure in paying this tribute to him, and making it more fully known in the west, that he was only the follower of that distinguished and patriotic Senator, so justly dear to the Whig Republicans of all quarters of the Union, in waging a war of determined hostility against the salt tax.

The other objections of Mr. Foor being disposed of, Mr. B. went on to read, or state, the extracts to which he referred.

1. From Sir John Sinclair's Evidence.—Extract.

"It was once at the farm of a great farmer in the Netherlands, a Mr. Messelman, at Chenois, near Wavre, where I was surprised to see an immense heap of Cheshire Rock Salt, which he said he found of the greatest use for his stock. He said, first, that by allowing his sheep to lick it, the rot was effectually prevented; secondly, that his cattle, to whom he gave lumps of it to lick, were thereby protected from infectious disorders; and the cows being thus rendered more healthy, and being induced to take a greater quantity of liquid, gave more milk. And I saw lumps of this salt, to which the cows had access, in the place they were kept. He also said, that a small quantity pounded was found very beneficial to the horses when new oats were given them, if the oats were at all moist." * * * "He gave them great lumps, that they (the cattle) might lick when they chose." * * * "One of the most important uses of salt, as connected with agriculture, is, that it preserves seed, when sown, from the attacks of the grub." * * * "In a communication to me from Sweden, by Baron Schultz, he says, the salt destroys the different sort of worms found in the bodies of sheep, but in particular the liver worm."

2. Arthur Young's Testimony.—Extract.

"Did you ever try salt in the feeding of your cattle?"

Yes; but chiefly with sheep; and I found the sheep astonishingly fond of it.

Do you think that it would be beneficial in preventing the rot in sheep?

I found it so in the years when my neighbors' sheep were generally affected with the rot: my sheep escaped, and my land was quite as wet as my neighbors'.

Do you think, considering the advantages in health, fattening, and the power of using inferior food in the feeding of cattle and stock in general, that the free use of salt would be an advantage equivalent to seven shillings a head to the farmer?

I should think it would be worth a great deal more. I think it is invaluable. In short, let my answer be what it would, it would be under the mark."

Dr. Young then gave his opinion that the stock in England would be increased in value above three millions sterling, nearly fifteen millions of dollars, by the free use of salt. He estimated the stock in England to be:

Horses,	-	-	1,500,000 head.
Cattle,	-	-	4,500,000 do.
Sheep,	-	-	30,000,000 do.

3. Testimony of William Glover, superintendent of the cattle of the Hon. Mr. Curwen, M. P.—Extract.

"This deponent began to give salt to the cattle under his care the 19th November, 1817, and from that time till now the cattle have had salt as follows: 40 milch cows and breeding heifers, each four ounces per day; 30 oxen, four ounces each per day; 27 young cattle, each two ounces per day; 26 calves, one ounce each per day; 48 horses, each four ounces per day; 444 sheep, two ounces each per week. The advantage of salt for sheep appears to this deponent to be great; as he says none of the stock have died in the sickness since they commenced giving salt; and they have had none in the rot; in other years they lost some of the ewes and wethers in the sickness. And this deponent says that he has now kept the cattle at Schoose farm ten years, and they were never so long without sickness."

4. The affidavit of thirty-two Farmers.

"We, the undersigned, being farmers, and the owners of land in the neighborhood of Workington, do hereby certify, that we are acquainted with and witnesses to the fact of Mr. Curwen giving salt to his cattle and horses, with their food, at the Schoose farm and at Workington; and that we are desirous of using the same for our live stock, if we could obtain it without difficulty, and at a cheap rate."

5. Testimony of Mr. Curwen, M. P.—Extract.

In regard to cattle, I have under-estimated the quantity, because, if salt could be had at a moderate price, there is no animal I would give less than six stone (14 lbs. to the stone) each per annum." * * * "I believe if salt were in general use for cattle it would amount to 340,000 tons—about 14,000,000 of bushels— * * * "The importance of the free use of salt to AGRICULTURE can scarcely be estimated too highly. Salt contributes not only to the health of cattle and sheep, but accelerates and promotes the quantity of milk given by milch cows. [In another place Mr. C. says that the use of salt prevents the ill taste which the feeding on certain weeds and vegetables imparts to the milk.] It prevents the rot in sheep, and the effect of hoving, when stock are fed on turnips or clover. * * * Salt renders damaged hay palatable and nutritious; and, if applied in difficult seasons, prevents an undue fermentation and heat in the stack. Chaff and straw would be rendered available to a much greater extent than at present by the application of salt. It would be a most valuable ingredient in the preparation of warm food for stall-fed cattle in the improved system of soiling; and, from my experience of its salutary effects, I should consider the free use of it, as a condiment, the greatest boon the Government could bestow on the husbandman." * * * "I consider the advantage from salt, in feeding my stock, on a farm of eight hundred acres, worth about one thousand pounds per annum, would exceed three hundred pounds per annum!" (that is, add a third to the annual value of the farm.)

"The probable consumption of salt for sheep and cattle may be taken as follows, to wit:

Per annum.	14 lbs. the stone.	Stones.
30,000,000 sheep	2 stone each	60,000,000
1,421,000 cows	6 do	8,526,000
2,000,000 young cattle	4 do	8,000,000
1,100,000 fattening beasts	6 do	6,600,000
1,200,000 draught cattle	4 do	4,800,000
300,000 colts and saddle horses	3 do	900,000
1,200,000 horses	not estimated
		88,926,000

N. B. 14 pounds 1 stone; 4 stone 1 bushel; 4 bushels 1 cwt.
 The English bushel of salt is 56 lbs.

6. Lord Kenyon's evidence before the committee.—
 Extract.

"By the information which I have been able to collect, I am induced to consider salt, when sparingly applied, as an admirable manure, especially for fallows, and arable land; and, when mixed up with soil out of gutters, or refuse dirt or ashes, to be valuable also on grass lands. My own experience convinces me that it is very powerful in destroying vegetation if laid on too thick, having put a large quantity of refuse salt on about one-fourth of an acre of land, which, after two years, still remains quite bare. A land surveyor of high character in my neighborhood considers that the use of salt would be likely to be very valuable in destroying the slug, wire worm, snail, &c. which often destroy whole crops. He also remembers that salt was used largely in the neighborhood of the Higher and Lower Wiches in Cheshire, before the duties were raised to their present height. With respect to its value for cattle, horses, and sheep, I am informed that it is very highly thought of both as nutriment and as used medicinally, internally and externally. Its value also is extremely well known for rendering bad and ill-gotten hay more nourishing and more palatable to cattle than even good hay."

EXTRACT.

7. Evidence of Mr. Kingston.—"In reply to your queries, as an agriculturist, I have no hesitation in saying that salt, if freed from duty, would become one of the most useful and general articles of manure that ever was thought of, if properly composed, by mixing it with mud of any kind—the cleanings of ditches and ponds, the surface of coarse ground thrown into heaps to rot, blubber, &c. I am also persuaded that if it could be afforded to be sprinkled on the layers of hay, when making into the rick, in catching weather, it would prevent its heating and getting mouldy. I had once some small cattle tied up to fatten, which did not thrive, owing, as the bailiff said, to the badness of the hay, of which they wasted more than they ate; but by sprinkling it with water in which some salt had been dissolved, they returned to eat it greedily. I am free to say, a proper quantity of salt would prevent cattle from being hoven by an excess of green food."

8. Mr. Thomas Bourne's examination.—"The committee understand you are a merchant, residing at Liverpool?

I am.

Can you speak as to the probable effect of the repeal of the salt duties on your trade?

It would be a good thing, in my opinion, for the country at large, and also the manufactures.

Have you any knowledge of its being used in food for animals?

Yes, to horses in particular.

Has it a good effect?

Yes.

Then do you not suppose, if the restrictions were taken off, it would come into more general use among the farmers, for stocks of all kinds?

It would in that instance; we used to have five horses in our rock salt mine, and those horses always appeared in good condition, though very much worked.

Were they liable to less disorders than those out of the mine?

Yes; much less.

Do you happen to know whether they were in the practice at that time of receiving salt with their food?

Yes; to my knowledge they were.

In what quantity?

About a handful to a quartern of oats."

EXTRACT.

9. Evidence of Mr. W. Horne.—"There are very few farmers who are not aware of the importance of salt in preserving hay, and restoring it when damaged; many of those whom I have conversed with on the subject, have used it for these purposes, and it would generally be resorted to, to the extent of ten or fifteen pounds to the ton of hay, if the duties on salt were repealed. Lord Somerville has furnished most satisfactory information on this subject; and I know from respectable authority, that it is a common practice in the United States of America to sprinkle salt upon hay when forming it into ricks. We also learn from Lord Somerville, that Mr. Darke, of Breedon, one of the most celebrated graziers in the kingdom, mixed salt with his flooded mouldy hay, and that his Hereford oxen did better on it than others on the best hay he had; and he was convinced the hay had all its good effects from the salt." * * *

"I have learnt from Mr. Sutton, of Eaton, in Cheshire, that he would give thirty tons (120 bushels of 56 lbs. each,) of salt a year to his cattle, being fifty cows, if the duty were repealed." * * *
 "In many parts of the United States of America, salt is generally given to cattle." * * *
 "The excellent condition of the horses in the rock pits of Cheshire, may be adduced in favor of its benefit in fattening cattle and keeping them in health." Many counted that they can attribute the longevity of their horses to the good effects of salt. Mr. Hadfield, of Liverpool, furnishes an instance in his horse, thirty years old; he constantly gave it rock salt to lick, placing it in his manger. Mr. Young has furnished us, in the annals of agriculture, with a most interesting and satisfactory statement (obtained from the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris,) on the effect of salt in fattening cattle. From this report it appears, that to the UNLIMITED USE OF SALT was to be ascribed the circumstance of FOUR TIMES the number of sheep having been reared on a STERILE COMMON, than would otherwise have subsisted on it; and that the wool of these flocks is not only the finest in the whole country, but bears the highest price of any in France.

The fineness of the wool of the Spanish sheep is also attributed, in a great measure, to the free use of salt. It is not, therefore, I presume, an extraordinary position to say, that by a proper use of common salt, the same quantity of forage might, on many occasions, be made to go twice as far as it could have done, in feeding animals, had the salt been withheld from them!"

EXTRACTS.

10. Mr. Charles G. Colhill, examined—"What is your profession?

Ans.—A bacon and provision merchant, residing in Judd-street, Brunswick square.

What is the nature and amount of your business, and how far has it been affected by the salt duties?

Ans.—About fifty years ago my father established a manufactory in Vine-street, and expended £10,000 in adapting the premises for the curing of bacon and the salting of pork. Our annual returns were about £50,000: is now diminished to less than £1,000 annually, in consequence, as I apprehend, of the very high duties on salt, as our trade has diminished progressively as those duties have increased.

Do you not consider that the breed of hogs has also diminished, in consequence of this increase of duty on salt?

Ans.—Very materially; and, as a farther proof of what I state, we had a very extensive trade of £200,000 a year in hogs; now not £10,000.

What effect, in your opinion, would a great reduction of the salt duties produce in your business?

Ans.—I conceive it would restore our trade; we should then be able to supply the West India markets, and other colonies, with salted pork, cheaper and better than any other country.

What is the quantity of salt used upon 100 weight of pork to make bacon?

Ans.—In a manufactory of bacon about 12 pounds; to cure a small quantity about 17 or 18."

11. Testimony of Sir Thomas Bernard—Extract.

"I ventured to suggest that a tax on salt was fundamentally wrong in principle, because it presses most on the class least able to bear the weight—because of its immoral tendency—and because it deprives the nation of benefits, beyond measure greater than the whole produce of the impost.

The salt duties are about a million and a half sterling per annum, (about seven millions of dollars.) The poor use most salt in proportion to their wealth; a cottager in the country ten to one in proportion to a nobleman in town. But the benefits of which the nation is deprived by the salt duties, are not easily appreciated, or even numbered. In agriculture and rural economy alone, the loss in feeding cattle, sheep, and hogs—in restoring damaged provender—in manure, and in the effect on wages, may, without extravagance, be supposed to exceed the whole value of the tax. Equal, perhaps, would be the gain to our manufacturers of woollen, linen, glass, earthenware, soap, &c. &c. by the unrestrained use of muriate and carbonate of soda and muriatic acid, of which our salt mines and ocean afford supplies absolutely inexhaustible."

Mr. B. having read, or stated, these extracts to show the use of salt in agriculture, said there were many other witnesses examined, to prove that alum salt, which the English usually called bay salt, because it was made by solar evaporation, out of sea water in the bay of Biscay, and other bays, was indispensable to the curing of provisions, for long keeping, or for exportation; other articles connected with agriculture, as cheese, butter, bacon, pickled beef and pickled pork; and that the British Government permitted alum salt, under the name of bay salt, to be imported both into England and Ireland, duty free, for these purposes, even when the domestic manufacture of common salt in England far exceeded the home demand, and furnished millions of bushels for exportation. He also stated that the Committee of the House of Commons had examined the first physicians of Great Britain, to prove the effect of a deficiency of salt in the provisions of the poor on their health, and that these physicians uniformly testified that many diseases of the poor, and especially in children, were the effect of using vegetables not sufficiently salted, and fish and meat not sufficiently cured. He also stated that the committee had extended their examination to the use of salt in various manufactures, and had established, by proof, that a variety of useful manufactures required the abolition of the salt duty. On this point, he read extracts from the examination of Samuel Parkes, Esq. an eminent chemist of London, as follows:

12. Examination of Samuel Parkes—Extract.

"What is your profession?"

"I am proprietor of the chemical works in Goswell street, London, and of other chemical works in Maiden lane, Islington."

"Can you acquaint the committee what are the MANUFACTURES most affected by the salt laws?"

"The manufactures of mineral alkali, crystalized soda, muriatic acid, hard soap, distinguished from soft soap, Glauber salt, Epsom salt, magnesia, and sal-ammoniac, are all materially affected by the duty on salt; but as common salt, or one or other of the component parts of common salt, is made use of in the composition of a great variety of articles that are employed in our manufactures, it is difficult to answer that question with precision. * * *
 "Respecting soap, I have only to observe, that common salt is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of hard soap; for, however plentifully potash may be produced, large quantities of common salt must be employed with it, or the soap will be only temporary hard; it will have no lasting consistence. * * *
 "Salt is employed largely in the preparation and manufacture of a great number of other articles that might be enumerated; and in a short time I have no doubt they would all be benefitted by the reduction of the duty on salt."

"How does the price of salt affect the soap boilers?"

"As it affects all other trades in which salt is employed."

"State the way in which it affects them."

"The cheaper it is, the cheaper they will have it, if they buy it."

"Do you know any other (manufacturing) purposes for salt?"

"Yes; it is used in very large quantities by dyers, when it can be had cheap; and in a great variety of other ways."

"With respect to the salting of hides, I learn from further inquiry, that the butcher usually applies five pounds of salt to every ox or cow hide which he has occasion to lay by, or to send to the tanner at a distance.

"Crystallized soda (made of salt) is much used in washing. Four hundred tons are annually made at the Long Benton works only."

"You have stated that, during the last six or seven years, it has increased from one to four hundred tons?"

"Yes."

"This at the Long Benton works only?"

"Yes."

"Which is made from salt duty free?"

"Yes. They have an exclusive privilege."

When Mr. B. had finished reading these extracts, and expressed his regret, that out of seventy witnesses and four hundred folio pages of testimony, he could read no more without encroaching too much on the time of the Senate, he said he would introduce the testimony of some American witnesses to the same points. He had seen the statements of the English witnesses last winter, and being desirous to hear what Americans would say on the same subject, he had, in the course of the last summer, addressed certain queries to some friends and acquaintances in the Western States, and had received from many of them communications of so much interest and value, that he should lay them before the Senate. And, first, would exhibit the queries for the better understanding of the answers. The names of his correspondents, he said, would be known to the members of the Senate from the States in which they reside; some will be known to the Senators from many States; and some to the whole body of the Senate.

QUERIES on the state of the salt trade in the Western States.

1. Whether the trade in salt is monopolized? and, if so, at what works? and over how many States do the sales of these monopolists extend?

2. The practices of the monopolists, if any, to enhance the price of salt, and to prevent competition?

3. The prices of domestic and foreign salt in your neighborhood, and the freight of foreign salt from New Orleans?

4. Whether the monopolists have established depots of salt in different States, and appointed agents to sell their salt, and restricted the sales of each depot to its district? How far are the different depots apart in your State?

5. Whether the salt manufacturers have entered into agreements with the monopolizers to restrict the quantity of salt made at the works? to confine the sales to the monopolists? and to stop working wells and furnaces for pay? The meaning of the phrase "dead wells," and the rent of such wells?

6. Whether salt is sold in your neighborhood by weight or measure? If by weight, how many pounds are allowed to the bushel? and how much a weighed bushel measures?

7. In selling by the barrel is due allowance made for the weight of the barrel, and for the loss of salt in drying? If not, what is the difference between the real and nominal quantity in the barrel?

8. Whether the monopolists sell for money, or country produce? for ready pay, or upon credit? and whether the price is higher or lower since the monopoly?

9. Do the monopolists rise and fall in their prices according to the presence or absence of competition? and what salt competes with them?

10. Do they realize great gains?

11. Whether the domestic salt is fit for pickling beef and pork, for curing bacon, and preserving butter, for exportation, or consumption in the south, or long keeping?

12. Whether beef and pork, put in common salt, will be received for the use of the army or navy?

13. The necessity and expense of repacking beef and pork in alum salt, in New Orleans, which has been put up in domestic salt?

14. The necessity and advantage of giving salt to horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs? Whether salt is not indispensable to stock, in the western States? Whether there is not a great difference between inland and maritime States in this respect? The reason of that difference? How much salt per head, and how often per week or month, ought it to be given to each kind of stock? and whether the farmers in your section of the country are prevented, by the high price and scarcity of salt, from giving as much to their stock as they need?

15. The use and advantage of salt in preserving hay, fodder, and clover? In restoring them, after being damaged by wet?

St. Louis, July, 1830.

Communication from G. T. C. McClannahan, Esq. of Jackson county, North Alabama, Oct. 1830.

Your first query—the trade of salt is entirely monopolized here by James White, of the Holston Salt Works, in Virginia. I cannot exactly tell to what States these works furnish salt, but it is to be supposed to the western parts of Virginia, eastern part of Tennessee, a part of North Carolina, the northern part of Georgia, North Alabama, and some in South Alabama, &c.

Query 2d—Col. J. White has a depot at this place, a mile and a half from Tennessee river, down which stream he boats his salt. And if any person else brings salt here to sell, they immediately undersell that person and ruin him. The people sometimes get their salt from Nashville, when they have a convenience of doing so, and it comes much cheaper, after paying land carriage 130 miles, than White's salt; but no person dares to compete with him here; because he can, at his will, undersell any person who pays a land carriage of 130 miles; and therefore instantly break them up. One thing is yet to be told which will convince any man of the sin and oppression of this monopolizing system. This same James White will carry his salt by us down to Ditto's landing, 10 miles below Huntsville, haul it out to Winchester, Ten. which is 55 miles of land carriage, and sell it there so much lower than he will here on the river take it out of his boats, that some of the planters who are able to take their waggons and cross a very bad mountain part of the Cumberland, and haul their salt over from Winchester, which is 45 miles from this place. Is this not oppressive to the poor? Would not this Governmental monopolist wring from the distressed orphan, widow, and war-worn soldier, all their earthly sustenance? And yet the Congress of the United States—this boasted land of liberty and equal laws, countenances such oppressive acts. Why does Mr. White not sell as low here on the river, as at Winchester, after carrying his salt 120 miles, 55 by land? and that too the very same salt. The answer is obvious. At Winchester there is some competition; it is not so far from Nashville, where foreign salt may be obtained. And this is why he sells it lower there than at this place.

We are here fenced in with almost impassable mountains, at a great distance from any commercial depot, and without the means of shunning the exorbitant exactions of these vampires, who take the bread from the mouths of our children with the calculating coldness of an Arab; and these acts are legalized by a Congress of Freemen. We are glad to hear the stern voice of indignation at this oppression, uttered by some of the patriotic republicans of that body, and we should glory in being among the most persecuted victims, if by that means this most pernicious system of monopoly could be overturned.

Query 3d—We have no foreign salt here for sale; two years ago some gentlemen brought a few bushels from Nashville, and sold for $1 87½ per 50 lbs. underselling the salt gentlemen here at that time. The domestic salt has got lower than it was four years ago. Then it was $2 50; now $1 87 to $2.

The freight from New Orleans to Nashville is 1 cent per pound, as I am informed by a merchant of this place, and from Nashville to this place 14 cents per pound.

4. There is a depot here, and another at Ditto's landing, as I am told, for selling salt. These places are about 55 miles apart by land. The remaining part of the question I do not know any thing about.

5. Col. White, as I have been informed by good authority, leased the Preston salt works, in what is called New Virginia, for 9 or 12,000 dollars annually; but I am further informed that the lease is out, and the works are to go into active operation to compete with White—he having let them lie idle heretofore: these are "dead wells," but the number of dead wells he has I am unable to inform you.

6. Salt is sold here by weight, 50 lbs. to the bushel; and 50 lbs. (the bushel) of the salt which I tried (without pressing) measured 1188 595215.109000 solid inches—making four gallons 1 4632.10000 quarts, dry measure, which is but little over half a measured bushel. Therefore when salt is two dollars the 50 lbs. we have to pay at the rate of three dollars and sixty-six and a half cents the measured bushel. This is oppression in a free country—this is the fruit of the tariff.

7. In selling by the barrel, the weight of the barrel and the nett weight of salt, is sometimes, and most commonly, placed on the barrel; but the weight of the barrel is marked much less than its real weight.

They make no deduction for the drying of the salt. One barrel I particularly weighed out, and it lost twenty pounds, and I am credibly informed that some have lost as much as fifty.

8. The monopolists here sell for money, or cotton at the cash price, which is the same thing as money. They do not credit their salt. There is always two prices for cotton here—a cash and discount price. Merchants in taking in cotton for their accounts give more for it than they will in money, and this is called the discount price. The salt gentlemen sell their salt for cotton at the cash price. The remaining part of the query I know nothing about.

9. The monopolists have fallen here, since they find that people would go to Nashville for their salt if they did not. But they know at what price to keep it up: they know the planters cannot take the trouble to go 130 miles to Nashville to get a little salt; and they know that no person dares to compete with them, as they could instantly reduce the price of their salt, and thereby ruin their competitor.

10. They certainly must realize great gains, or they would not give nine or twelve thousand dollars annually for one manufactory, to let it lie idle. Why does not Congress lease all the salt works in the United States, and let them lie idle, and then knock the duty off of salt, if they wish to encourage the manufacture of salt by filling the pockets of the manufacturers? It would be much better for the people. They would be great gainers by purchasing the salt works and demolishing them, or letting them out at a small rate, and then striking the duty from salt.

The remaining queries, I am in hopes, will find abler persons to answer them than I.

Communication from a meeting of the citizens of Madison county, Alabama, 8th of November, 1830, the subject proposed by Wm. H. GLASSCOCK, and authenticated by the signatures of THOMAS MILLER, President, and CHARLES A. JONES, Secretary.

Answer to 1st. The salt consumed here is almost exclusively obtained from Colonel James White's manufactory of Virginia, and sold by his agents in East Tennessee, a part of North Alabama, and West Tennessee.

To the 2d, we can give no definite answer.

3. The price of domestic salt is $1 25 cents per bushel by the barrel, or $1 75 cents by the single bushel. Foreign salt sells at about the same. The freight of salt from New Orleans to Huntsville is about 1½ cents per pound.

4th. Colonel White has salt deposited in different parts of this State, and others, at various distances from each other say 10 to 15 miles.

5th. Preston's works were for some time discontinued for say, ten thousand dollars per annum.

6th. Universally sold by weight, allowing 50 pounds to the bushel: the measured bushel will weigh from 70 to 80 pounds.

7th. When the salt is weighed out of the barrel, it seldom holds out, and frequently loses from 5 to 20 pounds. We may add, that, however honestly it may have been put up at the works, it is generally brought down in open boats, subject to the winter rains, which damage it more or less; and we know of but one of his agents who sells it any other way than by the marked weight.

8th. Salt is sold for nothing else but ready money.

9th. Salt is sold high or low, according to competition. The Kenhawa ground alum and Liverpool are brought in but sparingly, which is the only competition.

10th. We believe that White realizes great gains. We are sustained in this opinion, from his carrying it by land 25 or 30 miles further, where he meets with competition, and selling it for less than he does here.

11th. Wholly unfit.

12th. It will not be received for either.

13th. We can give no correct answer.

14th. It is indispensable for stock of all kinds. It is thought they require more in the western States than maritime States, owing probably to the absence of the sea breeze, and vapor impregnated with salt coming from the sea and alighting on the vegetable matter. Stock of all kinds should be salted twice a week; but owing to the high price of salt, the stock are probably not salted more than once in two weeks, on an average. From the best accounts 3,000 barrels of salt are consumed annually in Madison county, averaging about six bushels (of 50 lbs.) to the barrel. The population being about 27,000, gives us, on average, 33½ pounds to each person. Were those heavy duties taken off, the consumption would be much greater.

15th. Salt is thought to be useful in preserving hay, fodder, and clover; each will keep well if sprinkled over with it, though not thoroughly cured when put up. Moreover, our pork is often spoiled from the want of a sufficiency of salt to pack it up in, which we cannot obtain on account of the high price. Thousands and ten of thousands of pounds are often lost from that circumstance alone. Alum salt would be an immense saving to North Alabama in that one particular.

Resolved, therefore, unanimously, That the delegation from this State, as well as those of our sister States, have our unfeigned thanks for their exertions and co-operation the last session of Congress, with Mr. Benton, in endeavoring to repeal the duty on salt; and that we request our delegation to use their utmost to effect the repeal of a tax so burthensome to us, and of no ultimate advantage to any State.

Communication from Col. F. W. BURTON, formerly of North Carolina, now of Murfreesborough, Tennessee, dated Dec. 8, 1830.

Your favor of July last, propounding fifteen queries on the state of the salt trade in the western States, was received in due time. To the thirteen first of these queries, I am sure that the commercial gentlemen of the country can render a much more correct and satisfactory answer than I can.

To the fourteenth, I will observe that salt is indispensably necessary to the good condition of horses, horned cattle, sheep, and hogs, in the western States. It is beneficial in the maritime States likewise, and the more so as you recede from the seaboard. The watery constituent parts of the atmosphere on the seaboard take with them salt, which is inhaled by these animals, and thereby they are supplied with that salt which is necessary for the healthful condition of all animals, both granivorous and herbivorous, and to some of those that are carnivorous. The quantity of salt per head to each kind of stock will depend on the food with which they are supplied. If with grain, less; if with herbs, more salt. I am sure if the price of salt be reduced, the farmers in this section of the country would give their stock a better supply, and that their improvement would be in proportion to the increased quantity given. To err by an excess is not to be apprehended.

To the 15th query, I will remark that the use of salt in the preservation of hay is well expended. And if new mowed hay or clover, or other grasses, be packed, a layer of hay and a layer of straw, either wheat, oats or rye, and a good supply of salt to each layer be added, you make the best of food for horses and cattle.

I approve very highly your intention to repeal, if you can, the salt tax totally and promptly. In this, and all efforts of your useful life, I wish you success.

Communication from General WILLIAM HALL, of Sumner county, Tenn. Dec. 8, 1830.

I received your "queries on the state of the salt trade in the Western States" in due time, and have delayed answering them only that I might obtain all the information within my reach necessary to a correct reply. The queries will be answered in the order in which they are proposed, Nos. 1, 2, &c. answering to the corresponding numbers in the queries.

1. The salt made at the Kenhawa works, from whence a large portion of the supply for this State, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, is obtained, is monopolised.

2. The monopolists have depots and agents in the different States, supplied by them, who are required to account quarterly for sales, which are made for cash, and at prices fixed by the monopolists.

3. The prices of domestic and foreign salt vary from seventy to one hundred cents per bushel of fifty pounds: freight from New Orleans may be had at fifty cents per hundred pounds.

4. Answered in No. 2.

5. I have not been able to obtain any satisfactory information as to this query.

6. Salt is sold in this State, and throughout the western country, by weight. The measured bushel weighs from 20 to 25 pounds; more than the weighed bushel.

7. An allowance is made for the weight of the barrel, though none for the loss of salt in drying.

8. Is answered, in part, previously. The price is higher since the monopoly.

9. The price of salt is regulated by the quantity in market. The quantity of foreign or other domestic salt brought to this market, is considerable.

10. The monopolists realize great gains.

11. Although Kenhawa salt is very superior to any other domestic salt brought to this market, I am informed that nearly all the beef and pork from the western country is repacked in foreign salt, either for shipment or for the army or navy.

12. See No. 11.

13. I am not informed as to the price of repacking beef or pork which has been put up in domestic salt.

14. The necessity and advantage of giving salt to stock of every kind is universally admitted. It is indispensable in the western States, and ought to be given to all kinds of stock about once a week, and to each head of horses, or cattle, from two to four ounces at a time, and less than half that quantity to sheep or hogs, though farmers in this section are prevented from giving their stock the necessary quantum of salt, owing to the high price of the article.

15. The use and advantage of salt in preserving of hay, fodder, and clover, is admitted by all practical farmers, although but few avail themselves of the advantage, in consequence of the scarcity and high price of salt.

Communication from Lieutenant Governor BREATHITT, of Kentucky, dated Russellville, Nov. 16, 1830.

My information will not enable me to answer your favor on the state of the salt trade, in detail.

From the general opinion on the subject, there is no doubt there was, during the last year, an extensive salt monopoly supplied from the Kenhawa works. Depots were had principally on the water courses for salt, where it was vended by their agents, sometimes on a credit of four or six months. Whether it continues the present season, I am not advised. Those depots extended to Tennessee. Sales were made for money. There is but little foreign salt brought into this neighborhood. I cannot, therefore, state the difference in price. This neighborhood is supplied from the Illinois saline; and the Kenhawa salt from the latter is preferred to preserve meat. It is not so white and clean as that from the saline. It usually sold by weight—fifty pounds to the bushel; when sold by the barrel, the tare of the barrel is taken off; and the salt is generally weighed at the time of sale. It is, however, sometimes otherwise. About this time last year the common price, at this place, was one dollar per bushel: now it may be purchased at seventy-five cents. There is no doubt that salt is indispensable for the use of stock, and, particularly, in this country. Much stock has been raised upon the grazing the forest affords; and if they are furnished plentifully with salt, they are fat. Hence the necessity of its being as cheap as possible, and because also of its universal use by all. I was pleased at the reduction of the duties, last session, on coffee, tea, molasses, and salt. I should be pleased, however, to see the duties retained on manufactured articles, so that our own manufactories may enter into competition with foreign ones, and make a reasonable profit. I would not have them to have unreasonable profit; then it would be a tax upon one portion for the benefit of the other. The point to stop at is one of difficulty, and requires great experience and much research. I should be pleased to hear from you occasionally.

Statement of the Hon. Mr. Lyon of Kentucky.

That, being a member of a mercantile house which received a quantity of salt from the Kenhawa Salt Company, to sell on commission, in the years 1826-7, with instructions to sell at the original mark, or lick weight. Finding many of the barrels greatly deficient in weight, varying from 10 to 20 per cent. they reweighed, and sold a quantity at the real weight: that, when the agent of the company came on, he was dissatisfied, and said it was their custom to sell elsewhere at the original mark, and that it must be so sold there, which they refused to do. The agency, and the salt on hand, were transferred to other hands; and that, he has great reason to believe, the necessities of the people, in many instances, compelled them to purchase the deficient barrels at their marked weight.

Also, that being in company with the Hon. Mr. Benton, of the Senate, in ascending the Ohio from Cincinnati last fall, on board the steamboat Emigrant, said to belong to, and be in the employ of, the Kenhawa salt company, which was towing a keel boat to Maysville, Kentucky, loaded with alum or foreign salt, and delivered there for the purpose of salting pork in that part of Kentucky.

February, 1830.

Communication from General MILROY, of Delphi, (Indiana,) dated November 25, 1830.

I received your letter, requesting information relative to the salt trade of this country. My limited acquaintance with mercantile business, will enable me to say but little, from my own knowledge, on the subject. I can say, however, that the belief is universal, and uncontradicted in this part of the country, that agents employed by the salt manufacturers furnish exclusively the supply of that article for the valley of the Wabash; and that none is permitted to be vended by others, so far as can be prevented by them; and that those agents are regulated by fixed prices, under which they may not sell, but can raise the price in proportion to the demand. It is also believed, that a scarcity of salt is frequently occasioned by the inadequacy of the manufactories to produce sufficient supplies, or that those monopolists hoard it up for the purpose of extorting exorbitant prices, neither of which causes would operate to produce the scarcity and high price, so oppressive to the West, was the salt trade left open to the natural course of competition.

The monopoly of the salt trade is notorious, and is one of the greatest grievances to be complained of in the West; and it is believed that the unrestricted importation of alum salt, is perhaps the only method, which can be adopted effectually to break it down—unless Congress should think proper to declare it a criminal offence to attempt a monopoly of any article of necessary consumption, as the British Parliament has done, and render such offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, which even would not be so effectual.

It will not be disputed, but that a supply of alum salt is necessary in the west, even if the domestic salt was obtainable unembarrassed by monopoly, from its superior qualities in the preservation of beef and pork in a southern market, where we must,

Salt Tax—Mr. Benton.

of necessity, send our surplus of those articles. It is believed by stock-raisers, that a much larger quantity of salt is necessary for stock in the western than in the Atlantic States, owing doubtless to the nature of the food on which they are subsisted; and the diseases to which they are subject.

I should have been much gratified to have been able to furnish you information on all the points on which you request it, and should have done it most cheerfully, had I been in possession of it; not doubting, however, but that the method you have taken, will elicit it in abundance, I shall, therefore, rest satisfied, anxiously desiring the successful result of your efforts to repeal the salt tax entirely—concurring with you in opinion, that it is the best service that can be rendered to the west, next to the graduation of the price of public lands. In both of which great western measures you have the concurrence of a vast majority of the west most ardently wishing you success.

Communication from General Tipton, of Indiana, dated Logansport, (Indiana,) 24th Nov. 1830.

Your printed letter of July last has been duly received, and I have made strict inquiry of merchants, and other gentlemen of intelligence of this vicinity, in relation to the salt monopoly. From facts collected from them, and some within my own knowledge, I have no hesitation in saying there is, and has been for years, a monopoly of that article, to the great injury of the poorer class of the people of Indiana.

Deposits for the sale of salt are established along the Ohio and the Wabash rivers, at from 30 to 40 miles from each other, by monopolists from Kenhawa, in Virginia, and from Kentucky; one agent of these monopolists is at this village, another at Lafayette, 40 miles below, who rise or fall in their prices according to the competition they meet, and by this means oppress the poor, and amass wealth to themselves to a very large amount per annum.

The salt manufactured at the wells at Kenhawa, and in Kentucky, will not preserve pork in the southern climate. In the winter of 1822, I descended the rivers to New Orleans, with a quantity of pork, put up with salt made at the wells of these monopolists; soon after my arrival at New Orleans I was compelled to purchase Turk's Island salt and repack my pork, thereby incurring an expense of one hundred and fifty dollars.

I have no doubt that it would be of great benefit to Indiana, repeal the law levying a duty on foreign salt.

Communication from J. G. READ, Esq. Member of the Senate in the State of Indiana, dated Washington County, Nov. 30, 1830.

I received yours of July last, and am sorry that it is not in my power to give you a more full account of the subject matter therein contained. Relative to the act of last winter reducing the duty on salt, I have only to say, that in this section it met with almost universal satisfaction, and a great anxiety is expressed that the entire duty be taken off this winter.

I now proceed to answer, in a brief and concise manner, a few of the queries propounded by you.

1st. "Whether the trade, &c."—It is, but at what works particularly I do not know; the monopoly extends throughout this State, and I am informed generally throughout the western States.

3d. "The price."—Domestic salt is $1 25. Foreign $1 50. The freight from New Orleans is $1 per hundred.

4th. "Whether, &c." They have; the depots are generally, from twenty to thirty miles.

6th. "Whether salt." It is sold by weight, fifty pounds to the bushel; a weighed bushel will not measure more than three pecks.

8th. "Whether." They sell only for cash in hand. The price is higher since the monopoly.

9th. "Do the." I do not know, but presume they do. Foreign salt competes with them.

11th. "Whether." It is not.

12th. "The expense." Some few years ago I had a number of barrels re-packed in New Orleans which had been put up in domestic salt; it cost me

$1 12½ per barrel, and 12½ cents for each hoop that was furnished in the place of those that got broke in the process. I presume the price is nearly the same yet.

14th. "The necessity, &c." Salt to stock in this country is of great importance; without it but few could be raised; it prevents many disorders, &c. any many farmers here are prevented, from the high price and scarcity of salt, to give them what they need.

15th. "The use." it is of great use. It is found to be an advantage of at least fifty per cent. to hay, particularly prairie hay, that is of little or no use without salt, is found to be almost equal to fodder, when properly put up in salt.

Communication from Gen. WILLIAM H. HARRISON, of Ohio, dated Washington City, Feb. 5, 1831.

I have always supposed, and every years' experience confirms me in the opinion, that the duty on salt, at least the high rate of duty lately paid, was injurious to the interest of agriculture in that part of the western country in which I reside. One of our staples, and the one which I believe yields the most profit to the farmer, is pork. The increase of its manufacture (if I may so call it, meaning the preparation of it in barrels for exportation) is altogether astonishing. It is believed that in Cincinnati alone, there were slaughtered and packed this year, one hundred thousand hogs, averaging at least six dollars, and thus scattering $600,000 amongst the farmers. It is ascertained, beyond contradiction, that sea salt is necessary to prevent its spoiling in its passage through the hot climate of the Mississippi, in its course to a foreign market, or to our own Atlantic ports. In both of these our pork of late years has acquired a very high character. This is due to the experience which has been acquired in packing, and to the exclusive use, when it can be procured, of sea salt. Before that article was brought to Cincinnati by the steamboats, the pork which was prepared with the western salt was always re-packed at New Orleans, when sent to a market beyond that place, at an expense of one dollar per barrel, and sometimes with a considerable deduction from the quantity from the rejection of tainted pieces. And, indeed, after its arrival at the foreign market, it brought a much less price than the pork of the Atlantic States, which had been cured with sea salt. From these facts, it must be evident, that in proportion to the abundance and the cheapness of sea salt in the city of Cincinnati, the price of pork must, in a great measure, be governed, and the price in that great mart governs it in the surrounding States.

In the years 1826 or 7, the pork market opened in Cincinnati tolerably well, but the pork dealers from the Atlantic cities finding a great deficiency of sea salt, and that at a very high price, refused to purchase, and the article fell to $2 and $2 50 per hundred.

The objection, in the western country, that has been urged against abolishing or reducing the duty on salt, is the apprehension that it may destroy the western manufactories of that article. Against the probability of this occurrence, is the fact of the advance of price in the domestic article of from seventy-five to one hundred per centum in the course of six or seven years. I am not able to say what is the cost of manufacturing the domestic article at the several works in the western country. I have understood and believe that from 30 to 35 cents was considered a fair price for it in Cincinnati some years ago. It is not now sold lower than 50 cents; and for some time in December last, 62½ cents per bushel of 50 pounds was charged for it.

I will add the further fact against the successful competition of the imported with the western salt for domestic purposes, for which the latter is equally good with the former, that the salting of pork, commencing in the beginning of December, the salt must be imported in the spring which is intended to supply the market, the usually low state of the rivers in the summer and fall preventing the navigation in these seasons. The investment of money, therefore, by the merchant in the article, must be made at least six months before he can effect a sale of it.

Communication from JOHN C. WEBB, Esq. of Missouri, dated Cape Girardeau, county of Jackson, November 24th, 1830.

I saw in the Jackson Mercury, August 30th, a request of yours to the citizens of the West for information or answers to several queries on the article of salt. Considering myself interested in the matter, I shall endeavor to answer them, so far as my own knowledge of the matter extends.

To the first query I know but little of myself further than this; there are some merchants among us that have been applied to for salt and proposed trade in payment; their reply was, they were selling on commission, and could take nothing else but money for it.

The 2d query I know nothing about.

3d. The price of domestic salt in Jackson varies from one dollar to one dollar twenty-five cents per fifty pounds, and that weighed with old rusty steel-yards that will not preponderate for eight or ten pounds. Foreign salt is never lower than one dollar and twenty-five cents per fifty pounds. Domestic, by the barrel, varies from seventy-five to eighty-seven and a half cents; foreign ditto one dollar per fifty pounds by the sack, after paying for the weight of the sack, and then adding fifty cents more for the sack. The common freightage from New Orleans to the Cape from seventy-five cents to one dollar per hundred.

4th. As to this query I know nothing, of myself.

5th. This I likewise know nothing about.

6th. This query I have answered as to the weight per bushel, only the measured bushel, which, as near as I can say pointed, domestic salt will weigh from sixty-five to seventy, foreign ditto from seventy-five to eighty-five.

7th. In selling by the barrel, 30 pounds is allowed for the barrel, if you take it by the nominal quantity you pay seventy-five cents, but if you have it weighed eighty-seven and a half cents is most common.

8th. As to the manner of selling, it is for money alone, and that in hand; no produce nor credit in the case will answer.

9th. It appears that there is no competition; here when there is a scarcity it is sure to rise, and plenty never brings it down lower than the above stated prices.

10th. This query I cannot answer.

11th. As to domestic salt they will not receive beef or pork pickled with it, and it does not answer for butter for exportation.

12th. Beef nor pork will not be received in New Orleans if put up in common salt.

13th. If any does go down put up in common salt, it has to be re-packed with one bushel of alum salt for each barrel.

14th. I have long experienced the advantage of giving salt to stock of every kind; if I am working my horses and they fail eating, give them salt or salt and water to drink, I discover it immediately restores them to their appetite, and they perform their labor much better. Through the winter I salt them twice a week, and through the working season every other day. I find it necessary to salt cattle through the winter once a week; they eat their rough food much better, and look better in the spring; and when the grass and herbs begin to put up, I find it necessary to salt every other day, and then through the summer twice a week, and have always noticed, if I neglected salting one week, my milch cows failed of their milk. I have some neighbors that seldom ever salt their stock at all, and I take notice that my cattle look as well in the spring as theirs do in the fall. Their reason for not salting, they say, is that salt is so dear. Sheep and hogs require salt at any rate once a week through the summer; hogs put up fatten much better by being well salted.

15th. The advantage of salt for damaged hay I know is great. I have seen hay that looked like it was almost entirely spoiled, and when stacked up with salt, cattle eat it clean, and looked well, but salt selling so high as it does, prevents us poor people from having it by us even for the use of our stock, and pickling up our meat, as nothing but money will get it. Go to a merchant, and ask if he wants any kind of produce, if he says yes—well, I will bring it such a day—I want some salt to pickle up my meat, for I have got no money—his reply is, my salt is a cash article; I cannot sell it for produce. Well, I am obliged to have salt, if you will trust me a little while, I will pay you the money for it. His reply then is, I merely bring salt for accommodation; I make nothing on it; I must have the money down, or otherwise, will reply, I am selling on commission, and am obliged to have the money. On these terms, I have known men to do without salt until they had suffered considerably for want of that article, unless they could borrow of a neighbor.

Honorable sir, if your interference in Congress can mitigate the matter, it will confer a very requisite favor on our neighborhood.

Mr. B. after reading or referring to these communications which were given under the authors' names, stated that he had another of very material import which he would read to the Senate, but without the name. He had the less reluctance in doing this, because he had endeavored to give to the agent of the Kenhawa company, who had been in attendance upon the other House during the session, an opportunity to answer. He had communicated the statement to a member of the Committee of Manufactures, whose name he was at liberty to mention, (Mr. John S. Barbour of Virginia,) for the express purpose of enabling the agent to answer it before that committee, but who had not availed himself of the opportunity.

Statement of a citizen of Kenhawa, furnished as anonymous that he may not compromise his tranquillity, but with the names of the payers and receivers in the "dead well" system; the names being now omitted, as it is not the object of Mr. B. to interfere with individuals, but to expose a system:

"Dead wells are now common at the Kenhawa Salines, and are giving to the place a dilapidated and melancholy appearance, and doing a real injury to the country. There are many of these dead wells, and monopolisers pay the owner for letting them remain idle, * * * and * * * receive about $1,500 per annum for two dead wells, * * * receivers about $3,000 per annum for one, * * * about $1,500 per annum for another. Many others receive less or greater sums upon the same terms. Besides dead wells, there are also unborn wells, whose owners are paid for not letting them be dug. I know several of this kind; * * * receives $1,250 per annum not to dig a well on his land; * * * receives $1,500 annually on the same terms; * * * $2,500 per annum in the same way; and I have no doubt, many others, and it is all a thing of notoriety in the neighborhood. Before the monopoly the price of salt was about a shilling a bushel, as it is called, and as often under as above that price, and it could be got for any kind of trade; since the monopoly it is fifty cents cash, and none will be sold for retail to the people of the States, except to those who will bind themselves to avoid competition with the monopolisers at their depots. The company that monopolise the works are the chief shippers, and through their agents retail to the people in most of the western States, fixing their own price, their own weight, and the quantity which each State is to have, except so far as they are interfered with by alum salt from New Orleans."

After reading, or referring to the extracts of evidence, taken before the Committee of the British House of Commons on the salt duties, and reading, or stating the communications received by himself from citizens of the western States, Mr. BENTON proceeded to make copious and extended remarks upon the uses of salt in agriculture and manufactures; the difference between the impure and inferior salt made by boiling well water, and the clean, pure and crystallized salt made by the rays of the sun, in hot climates, out of the water of the sea; the variety of uses to which the well water salt was wholly unfit and inadequate; and the cruel injustice, on the part of the Federal Government, of expelling the pure salt from the country by an oppressive tax, which might otherwise be had both cheap and abundant, for the purpose of compelling them to use the inferior salt at an enormous and unconscionable price.

1. He remarked on the value of salt to stock, as proved by both the English and American testimony. It was proved that the health of all animals was preserved by it; and with this preservation of health, ensued all the advantages of increased growth and fattening, prolonged life, multiplied offspring; and superior flavor to the flesh, the milk, the butter, the cheese, the bacon, beef, and pork, which were made from them. In England it was computed that the advantage to the stock from all these sources was twenty-five per cent. per annum. On one farm it was rated at thirty-three and a third per cent.; and the aggregate advantage, or rather the aggregate loss to the farmers for want of salt, was stated to exceed the annual amount of the tax, which was about $7,000,000.

2. He remarked on the necessity of sun-made salt for butter and cheese. If put up in common salt, the butter soon became rancid, and sold at less than half the price of alum salt butter at New Orleans and in the West Indies. He attributed the general inferiority of American cheese to the impure salt which was used in making it; and dwelt upon the articles of cheese and butter as sources of wealth to the stock-raising States, if duly improved by the use of pure salt. He said, the exports of the last years had reached the value of $177,000 per annum; which, though considerable, was a trifle compared to the consumption in our own towns, and the export to the Lower Mississippi. He considered the farmers as losing the one-half of their whole sales of butter and cheese, by using artificial salt, made by men, instead of using the natural crystallized salt, made by Nature. To the cows on dairy farms, it was proved, in England, that half a bushel of salt per annum was necessary; and the milk, butter, and cheese, all were richer, and better flavored when that quantity, or more, was given. Common salt would do for the cows to lick; but alum salt was indispensable for butter and cheese that was to be long kept, or exported.

3. In the article of bacon he estimated the loss at nearly one-half in using the fire made salt. Such bacon would not sell for much more than half price in any of our market towns, and could not be carried to the southern climates, or exported, without danger of spoiling, and becoming a total loss. Such bacon was often a drug in the market at New Orleans at two cents a pound, a mere refuse article at that price, while the alum salt bacon was a ready sale at six or eight cents.

4. In pickled pork. For this purpose alum salt was indispensable. The artificial salt would answer no purpose. The poisonous ingredients called slack and bittern, which it contained, corrupted the pork in warm climates, and the soluble nature of the salt itself, by dissolving immediately, brought all the pieces in contact, and made each assist in destroying the other. The crystallized salt, besides being free from slack and bittern, is large in the grain, and so far insoluble that a layer of it remains for years between each piece of meat, and acting as a perpetual preservative. Mr. B. said that bacon might be made, after a fashion, with boiled salt; but pickled pork not at all. For that purpose, the sun made salt was a sine qua non. For want of this salt the western farmers had got into the general custom of making bacon, whereby they lost about one-third of the product of their hog stock; for the bacon dried and wasted near a third by the time it was sold; and would then sell for no more than pickled pork, which lost not an ounce in weight from the day it was put into the barrel till sold. A difference of one-third to be saved in the annual product of the hog stock, would be immense to the farmers; and this difference would be saved by the repeal of the duty on alum salt.

5. In pickled beef. For this purpose alum salt is absolutely indispensable. Beef could not be pickled without it; and, therefore, to find a market, the beef cattle were driven off upon the hoof. Mr. B. pronounced it to be a losing business, a most disadvantageous traffic, to any country to drive away its beef cattle to be sold on the hoof. The immediate loss in that operation was nearly one-half the value of the beef, and the whole loss of the hide, tallow, and offal; the consequential loss, was, in the purchase of leather and manufactures of leather; and the purchase of soap and candles, and also in the loss of leather, soap, and candles for exportation. Pickled beef in New Orleans was usually from 8 to 12 dollars a barrel, which was from 4 to 6 cents a pound. The farmers of the west usually sell their cattle at from 1½ to 2½ cents per pound; thus suffering a loss of nearly one-half on the beef; the hide and tallow, which is worth as much as the beef sells for at such rates, being thrown into the bargain, and given away. The disastrous effect of this suicidal business was seen in every town in the west, where foreign hides from South America, foreign leather, boots, shoes, and saddlery, and foreign soap and candles, from Europe and the Atlantic States, were daily exhibited for sale. Another disastrous consequence, but not so visible to the passing eye, was the loss of all these articles for exportation. The exportation of soap and candles had lately amounted to 912,000 dollars in the year; and of leather, boots, shoes, and saddlery, to 450,000 dollars. These exportations went from the Atlantic cities to the West Indies, and chiefly grow out of the gifts which the western farmers made of their hides and tallow to the drovers. They were exportations which belonged to the West, not only because it produced the material out of which the manufactured articles were made, but it was the best place for carrying on the manufactory of them on account of the cheapness of provisions, and the facilities of exporting direct to the West Indies.

Mr. B. made a further illustration of the evils of driving beef cattle from the West, in its effect upon the internal navigation and domestic markets of the great valley. The Mississippi river was to the West what the Mediterranean sea was to the Romans; it is mare nostrum—our sea—and the steamboats, and other boats upon it, constitute our navigation. The building of these vessels gives employment to a multitude of useful and respectable mechanics; create a demand for vast quantities of wood, iron, paints, and glass, furniture of every description; daily supplies of provisions; wood for fuel, now estimated at a million of dollars per annum; and for an immense multitude of persons to navigate and manage the boats. The aggregate of all these expenditures connected with steamboat building and navigation, was several millions of dollars per annum, and was the most profitable kind of expenditure, for it was carried to the very doors of the people, and delivered into their hands in their own houses. Having drawn the picture of the advantages of steamboat navigation to the west, Mr. B. ventured to make the suggestion that they would be nearly doubled by substituting a change in the beef trade, from driving the cattle on the hoof to the Atlantic cities, to sending the beef pickled to New Orleans and the West Indies. Such a change would open a new and immense head for freight down the river, and a corresponding increase for freight back; for it was of the nature of exports and imports to emulate each other; it would produce diminished prices for under cargo, of which salt would be the chief; and a corresponding increase of every expenditure connected with the construction and navigation of steamboats. He then averred that this change, and the stupendous benefits resulting from it, depended solely and exclusively upon the free use of alum salt—upon the abolition of the duty upon that article—upon the simple and obvious process of permitting the western people to use the salt according to their wants and wishes, which God had created for them in all the islands of the Gulf of Mexico. And he ridiculed with contemptuous sarcasm the affected alarms of those who expressed the fear that there would not be salt enough if the domestic manufactories checked their operations. He said it was a fear that there would be a failure of sun-shine and sea-water!!

Having briefly touched upon the important uses of salt in agriculture, and especially for stock and provisions, Mr. B. proceeded to notice the disadvantages under which the farmers of the western States labored with respect to that article. At the head of the list of these disadvantages, or oppressions, as they might with greater propriety be called, stood the appalling and astounding fact, that the whole salt trade of the west, so far as it depended upon the domestic manufactories, was one vast and cruel monopoly! The amazing fact was proved by a variety of testimony; it was known to every western Senator present; it was felt at home, in every department of agriculture, by all the farmers of the west. The baleful effects of this horrid monopoly were forcibly depicted by the witnesses whose communications he had read. Double price and scant measure; the whole country distracted, allowed, and stinted; ready money exacted; wells rented from their owners to lie idle; new wells prevented from being dug; overgrown fortunes to the monopolizers; privation, want and suffering, among the people and stock: such was the shocking and revolting picture which these communications presented to the Senate. Mr. B. animadverted in the most indignant terms upon monopolies of every species, and placed the salt monopoly at the head of the abominable and infernal list. He said this very monopoly was one of the causes which brought Charles the First to the block. Queen Elizabeth, though a petticoated tyrant, had the humanity, or rather sagacity, to suppress the salt monopoly towards the close of her reign; for which act of mercy and condescension the parliament went in a body, to thank and bless her as an angel of beneficence. The bigot Stuarts revived it, and paid the forfeiture in the loss of life and kingdom. There had been no monopoly of salt in England since Charles the First had lost his head; the States beyond the Alleghany mountains were the only example of that oppression at this time existing in the civilized world. Mr. B. considered the present duty on foreign salt, as the father and guardian of this domestic monopoly. He considered it the protector, defender, and supporter of the monopolists. He considered the act of Congress which kept up this duty, as the law which established this monopoly; and denounced such a law, not merely as odious and oppressive, but as a species of impiety and sacrilege, a species of revolt and rebellion against the providence of God, who had created salt, and spread it through the universe, for the use of man and beast, and as the preservative principle of life and health in both. The sea was filled with it, and the sun manufactured it. It came cheap and pure from that manufactory, established by divine wisdom, and co-extensive with the bounds of the habitable globe. Salt was the preservative principle of the world. Every living animal must have it; every species of food must contain it. Without it, universal death and corruption would ensue. The disciples of Christ were called by their master "the salt of the earth;" and that divine metaphor was intended to convey to the understandings of all people the knowledge of the preservative nature of their mission, a mission which was to save the moral world from corruption, as salt preserves the animal and material world. Laws to prevent any portion of the human race from using the pure and perfect salt made by the rays of the sun out of the waves of the sea, if enacted without a dire necessity, were impious contrivances to frustrate the beneficence of God. A war for self-preservation alone could justify such laws. They had existed in all countries, and had run highest where human liberty was at the lowest ebb. They are now disappearing, vanishing, and falling before the recuperative energies of popular rights. The gabelle fell, in France, before the march of the Revolution. In England, this unnatural tax, after obtaining the monstrous height of fifteen shillings a bushel, sunk and disappeared before the labors of that pre-eminent committee, from whose reports a few imperfect and mutilated extracts have been read. The salt tax disappeared from the United States about twenty years ago, during the auspicious administration of the immortal Jefferson. Even Spain, the last country upon earth in which to look for a liberal example, was an instance of the generous use of salt. The United States alone are now presenting the example of keeping up this odious tax, of keeping it up without necessity, of keeping it up for the oppression of the people, for the protection of monopolizers, for the impoverishment and degradation of the west. But let the people not despair. Relief, though out of sight, is sometimes near at hand. The darkest hour of the night is that which precedes the break of day. In England, in 1801, the first attempt of the friends of the people to reduce the salt tax was followed by the insult and outrage of raising it. The Pitt administration, to punish and intimidate those who proposed the abolition, immediately raised the duty from ten to fifteen shillings a bushel, but they raised the spirit of the people at the same time, and in a few years the whole oppressive burthen fell to the earth.

Resulting from this monopoly, thus established and protected, came the present enormous price of salt. Mr. B. begged Senators to recollect the testimony he had read, and reflect in how many places the sum of 75 cents or a dollar, or a dollar and a quarter, was exacted from the people for about two pecks and a half of inferior, fire made, artificial salt, imposed upon them under the scandalized name of a bushel. If the duty was off, he would venture to affirm that the price of pure, sun made, crystallized salt, would not exceed a picailion for a real bushel at New Orleans, and three or four picailions in the central parts of the Valley of the Mississippi. His calculation was this: that the import price of this fine salt, was, at present, 6 cents for that of Malta; 8 cents for that of Spain and Portugal; 9 cents for that of Turk's Island; and, that in the vast increase which the foreign salt trade would assume, and the reduced price of the salt from Turk's Island, (a British possession,) in consequence of the direct intercourse with that island, or rather with the 500 Bahama islands, of which it is the chief, the average price at New Orleans would be 64 cents; freight for salt, as under cargo, was now about one-third of a cent per pound; and would soon be brought by the great boats, during the spring floods, for the quarter of a cent. Thus would the price of alum salt, at Louisville, be reduced to about 25 cents a bushel. Low as this would be, a great proportion of the western farmers would get it on still better terms. Thousands of flat-bottomed boats, made without expense, navigated without skill or labor, loaded with every conceivable production of the farm and the forest, and descending from all the confluent streams of the Mississippi, visit New Orleans every winter. The owners are their own factors and commission merchants. They sell out the contents of their boat, (which, moored to the levee and, labelled with its contents, serves for warehouse, kitchen, parlor, and bedroom,) in the course of the winter months, when they could do but little at home; buy their groceries in the spring, step on board a steamer with their family supplies, and, for six dollars, are at home in eight or ten days, ready to commence the new crop with the return of the vernal season. To all such, the acquisition of two or three sacks of pure and perfect salt would be nothing but the exchange of a few loose vegetables which would have rotted at home.

Mr. B. maintained that the salt tax fell heaviest upon the laboring classes, and upon the poor. They used most salt in proportion to their wealth, and bought at a disadvantage, because they bought in a pinch, in small quantities at retail prices, raised the money to buy it at a sacrifice, and were most subject to be imposed upon, both as to weight, quality, and price. It was so in England—it is so here. Look at the English testimony! It tells you the tax was harder upon the peasant than the nobleman. Look at the American testimony! It tells you that the people in remote places—the small farmers remote from great towns, had to pay the highest prices, received the scantiest measure, and suffered most from extortion and imposition. It was in such places, and among such customers, that the weighed bushel of 50 pounds would find ample accommodation, lodging, in a half bushel measure; that the old rusty steelyards were used that would not preponderate for ten pounds in fifty; that the deficient barrels were obliged to be taken at the marked weight; and that the extortionate prices of one and two dollars for these scant weight bushels, equal to two and four dollars for real and measured bushels, and that for well-water salt, impregnated with poisonous ingredients, and only half the strength of the sea-water salt, were actually paid by the helpless people, and received by the relentless monopolisers! And yet, in the face of these damning facts—in the midst of the cries of these suffering people—there is a scheme on foot, not only to resist the reduction, but to effect the increase, of this diabolical tax!—to raise it from ten to fifteen cents!

[Here Mr. B. alluded to the bill in the House of Representatives, to increase the salt tax, and thought this bill ought to be proclaimed throughout the West, by a herald and a trumpet, to rouse and alarm the people, and to put them on their guard against the dangers it portended.]

Resulting from this monopoly, and the most degrading of its consequences, was the power to allowance and distric the country for the consumption of salt. The Western country was *distric*ed and allowanced. All the witnesses prove the mortifying fact. Depots are established, and agents appointed, to supply each district. No competition is permitted. No competition can come, except from New Orleans, and that in the season of high water. To prevent the fulness of the supply from operating on the highness of the price, the invention of "dead wells" was made, and a multitude of wells, rented from their owners, have been permitted to stand idle. Nay, more. A further exertion of this invention has exhibited the prodigy of wells suppressed—of unborn wells stifled in the womb of the earth—by hiring and paying people not to dig for their salt water! The consequence of these enormities was, stint in the supply, excess in the price. The country was starved for salt, and made to pay double, in many places quadruple, its value. The domestic supply is not equal to one-fifth of the demand. The whole quantity made in the United States, as proved by the returns of the salt makers themselves to the Secretary of the Treasury, does not exceed five millions of bushels; while the consumption of the country would require thirty millions. The whole product of the West, including western Pennsylvania and the Holston works in Virginia, do not exceed two and a half millions of bushels, weighed bushels; each of which bushel, with a little packing and heaping, would comfortably establish itself in a half bushel measure.

Mr. B. believed that the stock alone of the United States would require twenty millions of bushels. He bottomed his estimate upon the consumption in England. It was there proved that the stock, independent of the draught horses, and hogs, which had not been included in the estimate, required twenty-two millions of bushels, fifty-six pounds to the bushels, to supply them annually. He felt mortified to know the number of stock in England, for he was speaking of England proper, and not know the number in the United States. He regretted that the return of stock was not included in the census—in the census made by State authority at all events—and especially in the West, where stock constituted so large a proportion of the wealth of the people. In the absence of accurate information, he must proceed upon probable data; and, as the United States was more populous than England, ten times more extensive, and the keeping of stock more easy, he would assume the stock census of England as furnishing, not the criterion of numbers, but the data for calculation; the sheep of the United States being probably one-third, cattle and horses doubtful, and hogs far more numerous. Assuming this calculation for the relative number of stock, the necessity for salt was greater: for the use of green food, and especially wild grass, was more usual in the United States; and this grass was more fresh, or free from saltiness, because the United States being a continent, and not an island, the saline dews which corrected the freshness of the grass, did not extend to the interior States. Assuming the sheep of the United States to be one-third of the English flock, to wit: ten millions of head, and allowing to each sheep the English supply of half a pound a week, which made half a bushel a year, and it resulted that the sheep alone of the United States required five millions of bushels of salt per annum! being just as much as the domestic manufacturers made! so that, if the population of the Union should be thrown on the domestic supply, and the sheep supplied first, there would not be one grain left for the hogs, horses, cattle, people, and the thousand uses besides for which salt is indispensable! So much for the domestic supply! It had been computed in England that the supply of salt to the sheep was the saving of six hundred thousand head from dying annually; the loss of western stock for want of salt cannot be estimated. But it is a point for western farmers to think of. Let each one make the computation for himself; and consider what his annual loss is in cattle, hogs, sheep, and horses, for want of this condiment to their food—this medicine for their health—this attraction against running wild—and then estimate, if he can, the annual aggregate loss of the nine western States and Territories.

Mr. B. affirmed that the stint of salt was universal in the west; that it extended to all the operations of the farmer; that it even extended to the pots and tables of the poor? He believed that such an instance of stint, for a necessary of life, did not exist among the negroes of the West India Islands. He believed that those negroes received from their masters, cruel as many of them were, a larger and better allowance of salt than the average of western farmers received from the inexorable monopolists. He said the entire west was a stock raising country. The farmers there, like the patriarchs of old, estimated their wealth, in a great degree, by the number of their flocks and herds. Before the invention of steamboats, this rich vein of wealth was but slightly and imperfectly developed. Want of salt prevented its development. Common salt could not be had in sufficient quantity for salting the stock. Not a pound of alum salt could be had for curing bacon, preserving butter and cheese, and pickling beef and pork. Foreign salt, of no kind, could enter the vast and fertile regions of the west. Freight up the Mississippi, in keel boats and barges, was seven or eight cents a pound—across the Alleghany mountains, in wagons, was as much or more, and then commenced, from hard necessity, and from absolute want of alum salt, the pernicious and impoverishing practice of driving off beef cattle on the hoof. But steamboats furnish the means of relieving this necessity, of supplying this want, and of terminating this pernicious practice. They are bringing salt from New Orleans at so low a freight, that if the duty was off, the price to the purchasers, in the central parts of the Great Valley, and that of the pure sea-made salt, would not exceed 25 cents per bushel; while, to those farmers who traded down the river, the price could not exceed three picailions. This cheap importation of pure salt—this unlimited means of importing it at the one-thirty-second part of its former freight, was the greatest blessing of all the great blessings which the wonderful invention of steamboats has conferred upon the West. It was the very thing which was lacking to give full development to her richest vein of wealth—richer than the mines of Mexico and Peru—her stock and provision trade! Providence, of its infinite goodness, and to crown the blessings of the great West, sent this miraculous invention to give us that alone which was wanting, and never could have been got without it, the pure miracle of soda, the natural crystallized salt, the native, unmixed, product of the sun and sea, the salt of Divine manufactory, as much superior to artificial fire-made salt as the works of God are superior to the works of man! Upon the dispensation of such a Providence, it was to have been expected that the Federal Legislature, to whom the whole power of regulating foreign commerce had been assigned by the States, whether wisely or not, time, and, above all, the continuance of the salt tax will show, it was to have been expected that the Federal Legislature (that part of it at all events which assumed to be the particular friends of domestic industry,) would have given all possible aid to the importation of this Heaven-sent salt. A bounty in favor of the ships which brought it, would have rested upon the same constitutional construction, and upon infinitely greater reasons of justice, than a bounty in favor of vessels which bring home fish. The greatest exertions might have been expected for the encouragement of this importation. Every reason which the head could conceive, or the tongue could utter, sprung forth in favor of the encouragement; not a single reason that craft and cunning could devise, could be arrayed against it. The whole vocabulary of the "American System" furnished not a word against it: for that system rests upon the basis of making at home, and furnishing to the citizen the SAME article, BETTER and CHEAPER than the IMPORTED one! Well, alum salt, which comprehends all crystallized salt, (and all salt made by the sun, and none other, is crystallized,) ALUM SALT IS NOT MADE IN THE UNITED STATES, (a little in the northeast excepted,) not a pound of it is made in the West, nor any rival to it, nor substitute for it. By consequence, it could not be made cheaper and better at home! The "American system" was for it, instead of being against it, unless it is intended to exclude the industry of the farmer, who raises stock, and salts provisions, from the industry to be protected by that system. A bounty might have been expected in favor of every ship that should bring sun-made salt to New Orleans. Instead of that, what have we seen? Federal legislation actually employed to keep this salt away! A hostile and repulsive tax of 20 cents imposed upon every 8 cents, worth of this indispensable salt! A requisition upon the ship that brings it to pay twice and a half its value into the coffers of the Federal Government, before that ship is allowed to land it! Bond and security required, when the money cannot be paid down! And this security to be exacted from STRANGERS, who have crossed the wide seas to exchange their surplus salt for our surplus provisions! And, in consequence of these heavy and merciless exactions, most of the ships bring STONES instead of SALT; forced to bring stones by the Federal Government, and realizing the compulsive illustration of the strongest reproach contained in the sacred pages of the Holy Evangelists! They would bring salt for ballast in preference to stones, if the laws would permit them. Many that bring salt, throw it overboard in the mouth of the Mississippi. When no longer needed for ballast, they throw it into the river, because they are neither able to pay the duty in ready money, nor to give the security which the credit system requires. Is this imagination? Or is it reality? It is reality! And, no longer ago than the last summer the troubled waves of the Mississippi, and the dark shades of midnight, were the conscious witnesses of this lamentable fact, of this dire operation of taxing salt out of the land of America! Mr. B. said he had heard of this sacrifice; this new species of immolation, not to propitiate the Genius of the River, but to appease the infernal Genius of the salt tax, soon after it happened; and had laid it up in his memory for verification. That verification was quickly received; for on his passage to this city, in the month of November last, he fell in at Louisville, Kentucky, with the surveyor and inspector of the port of New Orleans, Maj. Spots, formerly of the army, and lately approved by the Senate both as a military and civil officer, and from him received a confirmation of the fact. Two ships, Major Spots was certain, had thrown their salt overboard; others he suspected of having done so! These ships thus encountering the risk of forfeiting their cargoes, and incurring all the penalties of violating the revenue laws, in addition to the loss of the salt, because they could neither pay the duties, nor give the security, nor find any body to receive the salt as a gift, with a tax of twenty cents a bushel upon it! At that very moment the whole interior of the West suffering for salt! And for whose benefit are these oppressions practiced? For the benefit of a few hundred monopolizers in the west, and a few thousand fishermen in the northeast! For their benefit the repeal of the odious tax is not only resisted, but an increase of the oppression is actually demanded!

Mr. B. drew the line of distinction between good and bad salt. It was a line easy to be drawn, for it was the line between the works of Nature and the works of man. All salt that was made by boiling, no matter out of what water, was impure and imperfect; for the agitation and the heat prevented crystallization, and retained the poisonous ingredients, called slack and bittern; and salt made by the power of the sun was pure and perfect, all the poisonous ingredients having settled to the bottom, and the salt itself forming into lumps by concretion and crystallization. The artificial salt made by boiling is good for many purposes; for salting stock, preserving hay and fodder, for daily use in fresh meat and vegetables; and, by help of much smoke and long drying, will save bacon for fami-use. The natural sun-made salt was indispensable to pickling beef and pork, and to curing bacon, butter, and cheese for exportation, or the southern markets. It was of the tax upon this latter kind of salt that he complained so much; a kind of salt so indispensable to the provision trade of the West, and so impossible to be made by the domestic manufacturers. To this part of the argument he invited, and invoked, and almost defied, the response of his opponents. The fire-made salt would not answer the great purposes of the provision trade. It could not be used by the provision curers, if presented to them as a gift. Sun-made salt alone would answer. It must be had, cost what it may; and a tax upon it was an oppression upon the people, without the possibility of producing a domestic supply of the same article. The domestic salt would not answer! All the testimony proved this great and cardinal fact. He would not recapitulate that testimony; but would refer to the circumstance mentioned by the Hon. Mr. Lyon, of the House of Representatives, and of which he (Mr. B.) was also witness—that of alum salt delivered at Maysville, in November last. This salt had crossed the Gulf of Mexico. It had ascended the Mississippi, in a ship, to New Orleans; then to Louisville in a steamboat; then to Maysville, in a keel, towed by a steamer. It had traversed a thousand miles of gulf, and nineteen hundred miles of river navigation, to reach its point of delivery; and that point in the immediate neighborhood of the great Kenhawa salt works!—there to be employed in salting Kentucky pork for exportation, or southern consumption! How overwhelming and conclusive the bare annunciation of such a pregnant fact! And that no circumstance might be lacking to complete the power of this impressive argument in favor of foreign salt, the company's own steamboat brought it! Thus making themselves public and unanswerable witnesses to the total inefficacy of their own salt, and the absolute necessity of using the foreign!

Mr. B. insisted that the burthen of the salt tax upon the west was aggravated by contrast; for in the northeast there were drawbacks, bounties, and allowances which more than indemnified the fishing interest for the proportion of the tax which they paid. They were allowed to draw out of the Treasury, at the end of each year, as much money as had been paid, or supposed to have been paid, for duties on the salt employed in curing fish; and under this system of drawbacks and allowances, upwards of five millions of dollars had already been drawn. The vigilant Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Ingham) had discovered large frauds in this business, say to the amount of $50,000 in a single year; but the laws were yet in force; and while they continued, the leak from the Treasury on this account must still amount to a quarter of a million of dollars per annum. The western States were allowed nothing in the way of drawback of duty on the beef and pork exported by them. These States, therefore, felt the unmitigated weight of the tax, while to their friends in the northeast it was actually a money making business. This was unequal and unjust in the extreme. The Constitution declared, and, if it did not, the first principle of equity would declare, that taxes should be equal and uniform throughout the Union. But this equality was destroyed when the tax was refunded to one quarter and not refunded to another. It was the same thing as if, in the law imposing it, the levy of the tax should be by sections, omitting one section entirely from the operation of the levy. It would be better in this case to levy by sections, because it has been proved at the Treasury that a certain section draws back more than it pays—more than it would have been exempted from if the levy had not reached it. This business of refunding the salt tax to a part of the community, proves the impolicy of levying it at all; for if it is refunded to a part, justice requires it should be refunded to all, and, if it be refunded to all, where is the sense in levying it? The people of the northeast, with whom salted fish is a predominant food, have a drawback of the duty allowed them; the people of the South and West, with whom salted bacon is a predominant food, have no drawback; and thus the operation of the law is unequal as well as oppressive. The remedy for the whole is to abolish the tax, and all the superstructure of drawbacks, bounties, and allowances, which rest upon it.

The farmers, continued Mr. B. are the class most interested in the abolition of this tax; they feel it to the quick; and he could not allude to that meritorious class of citizens without the deepest feelings of sympathy and concern. They were the soul and body of the country. Their labors supplied all the elements of subsistence to man and beast. Their names were to be found upon every list of contribution to the public service. They were found upon the tax list, the muster roll, the jury panel; the road list, the bridge list, and every other list which exacted the payment of money or the performance of service. There was but one list on which their names were not to be found, and that was the list of office! Farmers and officers seldom get together. Their station in the body politic was, front rank for service, rear rank for reward. Surely a body of men so numerous, and so meritorious, so ready to do, and to suffer, for the Government, and so backward to ask favors from it, ought at least to be uninjured by the Government. Laws should not be made against them, if they are made for them. Fair play, at least, should be their portion. The "Laissez nous faire"—"let us alone"—should be their right-granted prayer. Yet, how stands the account with the Federal Government? Their produce loaded with duties in foreign countries—virtually excluded from many of them—by the total failure of Congress to make any attempt to regulate foreign commerce according to the power granted in the Constitution, and the declared intention of the States in conferring that power upon Congress! An indispensable ingredient not only in their wealth, but in their living, and only to be obtained from abroad, loaded with a duty of three times its value, before they can use it at home! The Gulf of Mexico is saturated with the purest salt. Two thousand islands abound with it. The Bahamas alone, about five hundred in number, of which Turk's Island is the chief, lying in the very channel to New Orleans, could glut the valley of the Mississippi at a picillion a bushel. These islanders want our provisions; we want their salt; but the Federal Government gets between the parties, and, by a total neglect of the power to regulate foreign commerce, and a manifest abuse of the power to lay duties, obstructs and prevents the natural and beneficial exchange of commodities to which the wants and superfluities of the respective parties so powerfully attract, and so urgently invites them. The same with land. The Federal Government has got all the land. Invested with the whole domain by the imprudence of the southern States, it becomes the dog in the manger, and refuses to let the farmers have for its value what itself cannot use. But, to confine these reflections to the matter in hand. The Gulf of Mexico is full of salt; the western farmers want it; they are debarred its use; and that by a Government whose taxes they pay, whose battles they fight, whose burdens they bear, and whose favors they seldom receive. We have a Committee on Agriculture, so styled at least, whether by way of antithesis was not for him (Mr. B.) to say; certain it was, the name, if not the design of the committee should have put them at the head of all the measures for the abolition of the salt taxes and reduction of the price of refuse lands. He felt himself to be doing the business of that committee, and hoped they would soon be sound fellow-laborers and co-operators together.

Farmers, and all the departments of agriculture, are the chief sufferers by the salt duty; but they are not the sole sufferers. Manufactures suffer also; and it was computed by Sir Thomas Bernard, one of the witnesses examined by the Committee of the British House of Commons, that the manufactures of England were annually injured to the amount of the tax derived from salt. Various manufactures require this article, either in its proper shape, or as a chemical preparation. The hard soap alone made in England was computed to require two thousand tons of mineral alkali per annum; and this alkali is obtained, by a chemical process, either from salt in its proper state, or from the salt contained in barilla and kelp. To procure two thousand tons of alkali must require a much greater number of tons of salt. The barilla only yields seventeen per cent. of alkali, and kelp six per cent. The decomposition of the salt itself is the cheapest mode of procuring the alkali; and this salt is taxed two or three times its value in the United States, so that the Federal Government has actually established a tax upon CLEANLINESS! for, without soap, people cannot be clean; and, without salt, they cannot have soap. The Committee on MANUFACTURES ought to pursue this subject. Their learned labors, their scientific researches, their practical knowledge, their access to the fountains of information, their zeal in the cause, would enable them to give in a list of some fifty manufactures in which salt, or its chemical preparations of alkali, muriatic acid, oxy-muriatic acid, sal ammoniac, &c. &c. &c. is indispensably necessary. To that committee is resigned this branch of the subject; and the confident belief may be entertained that, at the proper time, this zealous committee—this committee no less capable than zealous—will come forward with a mathematical demonstration to prove that the salt tax is an injury to manufactures to the full extent of its own amount, say a million of dollars per annum; and that the prosperity of manufactures loudly demands its total and instant repeal.

Every interest cries aloud; the joint interests of agriculture and manufactures clamor together for the repeal of this tax. It is a tax upon the entire economy of NATURE and ART, upon man and upon beast, upon life and upon health, upon comfort and luxury, upon want and superfluity, upon food and raiment, upon washing and cleanliness! A tax which no economy can avoid, no poverty can shun, no privation escape, no cunning elude, no force resist, no dexterity avert, no prayers can deprecate, no curses repulse! It is a tax which invades the entire dominion of human operations, falling with its greatest weight upon the weakest and most helpless. It is the tax which tyranny invented, in the worst ages of the world, to force from the cultivator of the soil, to wring from the clenched fist of penury, to extract from the mouth of hunger, the last unwilling contribution of vassals to lords. The Tories introduced it into England above a hundred years ago. Our necessities compelled us to resort to it, in a small degree, at the commencement of our Government. The Federal Administration of 1798 ran it up to its highest amount. Jefferson overthrew it. The war of 1812 compelled us to resort to it again. Now we have no war, no Federal Administration, no necessity, and the disciples of Jefferson are in power. The English Whigs have overturned this tory tax in England; cannot Whig Republicans overturn it here?

Mr. B. repeated with energy and emphasis, and wished to fix the attention of the Senate, and of all America, fully on the circumstance, that the British Parliament had totally repealed the salt duties of Great Britain. The information collected by the committee of the House of Commons in 1818 effected the immediate overthrow of these duties. The King's ministers withdrew their opposition, impossible as it was for the treasury to do without the product of the duties, and difficult as it was to find a new article of taxation on which the amount might be levied; but they withdrew their opposition, and the bill for the repeal went through both houses without further debate, and received the approbation of the King the next day. This is what was done upon the prayers of the people, in a country where the people are very imperfectly represented in one branch of the Legislature, not represented at all in the other, and where the Chief Magistrate, who approves the act, is a hereditary ruler; where the necessity for the tax was urgent; where the domestic supply of artificial salt was abundant; where the manufacturers of this salt clamored for protection; but where the voice of the people was heard, and every minor interest made to yield to that sacred voice. He quoted this example, and dwelt upon it: for he held it to be impossible that the republican Congress of the United States, without a single restraining motive which operated in Great Britain, could refuse to do for the people of the United States what King, Lords, and Commons had done for the subjects of the British Crown.

NOTE.—Of the three speeches delivered by Mr. BENTON some years ago on the salt tax, the foregoing is the only one he has been able to find in that most defective and imperfect of all compilations, Messrs. GALES & SEATON'S Register of Debates.

DEFERRED DEBATE.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and addressed the Senate at great length. He commenced by observing that this bill, reported from the Committee on Finance, was founded on the assumption that the compromise act was no longer to be considered sacred, or to be respected. The bill proposed to open the controversy as to the tariff, and the question for the Senate to decide was—"Shall it be opened?" Mr. C. said that he would on no account disturb the compromise act, however desirable it might be that the duty on salt should be reduced.

He looked forward to the year 1842, when the act would expire, and the duties be reduced down to the economical wants of the Government. He called upon southern Senators not to support the bill, but to look to the future, when they would reap the advantages of their present position, by not touching the bill of '33. He was opposed to sudden reductions of duties, and in favor of the gradual repeal of them. And the honorable Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) had brought forward this bill, as a bait, to induce southern gentlemen to yield the advantages which they had in refraining from touching the act of 1833. Mr. C. went into a long history of the circumstances which had originated and attended the passage of the various tariff acts; and he intimated his doubts as to the earnestness of the Senator (Mr. Wright) in bringing forward this bill when the session had nearly expired. He (Mr. C.) thought, looking at the progress of events here and elsewhere, that there were other motives than those which had been expressed. The tariff act of 1828 had been pregnant with the greatest evils—raising, as it did, the duties to an enormous height. The act of '32 had reduced the duties to some extent; but still they remained exceedingly high. Mr. C. next spoke of the act of '33 and its effects, and next adverted to the surplus revenue.

He then remarked that the surplus which the Senator from New York now so much denounced, was a surplus produced by his own act, and which would now have been enormous had it not been for this act. We of South Carolina saw but one remedy, and that was the glorious one of State interposition. We saw the whole Government against us without any power, but that of State sovereignty to protect. To our neighbors we looked in vain. We waited calmly, and marked every movement of those who had the control of the Government; and what was the measure proposed by them to fix this tariff on us permanently and forever. It was distribution; seeing that if the tariff was kept up, and the principle of distribution established, it would give them power irresistible. Shortly after 1828, a distinguished member of this body, now a member of the administration (Mr. Dickerson) brought forward a bill to distribute annually the surplus revenue, as a means of preventing an interference with the protective system; and the State of New York came out warmly in favor of the measure. The President was prepared to act his part, and he, Mr. C. had heard that in his short inaugural address, he had inserted a clause recommending distribution; but it was taken out at the advice of his friends, and he had understood with great difficulty. At the next two sessions was the recommendation of the President for distribution, previous to reduction, when not a word was said about reduction. He was very glad to find that the authors of distribution were now denouncing what he and his friends denounced in advance. During the whole time when this tremendous torrent of revenue was pouring into the Treasury, the administration was busied in the small political movements of the day.

No effort was made to meet that crisis which every man of sense saw was approaching, the payment of the public debt, by providing for such a reduction of revenue that no evil consequences would ensue. After waiting two sessions, the act of 1832 was passed, which took off two millions, and we were then (said Mr. C.) gravely told, by the Secretary of the Treasury, that this was the settlement of the great question between the North and the South, and that there would be no surplus; and some public men on the administration side from the south were deceived by his assertions, and went home and pledged themselves and their political prospects on them. But we (said Mr. C.) were determined not to be thus humbugged. We nullified the tariff, and brought down the revenue by the act of 1833. Thank fortune! patriotism and good counsels triumphed over those who were for controlling a member of this confederacy at the point of the bayonet; and this act of 1833, which the Senator from New York now sought to destroy, was passed. The Senator from New York said that this duty on salt would test the question whether this compromise is to be preserved. [Here Mr. Wright made a gesture of dissent.] He was glad the gentleman denied it; but whether he said so or not, this vote would test the question. Now, if southern members vote to repeal this duty, they will surrender all the advantages of the compromise act. If they now, for so small an advantage as the repeal of the duty on salt, violate the rights secured to the manufacturing interest by this act, how will they dare to call on the members from the north to adhere to this compromise when the year 1842 comes, and this compromise shall have run out? The question is, (said Mr. C.) are we to follow the lead of the Senator from New York in disturbing this compromise? The gentleman must excuse him for saying that he, for one, would not follow it. He saw into the scheme, and it was not so much a reduction of the revenue, as it was a movement to revive the party conflicts between the North and the South. He saw in that movement, the means of vast political power which was most important in future Presidential contests. Open the tariff question, and you have the whole subject again before Congress, creating hopes and expectations in every section of the Union. If it be desirable to gain power in this way, nothing was more easy. Take a medium position, and favor the one or the other side as interest requires, and the whole business will be accomplished. I distrust those (said Mr. C.) who deceived us in 1828. He should never forget the rebuke given by a distinguished Virginia Senator, to the gentleman who was the most to be charged with fixing the tariff of 1828 on them. That gentleman had acted with them in most instances from the first, and induced the southern members to believe that he would go with them; but when it came to the vote, he voted against them. The stern Virginia statesman told him, "you have deceived me once, and that was your fault, but if you deceive me again, it will be mine." Alas, for the ancient dominion she has cast away her faithful Senator, and has raised to the highest honors, him who trampled on her rights. He, for one, was under no embarrassment, under no pledge. The Senate knew well that his course in 1833, left him free to follow the dictates of his own judgment; and he believed that the course that he was now pursuing, was for the best interest of the South. His constituents had no desire to prevent their Senators from performing all that duty or honor required. They knew what advantages they derived from this compromise act, and that its operations would, in the course of two years, remove ten millions of duties more. They knew that when the act run out, there was an agreement to bring down the revenue to the economical wants of the Government, and they would consider him faithless to them, if he was willing to surrender all these advantages. No he would not surrender them. Though he was under no pledge, yet, taking the liberal side, he should vote in every doubtful case against a repeal. If this compromise act was not to be respected, it would be because of the votes of southern Senators. He respected too much the gentlemen on the side of the manufacturing interest, to believe that they would be the first to disturb this act.

Mr. BROWN said that, as one of those representing, in part, one of the southern States, he felt himself called upon to say that he did not approve the doctrines which had been advanced by the Senators from South Carolina, and considered himself bound, by a proper regard to the interests of his constituents, to vote for the abolition of the duty on salt. This tax on an article of such prime necessity and universal use, had always been viewed as odious, even when intended as a financial measure, to relieve an embarrassed Treasury. What, then, he would ask, should be the degree of repugnance felt towards it, when millions were annually flowing into the Treasury beyond its legitimate wants?

Among the most extraordinary spectacles that he had witnessed here in the various mutations of political parties, none had struck him as more remarkable than that presented by the co-operation of the Senators from South Carolina with the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Davis,) who had always been distinguished for his zeal in support of high protecting duties, against the reductions proposed by the Committee on Finance. This, indeed, was a strange and extraordinary coincidence! And what more did we see and hear? Both of the Senators from South Carolina denouncing, in the most unqualified terms, those of our northern friends who advocated these reductions!

The Senate had been told that the State of Virginia, and other southern States, which had aided in elevating the President elect to the station which he was shortly to fill, had done an act fatal to their interests, and inconsistent with their political principles. As one of the Senators from a southern State, he could not sit in silence and hear the charges which had been brought against that gentleman on the subject of the tariff, without expressing the opinion that great injustice had been done him. He (Mr. B.) had no hesitation in making the assertion, that from the period when he had first taken his seat in that body, at the session of 1829 and '30, down to the period when South Carolina passed her ordinance of nullification, the only efficient aid given by any party from the North in favor of reduction, came from the political friends of Mr. Van Buren. He would ask, if it had not been almost a constant topic of abuse and denunciation against him, during the period to which he had referred, that he favored a reduction of the tariff? If any one doubted the accuracy of his recollections of that period, he would refer them to the contemporaneous debates in both branches of Congress, and they would find that portion of the opposition who were in favor of high protecting duties, repeatedly assailing him as an adversary of the system, and as meditating its overthrow. Such Mr. B. knew to be the fact. He knew, likewise, upon all test questions which came before either House of Congress during the period to which he had alluded, that almost the only aid that the southern States had received, either in discussion or by votes, was given by the political friends of the gentleman whom the Senate had heard so much denounced. And, notwithstanding this was the fact, he was held up here and charged with having attempted to fix permanently high duties on the country! Mr. B. considered the charge which had likewise been made against the administration, in this debate, of having wanted in proper efforts to reduce the tariff, pending the progress of the great controversy, which had agitated the country on that subject, to be equally unsustained. Those who were then members of that body could not fail to recollect the anxious exertions, made by the leading members of the administration, to obtain a reduction of the tariff to some reasonable standard. At the session of 1831-32 the then Secretary of the Treasury submitted a plan to the House of Representatives, which he was, he believed, called on by a resolution of that body to do, which proposed a very large reduction, and which met with warm opposition from the manufacturing interests. This plan was then considered as having not only the sanction of the administration, but its warm support. How then, he would ask, could it with justice be said that there was no effort made in good faith, by those in power, to adjust this question at that time?

The honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) had said that the act of 1832, by which the tariff was reduced some five or six millions annually, was considered by those who voted for it as settling the great question of the tariff, between the North and the South. He (Mr. B.) was one of those who voted for the act of 1832, and he also remembered the little favor which it met with from some other quarter. He did not consider it as at all settling the question, nor did other gentlemen from the south, who supported it, view it in that light. On the contrary, the debates of that day would show that they had declared their unalterable hostility to the system, while it continued on the statute book. The gentleman from South Carolina was therefore certainly mistaken, when he had said that the act of 1832 was considered as settling the question of the tariff between the north and the south. He would add that, in his opinion, much of the credit was due to the operation of that law in mitigating the tariff, which was now claimed, exclusively, for what was generally designated as the compromise act, passed in 1833! By the former act, it was estimated that the revenue would be reduced annually five or six millions; yet it seemed that all the credit is now to be given to the compromise act. He felt towards that act, and for the motives which prompted the honorable gentleman who originated it, that respect to which they were so justly entitled.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina, who had first addressed the Senate on this question, (Mr. Preston) took occasion, in the course of his remarks, to say it was owing to the virtue and patriotism of the State of South Carolina, in taking the stand she did in relation to the tariff, that the southern States were now enjoying the advantages of diminished burdens on their productions. Now, it was far from his intention to speak with censure of the movement of that State, which had been alluded to as possessing so much virtue. He was opposed to the force bill, designed to counteract that movement; but he thought it was claiming rather too much to say that the credit was due solely to any one State. He did not believe that her course, on that occasion, had been attended with such fortunate consequences as those which had been claimed as flowing from it. On the contrary, he must be allowed to express great doubts whether it had not, in a great degree, in the end, contributed to delay the reduction of the duties down to a revenue point.

The payment of the national debt, and the accumulation of a vast amount of surplus in the Treasury, had produced an almost universal conviction throughout the country, that the revenue should be brought down to the legitimate wants of the Government. This opinion certainly prevailed at the last session of Congress, so far as he was able to judge. And what he would inquire was the reason, and almost the sole reason for not doing it. Was it not asserted, that the compromise act, which resulted from the movement of South Carolina, had imposed an obligation on Congress, not to act while it was in force? This certainly was the main argument against legislation to reduce the duties. He believed, but for that, even the most enthusiastic advocates of high protecting duties, would not have ventured to advocate the continuance of the law by which the present immense amount of surplus revenue was raised. He would repeat then, that it might be well questioned, whether the movement of South Carolina had not, in some degree, prejudiced southern interests, from the effect of the compromise act, which had resulted from it, to delay the reduction of the tariff down to a revenue standard.

The Senator had warned those representing southern States in this body, not to vote for a reduction of the duties, provided for by the bill then before them, because, in doing so, he thinks they will lose the favorable position at this time occupied by the South under the present system, and invite another attempt to increase the tariff. Mr. B. did not perceive any ground for the indulgence of such apprehensions. The national debt had been some time since paid off, and a large amount of surplus revenue was annually coming into the Treasury. He could not for a moment believe that any administration would ever venture so dangerous an experiment as to propose an increase of duties under such circumstances.

He had always entertained the opinion that the act of 1833 should not be touched for light or trifling causes. As a Senator from a southern State, he would not have volunteered a proposition to act on this subject, but as it had been brought before them, and as very clear indications, in his opinion, had been given, from a large portion of the people of the North, that some reduction ought to be made, he considered the aspect of the question materially changed. The friends of reduction were not, on that floor, confined to those representing southern States; but many gentlemen, from each of the great divisions of the Union, were found concurring in the opinion that it was necessary. When this sentiment had taken such strong hold on the public mind, as well in a large portion of the North as elsewhere, he could not see any impropriety in legislating with a view to lessen the public burdens, at this time so unnecessarily continued. As one of those representing a southern State, he did not consider that he should discharge his duty if he were, under existing circumstances, to refuse his aid in voting to abolish the duty on salt, an article so essential to every class of citizens, and more especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits.

If, however, (said Mr. B.) this view of the subject, is irreconcilable with a proper consideration of the compromise act, there was another obligation of still higher authority, and entitled to more sacred observance, than any which could possibly result from a mere legislative enactment, that challenged their respect. He alluded to the Constitution of the United States, from which was derived our power to impose taxes in the shape of duties or otherwise. He contended that Congress had no right to raise money by any species of taxation, except only for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers granted to the General Government by that instrument. They were annually raising a great deal more money than was required for those purposes. Was there not then a constitutional obligation resting on them to reduce the duties to the wants of the Government, which was paramount to any and to every other consideration? While, therefore, gentlemen were urging the claims of the compromise act to such sacred regard, he trusted that they would remember that the Constitution of the United States deserved infinitely more their regard and respect in guiding us in our deliberations here.

Mr. B. expressed his regret that the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) had deemed it proper to make, what was, in his opinion, such an uncalled for and unwarrantable denunciation against those of their northern friends, who had come forward as the advocates of a reduction of duties on this occasion. If some of these gentlemen had occupied the position in 1828, in relation to the tariff, which had been said, and charged against them, the country had the gratification now to see and know, that they, at least, had changed for the better, while some of those representing a portion of the South upon this floor, and who were now opposing some of the proposed reductions, had in that respect, somewhat deteriorated.

The Senator from South Carolina, in his opinion, in opposing a reduction of duties, by so doing contributed to keep up the system, and in that manner indirectly supported the tariff principle. It would seem, therefore, that the relative positions of gentlemen had undergone some change, in the progress of events.

Mr. CALHOUN: Am I to understand the Senator to say that I have changed my sentiments in relation to the tariff?

Mr. BROWN resumed. What he intended to say, and what he had distinctly said, was, that those who are now charged with having, in 1828, been friends of the tariff, at any rate had now given indications in favor of relaxing the present system of duties, while gentlemen who were hitherto opposed to the system, were at present against a reduction of the duties. He could not exactly say what their sentiments were, but only what their course was here. Whether their sentiments had undergone any change it was not for him to say; but he repeated, that so far as their actions were concerned, it seemed certain to him, that the gentlemen were not as hostile to the system as they had been on some former occasions.

Mr. CALHOUN, after a few words, said he hoped that the Senator from North Carolina would acknowledge that it was exceedingly unfair (to say the least of it) to hold him up as opposed to a reduction of the revenue, and a friend to a high tariff, because he was opposed to interfering with the compromise act, and thus surrendering all advantages the South acquired by it. Was he not now in favor of reduction? and was he not voting for it in this very bill, though he was opposed to reduction on some particular articles protected by the compromise act? and the only reason why he did not vote for reducing these, was his strong opposition to a high tariff, and the knowledge that they must go off by the operations of the compromise act in two or three years. He had another reason, which was, that he had not the slightest faith in the intention to reduce the revenue to a serious amount in those who had brought forward this bill. More than that, why did they put disputed articles in the bill, when there were a great many articles which would be passed in a few moments, and secure the passage of the bill through both Houses, which could not be done if it contained disputed articles. Because he would not vote for disputed articles, and had no faith in the intention to make a serious reduction of the revenue, the Senator from North Carolina keeps him up as a friend to the tariff, and opposed to reduction. Either the rate of the Senator's intelligence, or his feelings towards him, must warp his judgment. Upon reflection, the Senator must see that there was nothing either in what he said or did that indicated that he was opposed to a reduction.

Mr. BROWN said that he thought he had not misrepresented the Senator, and if he did, it was certainly unintentional. The gentleman had alluded, in language somewhat harsh, to the representatives from the South, if they should vote for this bill. Mr. B. consequently felt himself called upon to make some observations why he should vote for the abolition of the duty on salt. In reply he took occasion to say, that the Senator had, at any rate, in his speech, advocated the retention of the present duties, (and which he did not now understand the Senator to deny,) and that he had declared himself opposed to any infraction of the compromise act, and in doing so, he had supported the tariff system. Mr. B's opinion was, that an individual voting against a reduction of the duties, was in fact voting to perpetuate the act to keep it the longer on the statute book, and it was a tariff vote in effect. That was what he intended to express. When the issue was made up, and the individual was asked "will you, or will you not, vote for a reduction of duty?" and that individual refuses to vote for a reduction, there was no political casuistry, there was no pitiful subterfuge which could induce him (Mr. Brown) to believe that that individual did not give a vote to perpetuate the system.

Mr. B. considered that the Constitution of the United States was imperative in its commands on Congress to raise no more duties than were required to carry into effect the powers delegated and granted by that instrument. What, he inquired, was the General Government doing under this system? Why, they were raising a large surplus revenue—a thing never contemplated by the Constitution—a power not delegated to Congress. And that being the case, what was the consequence of it? Why, that they were violating the very instrument by which they professed to be guided in their acts of legislation. He would ask, was it not plain, palpable, and beyond all contradiction, that those who purposed voting against a reduction of duty were in effect giving a vote to perpetuate and keep up the system of protection? That was his deliberate and settled opinion, and he conceived a different impression could not have been made on the minds of other Senators.

Having expressed this conviction, he cared not to whom and where it gave offence. The truth must be told sometimes, however unpleasant or annoying to those who might be affected by it. Harsh repartee and personalities might be indulged in, but those who commenced that warfare must not expect always to escape without some resistance being offered.

Mr. B. did not profess to have any exalted opinion of his own intelligence; and he trusted that he had none of that overweening egotism and contemptible vanity which so often characterised some other individuals; but he should use that little portion of intelligence with which God had blessed him as he chose, without consulting other gentlemen; and whether his ideas agreed precisely with those who fancied they had all the intelligence, virtue, patriotism, and every thing else, was a consideration of very little importance indeed, and not worth a thought. He (Mr. Brown) had no particular standard of infallibility to govern his actions; and he would take the liberty of saying that he would not seek it in that quarter [looking towards Mr. Calhoun.]

Mr. CALHOUN said that the Senator from North Carolina had satisfied him of one thing. Because he (Mr. C.) refused to disturb the compromise act, the Senator from North Carolina held him up as being in favor of a high tariff. Because he, Mr. C. was actuated by a sincere desire to preserve to the South the certain reduction that must take place under this act, and thus get rid of the protective system, the Senator said that, voting as he did, he voted to perpetuate it. Now after such a course taken by the Senator from North Carolina, he should not pretend to argue with him; he was beyond the reach of argument. He very much regretted that the Senator had not met in a proper way the appeal he made to him, and now all he had to say was that he had learned a lesson, and that lesson was not to respond to the arguments of the Senator from North Carolina, nor again to make an appeal to his correct feelings.

Mr. BROWN remarked that there were some individuals whose notice and good opinion he should feel mortified at not having, but there were some others whose opinions he did not regard in the same light, and for which he felt a total indifference. The notice of that gentleman had not always proved beneficial to the individuals who had been so fortunate as to receive it. On the contrary, he believed that the favorable opinion of that gentleman had not been considered as the most unerring evidence that the individual on whom it was bestowed had claims to the public approbation. He, therefore, could not regard it as a signal mark of honor conferred on him, even if he had received it.

Mr. B. did not stand upon this floor to make use of high sounding pretensions; but he did stand there ready to uphold and defend his own honor with that Senator or any other; and he was as ready on this occasion, as on any other, to vindicate it. He would repeat, then, that he could not be deceived by a miserable subterfuge that, because a Senator did not give his vote to reduce the duty, he did not aid in perpetuating the tariff system. Now, Mr. B. contended that the reverse was the fact, and that was the head and front of his offending. And he would take leave to say that the course which the gentleman had taken in regard to him (Mr. Brown) could be characterised only as one of those ebullitions of feeling, and hallucinations of mind, that he had heard, again and again, indulged in against the present administration, and many of those who supported it.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he certainly should gratify the Senator from North Carolina, by not bestowing on him any notice on any occasion; and as to the words "miserable subterfuge," as applied to him, he threw it back on him.

Mr. BROWN replied that he felt nothing but the utmost contempt for the Senator from South Carolina.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

REMARKS OF MR. YELL, OF ARKANSAS.

In the House of Representatives, Feb. 25, 1837.—On the motion of Mr. MANN of New York, to amend the motion of Mr. BELL of Tennessee to amend the fortification bill, by inserting a clause to provide for the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States on the scale of federal representation.

On taking the floor, Mr. YELL said, that before the vote was taken on this important subject, he wished to say but a few words, and he would be as brief as possible, because at this late day he was not disposed to detain the House, and thus obstruct the general course of business. He deemed it proper to avail himself of the occasion to briefly and freely express the reasons which had governed his course in relation to the proposed amendment to the bill, and this he was bound to do, in justice to himself and the young and flourishing State he had the honor to represent. I voted, Mr. Speaker, continued Mr. Y. against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell,) because I am of opinion that this bill, if passed, and sanctioned by the President,—and I trust that it never will receive the countenance of that distinguished man and illustrious statesman,—will at once establish a system demoralizing and corrupting in its influences, and tend to the destruction of the sovereignty of the States, and render them dependant suppliants on the General Government. The power and patronage of this Government should not thus be perverted for the base purpose of degrading and withering the independence of the States—that glorious independence, Mr. Speaker, which, sneer at it as gentlemen may who come from particular sections of this Union—sections, sir, where aristocracy is getting the mastery of our democratic and federative principles—must be the last bulwark of liberty. But, sir, I am opposed to this measure on other and not less tangible grounds. Sir, I behold in this plan of distribution, what every enlightened mind can readily discover, a deep and a matured plan, conceived and nurtured by the high tariff party, to continue and consolidate their odious scheme of injustice and oppression. And, strange as it may appear, it is now advocated, and probably will receive the votes of gentlemen from the middle and southern States, once the uncompromising opponents of the tariff principle, but who now are ready to fall at the foot of Baal, and sacrifice former principles and professions, for the purpose of filling their State treasuries at the expense of the people—by recognising and establishing a system of taxation as oppressive as it is unconstitutional. And, sir, the brave and hardy people of the young and vigorous State which I have the honor to represent, are called on to subscribe to such heresies and denationalizing dogmas. The man who expects any thing of the kind from the people of Arkansas, knows but little of their character; or, knowing it, would basely misrepresent them, and bow at the temple of Mammon.

This measure of distribution, since it has been a hobby horse for gentlemen to ride on, has presented an anomalous spectacle! The time yet belongs to the history of this Congress, when honorable gentlemen, from the south and the west, were daily found arraying themselves against every species of unnecessary taxation, boldly avowing that they were opposed to any and all tariff systems which would yield a revenue beyond the actual wants and demands of the Government. Such was their language but a few weeks or months ago, and, in proclaiming it, they struggled hard to excel each other in zeal and violence. And now, sir, what is the spectacle we behold? A system of distribution—another and a specious name for a system of bribery has been started; the hounds are in full cry; and the same honorable and patriotic gentlemen now step forward, and, at the watch-word of “put money in thy purse; aye put money in thy purse,” vote for the distribution or bribery measure, the effect of which is to entail on this country a system of taxation and oppression, which has had no parallel since the days of the tea and ten penny tax—two frightful measures of discord, which roused enfeebled colonies to rebellion, and led to the foundation of this mighty republic. But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed distribution is only for momentary duration; that it is necessary to relieve the Treasury of a redundant income, and that it will speedily be discontinued! Indeed, sir! What evidence have we of the fact? What evidence do we require to disprove the assertion? This scheme was commenced the last session; it has been introduced to this; and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, it never will be abandoned so long as the high tariff party can wheedle the people with a siren lullaby, and cheat them out of their rights, by dazzling the vision with gold, and deluding the fancy by the attributes of sophistry. Depend upon it, sir, if this baleful system of distribution be not nipped in the bud, it will betray the people into submission by a species of taxation which no nation on earth should endure.

Mr. Speaker: I will not wantonly impugn any man's motives, nor will I seek to wound any man's sensibility, but I must be permitted to speak plainly and with candor, and I trust that no one will deem me discourteous if I frankly remark, that the conduct of certain southern gentlemen, in relation to this subject, has been, to say the least of it, equivocal, and has almost tempted me to doubt the evidence of my own senses. Are they sincere and disinterested? It is not my province to doubt them; but let me say, sir, that they appear to demonstrate by their acts a degree of insincerity, if their former professions can be relied on; for though once loudly clamorous against the tariff, they are now found engaged, by means not decidedly indirect, opposing any measure that has a tendency to reduce taxation. They assail the land bill, because it would reduce the tariff some $15 or 20,000,000, and show most clearly and conclusively, by their votes, that they will not go for those measures of reduction for which the south has so long contended. Their only object now appears to be the creation of a redundant treasury, for the miserable purpose of distribution.

Mr. Speaker: this scheme of accumulation and distribution presents to the world a spectacle equally to be deplored and ridiculed. To combat it with argument would be to waste the time of the House and the country in discussing an absurdity. The whole system is not only wrong, but it is contemptible.

What is it sir? Ay, sir, what is it? It is a scheme to tax the south and west, to protect the manufactures of the north—of New England—that section of the country which is now engaged in generating agitation and strife, for the openly avowed purpose of sapping the institutions of every State south and west of the Potomac, and rendering them mere colonial dependencies, the servile hacks and serfs of New England. It is a scheme to tax you and me sir, and the Sergeant-at-arms, if you please, by the way of analogy, for the purpose of putting into our pockets ten cents out of every dollar that the hand of oppression took out of our pockets. The scheme sir, to say nothing of its injustice, is contemptible; it is unworthy of the enlightened age in which we live, it sets all the principles of political economy at defiance, laughs Adam Smith, Say, Ricardo and Bentham to scorn; and where, let me ask, was the world ever before regaled with the spectacle of a people's taxing themselves to the tune of millions for the purpose of paying the surplusage back again, at a discount of ninety per centum; taking from the citizen a dollar, for the purpose of giving him ten cents! But sir, I will not discuss a proposition so monstrous.

Mr. Speaker: I appeal to gentlemen to say if they are prepared to oppose a proposition to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, by reducing the tariff on imports, or by the passage of a land bill, if they were certain that the surplus was to remain in the Treasury? I am satisfied that no gentleman would vote for a system which would tend to fill the Treasury, without a certainty of their receiving a portion of the plunder; and yet we find those very men, by their votes, filling your public coffers so as to enable them to receive their portion of the spoils.

Sir, continued Mr. Y. I enter my protest against a system of bargain and corruption, which is to be executed by parties of different political complexions, for the purpose of dividing the spoils which they have plundered from the people. If the sales of the public lands are to be continued for the benefit of the speculators who go to the West in multitudes for the purpose of legally stealing the lands and improvements of the people of the new States, I hope my constituents may know who it is that thus imposes upon them a system of legalized fraud and oppression. If, sir, my constituents are to be sacrificed by the maintenance of a system of persecution, got up and carried on for the purpose of filling the pockets of others to their ruin, I wish them to know who is the author of the enormity. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, and that hope has not yet been abandoned, that if ever this branch of the Government is bent on the destruction of the rights of the people, and a violation of the Constitution, there is yet one ordeal for it to pass where it may be shorn of its baneful aspect. And, Mr. Speaker, I trust in God that, in its passage through that ordeal, it will find a quietus.

Mr. Speaker, I was perfectly astonished to see such a proposition as the one before us, emanating from the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann;) and, sir, I would like to know if it is to be considered a “premonitory symptom” of the coming administration. If it is to be considered in such a light, I, for one, wish to know it, though a warm supporter of the President-elect; for if it be his policy to plunder one portion of the country to fill the pockets of the other, I shall withdraw my support from that distinguished man; but where I should go, sir, would be a matter of doubt and uncertainty. Sir, I hope that Mr. Van Buren contemplates no such policy, and the gentleman from New York, in starting this monstrous measure, has, I hope, acted on his individual responsibility. But if this scheme should succeed, Mr. Speaker, my constituents are to be sold to the manufacturers of the north; they are to be plundered of half they are worth by this unholy scheme or combination; and when I contemplated these facts, I am astonished to see the proposition of the gentleman from New York, which proposes to take two-thirds of the spoils, which the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Bell) would give them, and divide it among the large States.

Mr. Speaker: before I resume my seat, let me say that if a firm effort had been made to reduce the tariff to the wants of the Government, and it had failed, if the land bill now on your table had been taken up and negatived, and all attempts to get rid of a redundant treasury had proved unavailing, in that event I should not have interposed an objection to a distribution, for the best of reasons. It would then have been the duty of the National Legislature to distribute or loan to the States such surplusage as might be on hand, after defraying all the expenses of the Government. Then, sir, in such an event, I should not have hesitated to vote for the distribution, because I should consider the money more safe in the hands of the people than in any Government bank, subjected to the temptations of the speculator, and to frauds and failures. But, sir, if this distribution must take place, if the people must “touch the coin, though it do blast them,” I hope that something like honor will be manifested in the manner of disposal; and, let me add, sir, if the plunder must come to us, I hope that my constituents, unlike him of old, who accepted the thirty pieces of silver, may be accused, not indeed of betraying the Saviour of mankind, or of betraying their country, a kindred enormity, but of having been forced to participate in a revel among the spoils of the people, contrary to their own wishes, better opinions, and sounder judgment.

I have deemed myself called upon to say thus much on this subject. I entertain no fears for the issue. I represent the wishes and opinions of the people of Arkansas; a people, sir, who, though they have just sprung into political existence, are too pure to be corrupted by your gold, too enlightened to be deceived, too brave to shrink from danger, and too patriotic, too noble, and too independent to be sold like sheep in shambles. To them, sir, I hold myself responsible for all my public acts; and I have studied them to little purpose, if my conduct on this occasion does not meet their approbation.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

REMARKS OF MR. BOON, OF INDIANA.

In the House of Representatives, Feb. 25, 1837—On the motion of Mr. MANN of New York, to amend the motion of Mr. BELL of Tennessee to amend the fortification bill, by inserting a clause to provide for the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States on the scale of federal representation.

Mr. BOON said that, if the proposition then under consideration, to distribute any portion of the surplus revenue among the States, that may be in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1838, should become a law, he sincerely hoped that the amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann,) would be rejected by the House. Sir, (said Mr. B.) a more unjust proposition, toward the new States, could not have entered into the mind of man than the one proposed by the honorable member from New York; and, more especially, the State which Mr. B. had the honor, in part, to represent on the floor of Congress. Sir, (said Mr. B.) if a distribution of the surplus revenue (if any there be) shall be made upon the basis of representation in the House of Representatives, manifest injustice would be done to all the new States.

Under the census of 1830, the State of Indiana is entitled to seven representatives upon this floor; whereas, at this time, from the increase of population since the year 1830, Indiana would be entitled to at least twelve, if not thirteen, representatives in Congress, under the present ratio of representation among the several States; whereas, in most of the old States, the increase of population, since the year 1830, has not been such as to increase the number of their representatives in Congress under the present ratio, apportioning the number of representatives in Congress among the several States of the Union. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask if, under this view of the subject, manifest injustice would not be done to the new States, should the amendment offered by the gentlemen from New York be adopted by the House?

Mr. B. said that he had voted for the distribution bill of the last session of Congress, and he had just voted for the same principle by way of amendment to the bill now under consideration; but he would take the opportunity then afforded him to say that, in both instances, he regretted most sincerely that circumstances should have compelled him to vote for or against the measure. Mr. B. said that he had on all proper occasions opposed the policy of taxing the people for the purpose of raising a surplus revenue, to be distributed among the several States, as such a system would be to tax the many for the benefit of the few. Gentlemen might endeavor to make the system popular, by pretending to return to the dear people that which they have been instrumental in wresting from the pockets of the people, by an unholy system of taxation not demanded by the wants of the Government.

Mr. B. said that he had not yet given up to despair. He yet felt encouragement in the firm conviction, that the day was not far distant when the freemen of this country would indignantly throw off the shackles that have already too long enslaved them, and would not longer be humbugged by false pretences of having returned to them the money which has been wrested from their pockets by a system of over taxing the many for the benefit of the few. The people are now told by a certain class of politicians, that there is remaining in the Treasury a considerable amount of money over and above the wants of the Government, which ought to be returned to and distributed among the dear people of the several States. And how, I ask, is it to be effected with advantage to the great body of the tax paying community? Why, sir, after an odious and unjust system of taxation has been fastened and riveted upon the people, by which a large surplus revenue is produced, and after deducting about twenty-five per cent. for collecting the same, it is then most graciously proposed to distribute the remainder thereof among the several States, in order that it may again return to the dear people, whose interest and future welfare are always so near the heart of the political demagogue.

The tax paying people of this country first earn the money that pays their taxes under the authority of law, by the sweat of their brow, and by the sweat of their brow, they will have to re-earn their respective portions of the surplus revenue when it shall have been deposited in the State Treasuries. The true question to be decided by the people of this country is, shall there be a new and novel policy introduced in this Government, which has for its object the raising of a surplus revenue for distribution among the States? or shall the taxes of the people be reduced to the legitimate wants of the Government? This is the only true issue to be made before the people; and to this question the public mind should be particularly drawn by all those who stand opposed to monopolies, and all privileged orders of every character whatever.

The people will be fully satisfied in a short time, that the depositing of the surplus revenue in the several State Treasuries, will not have the effect of again returning to the people their respective portions of the money that has been unnecessarily and unrighteously drawn from their pockets by an unjust system of taxation by the General Government. Mr. B. said, that in looking into this subject of creating a surplus revenue to be distributed among the States, he could view it in no other light than having a direct tendency to destroy the independence of the State Governments; and if possible to do so, to corrupt the people themselves with their own money. The question of every wise legislator in Congress should be as to the best mode of reducing the taxes already imposed on the people so as to raise a sufficient amount only of revenue to supply the legitimate wants of the General Government, and not as to what shall be done with the surplus revenue. Reduce the burdens of taxation now imposed upon the people, to the wants of the Government, and leave the surplus where it should be, in the pockets of its rightful owners.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

REMARKS OF MR. HAMER, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, February 28, 1837—

On the amendment to the appropriation bill providing for the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent to Texas.

Mr. HAMER said, that he hoped no one would suppose that he rose at this late period of the session, to debate this question. But as he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which reported the resolutions in favor of the independence of Texas, and had supported those resolutions in the committee, and as no formal report, showing the condition of Texas, had accompanied the resolutions, he claimed the privilege of expressing, in a few words, the reasons for his course in relation to this matter.

He had heard several reasons urged here against recognition, which he thought were not entitled to much consideration from the House. Some gentlemen seemed to think that if we recognised Texas, as an independent Republic, her annexation to the United States must necessarily follow. This was not so. They were separate and distinct questions. The subject of annexation might never come before Congress; but if it should, at any future period, come up, it would be time enough to discuss it, and make a decision, when it should be presented. It ought not to be considered now. Let each of these questions stand or fall upon its own merits.

It had been said, that we ought not to act in this affair, but leave it entirely to the Executive. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens,) had answered that argument. The Executive had referred it to us for the expression of an opinion on our part. He did not choose to act without some such expression. Why then should we send it back to him without action on the part of Congress? Let us give an intimation of our wishes upon the subject, which will respond to the call of the President, and serve as a guide to his proceedings in future.

Gentlemen had said that the Texan army and navy were small in numbers and force, and that the population of the country was less than a hundred thousand; and for these reasons their independence ought not to be acknowledged. As to population, there was no limit in the law of nations. No writer had said how many persons it required to constitute an independent nation. It was a matter for the exercise of our discretion, without any positive law or rule to control us. We could as well recognise fifty thousand as fifty millions; and he would not dwell upon that position.

In regard to the navy, however small it might be, it was large enough to command the seas, and to drive the Mexican navy into port; blockading the harbors of Mexico and destroying her commerce. If Texas could thus overpower her enemy on the water, her navy was large enough, until that of her adversary should be augmented.

How was it upon the land? Her army had conquered all the forces sent against her. She had triumphed over a selected army, organized for the express purpose of reducing her to subjection; had made a prisoner of the Chief Magistrate of Mexico, who headed the invading forces in person, and had been ever since in the full enjoyment of national independence. Her army was therefore large enough to maintain her independence, and there could be no necessity for its increase under existing circumstances. It was not the absolute amount of force we were to consider, but the relative force. We must look at the power of her enemy. In that point of view, we should perceive that her resources and means were ample; that she was stronger than Mexico, and had, at that moment, undisturbed and undisputed control of both land and sea.

But there was another and more weighty consideration still, which demanded the attention of the House and of the country. At the last session of Congress we had passed a resolution, almost unanimously, declaring that the independence of Texas ought to be recognised whenever the citizens of that country should have an organized Government in full operation. Now, why should we go behind this resolution, and inquire into all the circumstances of the revolution, the condition of the country, and the character of the people? These subjects had been examined last year, and we had decided upon them. The House then put the recognition upon a single fact, to be ascertained thereafter. We had given to them, and to the world, a pledge that whenever they should satisfy us they had a Government, we would recognise them as an independent nation. We had encouraged them to put such a Government in motion, and to present us the evidence of its existence. They had done so. Did any gentleman doubt their having such a Government? Was not the Constitution copied, in a great measure, from our own? and their public functionaries all engaged in the successful discharge of their respective duties under that Constitution? Did we mean to keep the public faith inviolate? Should we redeem our pledge, which had been solemnly given? Texas had performed the condition. She presented us the proof of her having done so, and asked the fulfilment of our promise. It was for this Government now to say whether it should be faithfully and honorably fulfilled, or not.

Another objection, and a most singular one, was that a majority of the people of Texas were originally from the United States; that they were our former neighbors and friends, and some of them our kinsmen. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Huntsman,) in one of the best speeches he had ever heard upon that floor, had explained fully the manner in which these people had become citizens of Texas. They were invited there by the Mexican Government, at a time when all their rights and privileges were guaranteed by the Mexican Constitution, upon nearly the same terms as they were in the United States. They had purchased lands, and made the country their home; and it was only when an attempt had been made to wrest from them their liberties, that they took up arms.

After securing their independence, organizing a Republican Government, and putting it into successful operation; after a pledge given last year, by our Government, that they should be recognised, whenever this was done and shown to exist, they are now to be told that we cannot recognise them, because they were once our neighbors and friends! If they were of some other race of men; if they were Spaniards, or Frenchmen, or Turks, or of any other race, than Anglo-Americans, they would be entitled to recognition! Is this fair, or reasonable, or generous? Should we deal more kindly by a stranger, than by our own flesh and blood? No. If gentlemen were prepared to act upon that principle, let each one take the responsibility for himself; but for his part, he would go for his friends, in preference to either strangers or enemies.

The people of Texas, he said, were entitled to a recognition of their independence; and, so far as his vote would go, they should have that recognition, promptly and freely given.

REMARKS OF MR. BOULDIN, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, March 1, 1837.—The "bill to designate and limit the funds receivable for the revenue of the United States," being under consideration—

Mr. BOULDIN merely rose to say that he should vote on the various bills, propositions, and amendments relating to the currency, and money in which the public dues were collected, as it might seem best, or rather least mischievous. By these votes he did not wish to be understood to mean that any remedy could be found for the evil proposed to be cured or affected—pretended to be designed by these measures to be cured. He meant the evil arising out of having in, or passing through, the Treasury of the United States such vast sums of money as are, and have been, and probably will be for some time.

The evil (he said) consisted in having the money. The sore evil of the gathering this money has been felt by all in the South—the selling of a man's property for half its worth, to raise money that is not wanting. The same has been felt by all in the North, except a few rich monopolists; but the eyes of the people had been blinded by these monopolists, who have felt the benefit of the collecting of it. A few rich owners of stock in the manufactories are the only persons benefited by the collection, except the officers through whose hands the money is to pass, and those who have received the ill-gotten gains by favor of those officers.

Now, sir, said Mr. B. who is to be injured by the fact that we have these sums? All, all, sir—There is no general rule without an exception, however—except those same stockholders in manufactories, and the same officers in whose hands the money is remaining, or through which it is passing, and those whose ill-gotten gains have made them feel the advantage of large sums of money—so large in the hands of men who have the power to distribute it, and have their own ways and means and benefits in the choice of those hands into which it is to fall.

It was said that some charged that it had been urged that people might be corrupted by their own money. No such belief had been entertained or suggested by him. Sir, the people got none of it back. It corrupted the agents of the people; not the people themselves. It corrupted those into whose hands such large sums were gathered; not those out of whose hands those sums were taken, never again to be returned.

Some, he observed, said that a continued distribution was a high tariff measure. Mr. B. knew it was. Some urged one distribution would be an example for another. Mr. B. knew it would, and that consideration brought him to a stand on the engrossment of the deposit bill last session.

Some said we would then reduce the tariff, (a the last session,) but there was not time then. Mr. B. waited to see. Had his doubts. At the commencement of this session, his colleague (Mr. Mercer) moved to introduce a resolution to relinquish all claim to the money deposited with the States. Mr. B. voted to lay it on the table; not that he doubted his right and duty to return to the people any money, or any part of any money, that we, or any body, had unjustly or illegally taken from them.

Still waiting and hoping to see the revenue taken down to the wants of the Government, or some serious and efficient means and steps taken to bring it to that point, it is now within a day or two only of the close of the session, and the rules, perhaps, would not allow of the introduction of a new bill, and passing it. He had taken an oath to support the Constitution, not the rules of the House, and would gladly see any bill introduced, or brought forward, which was likely to bring the revenue down to the wants of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, how is this to be done? By drying up the fountains only—no other way. What are they? Imposts and sales of public lands. He would cast off either, or half of either, or both of them, and be in debt sooner than endure this state of things. Why not cut down the tariff? It will kill the monopolists. Why not stop sales of public lands? It will produce some inconvenience to the settlers. Why not remedy this, by giving preemption before instead of after settlement, and sell when you want the money; and it will do no harm to any body, giving the settlers the benefit of their improvements. It will kill the speculators in public lands. Sir, if the present system is to go on, it will kill us all.

As to the bill from the Senate, it will stop but little of the accumulation. We are told that there will be no surplus. We were told last year there would be none—a slight mistake of thirty-seven and a half millions—(some one said forty-two;) Mr. B. said, perhaps! some trifles! Such a mistake might happen again! He was pleased that it then occurred to him to do (what he had hardly ever thought to do in any speech of his) justice to a meritorious officer. He was sure that the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Woodbury) was as honest, able, industrious and courteous an officer as he ever saw. Some one remarked that he had made a mistake of thirty-seven millions. Mr. B. said that might be true; a great many had, besides him, if he did. He made a great mistake, and was an honest man. He might make it again; and a worse man might make a worse mistake. He might overlook the propriety of paying it over or putting it into safe places of deposit. Mr. Woodbury had kept safe—lost none—paid over, so far as it appears yet.

Suppose this mistake is made again? He was told, he said, by some that if it did, there must be no provision made to divide—that tended to tariff and consolidation. Mr. B. knew it. But what's to be done with it? Let it stay, is the only answer. What is the consequence of that? Corruption of the officers, and all the fountains of truth and justice is the answer. But (said Mr. B.) some proposed to appropriate money enough to cover it. Certainly you can appropriate money enough to cover any sum. But will that remedy the evil? Will not the money laid out and passing through the hands of the officers corrupt as much as any thing? And is not this the very evil we wish to cure?

When evils of this magnitude are before us, can we be in earnest in saying we will remedy them, when we are spending weeks and months and years upon vain disputes and trifles and descantations upon the relative merits and demerits of particular men, in or out of office seeking to get in?

If we wish to reduce the revenue, the means are simple and the way is plain; and the time is ample now, and has been more ample than it is now, and has been wasted, and why do we not do it? There can be but one answer. We do not wish to do it.

Well sir, (he said) if we will not, he would send as much of it back to his own State and people as he could. This disturbs the constitutional sensibilities of some gentlemen desperately. Where are their constitutional difficulties when they are raising and holding it against all right and all Constitution?

He said he did not mean to advocate distribution, tariff, breach of Constitution, consolidation; nothing like it. All this thing is done. The money has been raised almost at the point of the bayonet, or rather the sums that paid off our debts, and left this balance under protecting duties, against which he had labored all he could, and all in vain. What should be done with them? He knew they corrupted the people's agents in the States as well as here. Those agents are neither better nor worse than they are here. This is the reason that we cannot find out and agree upon what shall be done with the money. They that have it there, as well as they that have it here, do not wish to part with it.

We can reduce the amount by stopping the sales of the land—but we will not. We can bring it down by giving the lands away to the States and Territories—but we will not. I think either preferable to this state of things. As to the idea that we shall sell the lands to the people for less money than we can get for them, it is preposterous in the statement. Would we do so with our own lands? Certainly not. Why then do so with the public property?

If we give any, let us say so, and tell to whom we give it. If we sell, let us sell like we sell our own property. When we give, if we have any right to give, let us tell the people to whom we give it.

He had no idea (he said) that there was any prospect whatever of reducing the income, and had, at the same time, no belief that, while these vast sums were collected and kept either in the State or United States Treasury, the currency could be kept steady. There was but one way to keep that steady. Let every man mind his own business, take care of his own money, and pay his own debts, and that promptly, in any money that his creditors will take, as soon as they fall due; and let the Government do the same, and take care to collect no more than it needs, and spend no more than is necessary, and I will warrant the currency to be kept steady. The Government and its officers, having under their control these vast sums, can unsettle the currency, and they will do it, whoever may be at the head; and neither act nor proviso, nor the great central controlling money power, (the Bank of the United States,) can prevent it. All such things serve rather to shield the officer than to expose him to responsibility. If, then, I vote for any of these bills, or provisos to them, I wish now to notify the House, and particularly my constituents, that I have little faith in any measure in regard to regulating the currency, or providing a better, or any thing else that is good in public matters, until the revenues of the Government are greatly reduced, and these vast sums already accumulated, and held directly or indirectly, it is immaterial which, under the control of the officers of the Government, either State or Federal be returned to the people, or actually spent.

REMARKS OF MR. JOHNSON, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, Feb. 26, 1837.—On the following amendment submitted by him to the civil and diplomatic bill:

"And be it further enacted, That four hundred thousand acres of land shall be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to satisfy military bounty land warrants, issued or to be issued, by the State of Virginia, and by the United States, or either of them, on account of services in the revolutionary war, to include warrants not heretofore satisfied in full; which scrip shall be received, at the several land offices of the United States, in the manner and for the purposes provided in the laws heretofore passed authorizing the issuing of certificates of scrip in satisfaction of warrants for similar services."

MR. SPEAKER: I regret the existence of a state of things which would seem to call upon me to tax the time and the patience of this House, while I attempt, in a very few remarks, to assign some of the reasons which have influenced me in offering the amendment which is now pending. Before I proceed further, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee on the Public Lands, composed as it is of some of the most experienced and vigilant members of this House, after having given to the subject that calm deliberation which its importance demands, have reported a bill which is now in progress in this House, appropriating 500,000 acres of land to satisfy the various claims yet due to officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, and upon continental establishment. Entertaining a belief that from the quantum of business before us, that bill cannot be reached during the present session, and feeling the great injustice that will be done to the holders of those warrants by further delay, I have been induced to move the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: In urging this subject on the attention of Congress at this time, let it be distinctly understood that we come not here to solicit a boon from your generosity; we come not here to moot a new and doubtful question; but we come with unshaken confidence, and ask you in strict justice to discharge in good faith those obligations which, from a sense of justice, you have voluntarily assumed and bound the Government to pay. What is it that Virginia asks at your hands? is it to indemnify her for the blood and treasure so lavishly poured out and expended upon the altar of liberty during the revolutionary struggle. No, sir: these were generously and patriotically made in common with her sister States, the blessings and benefits of which continue to be enjoyed by all, and which are above all price. Sir, she comes, and with becoming deference, asks you to discharge a debt adjudicated, defined, and settled, so far as principal is concerned, and for the payment of which she holds you bound, duly executed and acknowledged by the various departments of this Government. I would say, with due deference to the opinion of the gentleman opposed to this amendment, that his effort to prove that the claim ought not to be paid is made too late—the day has gone by—the Government has generously and magnanimously assumed the debt, and the only question which remains for this House to decide is, has she discharged in good faith the whole amount of the debt which she has agreed and bound herself to pay? Sir, if I can keep the attention of this House, I think I can demonstrate that she has not—that a portion of this debt remains unpaid, that it is now due, and that every consideration of justice and patriotism calls upon us to discharge it, and to discharge it now.

Mr. Speaker: It is said by gentlemen opposed to this bill, that the claims set up by Virginia has been settled to an amount far beyond that which was anticipated, and therefore it ought not to be paid. Sir, has not the list of pensioners under the several pension acts, swelled far above the estimate made by the best calculators, and based, too, upon the best data which the times afford. As well might gentlemen contend that for that reason alone the laws should immediately cease to operate, and that the small pittance allowed to the war-worn soldier should be withheld, and that the remnant of that veteran band should be doomed to pass over the short but rugged path which remains between him and the grave in penury and want.

But, sir, I deny that the claim has been thus settled above the estimate made by a board of commissioners, who assembled to adjust and settle the claims of the respective States with the United States, as early as the year 1793. By reference to estimates there exhibited, it will be found that there were in the service of Virginia no less than twenty-one regiments, viz: sixteen on continental establishment, three of the State line proper, and two called the western regiments; besides those engaged in the navy, which amounted to some twenty or twenty-five vessels. Computing the number at 500 to each regiment, which is believed to be below the proper estimate, and the number of persons entitled to land bounty, would be found to exceed 11,000, all of whom were entitled, under the various laws of Virginia, passed previous to the passage of the act of 1781, which ceded to the United States the Northwest territory. I will not detain the House by referring to the several acts of Virginia relating to bounty lands, further than to remark, that upon a reference to them, it will clearly appear that there was a most solemn engagement on the part of the States to remunerate her officers and soldiers, as also her seamen, in lands, of which she possessed an abundance. From the peculiar and exposed situation which Virginia occupied during that arduous and eventful struggle, she was imperiously called upon to put in requisition all her means to meet the impending danger. She not only promptly furnished her quota of men and money on continental establishment, as is well attested by her brilliant victories, attained in different and distant parts of this Union; but, in order to guard her distant limits of her own territory, she pushed her victories into the far west, thereby extending her frontier to an immeasurable distance, which could only be defended by a large military force. What, I would ask, were her pecuniary means? Without commerce or fiscal resources, without money or credit—for, like the debtor whose pecuniary embarrassments render him desperate, she had approached the verge of bankruptcy, and involved herself almost beyond the hope of redemption. What were her means for sustaining the contest? I answer it was her vast western domain; and in the very nature of things, it was well understood, by the State and the soldier, that the fulfilment of the promised reward depended entirely on the successful termination of the contest; and hence it became necessary to promise a liberal reward in western lands, in order to fill her ranks, and to induce her soldiers to persevere in a contest, which, to say the least, was of doubtful issue.

I have said that Virginia had in the service twenty-one regiments, consisting of 500 each, which, added to her marine and naval force, amounted to at least 11,000 men, to whom she promised bounty lands; and to prove this, I beg leave to send to the Clerk's table a statement from General Porterfield, and the corroborating statement from the late Chief Justice Marshall, which statements were made as early as 1793, by those distinguished individuals, whose important services, and intimate knowledge of all that appertained to the movements of the whole country, but more particularly of Virginia, place their statements beyond the hazard of contradiction:

"Taking into consideration the number of officers and soldiers who died in the service, and thereby became entitled to land bounty from Virginia, the number who served three years, and thereby became entitled, and the number who were entitled for services to the end of the war, I think it probable there were a thousand to each regiment who were so entitled; but I state the opinion with confidence that there were at least five hundred.

(Signed) ROBERT PORTERFIELD.
16th Sept. 1832.

Teste: THOMAS GREEN.

I should not think there were a thousand to each regiment entitled to land bounty; but the number cannot, I think, have been short of five hundred—I allude to the regiments actually raised in the Virginia line on continental establishment.

J. MARSHALL.

December 8th, 1834."

Then, sir, taking this proposition as granted, and I think it will not be contested even by the gentleman from New Jersey, and how does the account stand? From a statement which I hold in my hand, it appears, that on the 16th of December, 1834, the number of warrants issued was 6,146; and that subsequent to that, and up to the present time, the additional number is 690, which together makes 6,836; which deducted from 11,000 leaves a balance of 4,354 warrants due to Virginia from the United States; which, admitting them all to be due to private soldiers, at 200 acres each, would require an appropriation of 870,800 acres to cover the claim of Virginia alone; and if we add to this the fact, that many of those claimants were officers, and entitled to a much larger quantity than is the soldier of the line, and the further fact of the deficiency of 10 per centum deducted from claimants under a former appropriation which alone amounts to about 74,000 acres, and it will be found that there remains due to the State of Virginia alone a much larger quantity of land than is generally believed, that the amount now proposed, will that proposed in the amendment which I have offered. But, Sir, assuming the ground that a large number never can be established at this late day, and that others never will be claimed, it is confident sufficient to cover all the claims for bounty lands growing out of the revolutionary war.

But it is said, that the claimants have failed to prosecute their claims in due time; that having deferred their prosecution for half a century, it is prima facie evidence that they are not well founded. To this I answer, that the claimants are not in fault, but that they have been tied down and deprived of their rights during that protracted period by the action of the Government, and have never ceased to urge their claims, at all times, when a ray of hope was presented. As early as 1784, an attempt was made to survey the lands in the military district in Kentucky; but, Sir, they found them in possession of the Indians by whom they were claimed. Upon representing those facts to the Governor of Virginia, he issued his proclamation in the following year, by which he suspended the surveys and thereby prevented the officers and soldiers from taking possession of their land—their promised reward, and with which they would have been entirely satisfied. What next, Sir? At the treaty of Hopewell, made in 1786, the whole of the country below the Tennessee river was guaranteed to the Indians; the provisions of which treaty continued in force until the year 1818, when the Indian title was extinguished; after which, we all know, Kentucky would not permit the soldier to locate his warrant. Sir, the above facts are abundantly sustained by documentary evidence, and go to prove, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that their claims have been deferred by the action of the Government, over which the claimants had no control, from the year 1784 to 1818; had it been otherwise, the claimants and their heirs would not have been supplicating at your feet at this late period. It is true, that a number of those claims have been located upon the northwestern reserve; but it is equally true, that the good lands in the reserve between the Miami and the Scioto rivers, were very soon exhausted, and the remnants of poor lands which remained estimated at from 5 to 25 cents per acre, was indeed no compensation at all, and not equal to the expense of procuring the title papers. Various other reasons exist which account for the delay, amongst which I will enumerate only one or two: the first is, that many of the officers and soldiers either died in the service or were slain in battle; their heirs were minors, and many of them settled in the western wilds, remote from the seat of Government, and with little means of information, they did not know that they were entitled. Others more fortunately situated, and better informed, did not deem it worth their attention; while another class, who attempted to prosecute these claims, were unable to establish them in consequence of the loss of the rolls and documentary evidence, which had been, unfortunately, mislaid, and was not recovered until 1832. This document contained much useful information, supplied a vacuum in the testimony, and once more revived the long deferred hopes of the war-worn soldier. But, says the gentleman from New Jersey, who stepped aside the other day from a very earnest argument on a private claim, to give us a learned disquisition upon the land laws of Virginia, the reservation made by Virginia, in her deed of cession, applied only to those regiments engaged in the conquest of the British posts of Kaskaskias and St. Vincent, and to her troops upon continental establishment. Sir, although I admit the words upon her own State establishment, have been omitted in the deed of cession, yet it is clearly proved, by Wm. H. Herrington and others, that these words were omitted by a clerical error in copying the original resolution passed by the Legislature of Virginia on the 2d January, 1781; which resolution contains the words, upon her own State establishment, and which I ask the Clerk to read:

"That in case the quantity of the good lands of the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of the Cumberland river, and between the Green river and the Tennessee river, which have been reserved by the law for the Virginia troops upon the continental establishment and upon their own State establishment, should (from the North Carolina line bearing in further upon the Cumberland lands, those was accepted) prove insufficient for their legal bounties, the deficiency shall be made up to the said troops in good lands, to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and Little Miamis on the north-west side of the Ohio river, in such proportions as have been engaged to them by the laws of Virginia."

Thus, sir, it is shown, most obviously, that Virginia intended to make ample provision for all her troops; and although the fastidious economist may tax his ingenuity to husband a dollar, and the technical lawyer, by his special pleading and forensic eloquence, may attempt to induce the House to avail itself of advantages growing out of a limited and narrow construction, or clerical errors, yet I cannot believe that those efforts can be made available when addressed to the Congress of the United States. Sir, will any gentleman believe, who has made himself acquainted with the policy pursued by Virginia in regard to her troops, the liberal course of legislation, and the fatherly care with which she watched over their interest, that she should in a moment, as it were, have forgotten all the sacred pledges made to her soldiers, and that, too, when about to divest herself of all her vast and incalculable means? Sir, she did not design to do it, and the records of the day prove it. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose, if you please, that I am wrong in this position, and that Virginia, in her great anxiety to promote the general interest, at a period of doubtful issue and awful hazard, when our lacerated country was bleeding at every pore, suppose, I say, that she did omit to make provision for her soldiers on State establishment, is this the time to urge those quibbles? Has not Congress long since adjudicated and settled that question, by a payment of all but a remnant of the claim, and that, too, at a time when our Treasury was embarrassed and our country in debt? Are we now to be told, at the time when the country is prosperous beyond all example, with our Treasury overflowing by the proceeds of those very lands, which were generously surrendered by Virginia as a sacrifice upon the altar of her country, are we now to be told that the whole course of legislation on this subject has been wrong; that the pledged faith of the nation is to be forfeited; the claims of Virginia rejected, and the last hope of her soldiers annihilated? If so, we have indeed fallen upon unpropitious times. Sir, it was the army of Virginia, commanded by General Clark, that secured to us the western country, by the capture of the British posts of Kaskaskia and St. Vincent, the way was opened which led to the far west, to that country, the territories of which extend from the Alleghanies to Oregon, and from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico—a country combining advantages of soil, climate, mineral wealth and commercial facilities, unequalled by any known to civilized man. The proceeds arising from the sales of which have already swelled the amount in your Treasury to an extent, which, according to the theory of some gentlemen, endangers the very existence of our political system. Sir, I repeat that this country was conquered, inch by inch, by the Virginia troops, a remnant of whom still linger on the brink of the grave, and ask you to attend to their long deferred claims. I will only add, in conclusion, that if aught is done for them, it should be done quickly; the ravaging hand of time waits not upon the tardy movements of this Legislature. Almost every newspaper received, announces the fall of some one of these old veterans, and every such announcement is but the record of a nation's ingratitude; while we are engaged in a mercenary scramble for the surplus revenue, and a dividend of the public lands, we permit the war-worn veteran, at the expense of whose blood the treasure was acquired, to pass down to the grave unwept, unhonored, and unsung. Sir, could the traditions of those days be developed, could the story be now told, we would hear of scenes of thrilling interest and disinterested chivalry, which would place in the shade many of those acts of heroism on the part of our country, at the recital of which, every bosom is warmed with pride for our country, and gratitude for our soldiers.

FUNDS RECEIVABLE FOR PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF MR. WALKER, OF MISSISSIPPI.

In Senate, January 28, 1837—On the bill reported by him from the Committee on Public Lands, "limiting and designating the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States."

Mr. WALKER said, before replying to the indictment preferred by the honorable Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) against the Committee on Public Lands, it is proper to recur to the facts and circumstances under which this controversy originated. At an early period of the session, the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing,) introduced a resolution to rescind the Treasury order. This resolution was very fully discussed, and especially by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) but Mr. W. had taken no part in this discussion.

In the progress of the debate upon the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, a substitute was offered, as an amendment, by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives.) This substitute was advocated by that Senator, as in consonance with the President's recommendation, to render the legislation of Congress in the collection of the federal revenue, auxiliary to the suppression of all notes of a smaller denomination than twenty dollars, and a consequent enlargement of the circulation of gold and silver. The Senator from Virginia had regarded the Treasury order as a temporary measure, to meet a pressing emergency, and as having in a great degree performed its office.

Mr. W. had still refrained from embarking in the discussion upon this question. Several Senators, however, had expressed their opinions, and great difficulties appeared to be presented against any satisfactory adjustment of this question. Under these circumstances, several Senators now within the sound of his voice, had proposed to him (Mr. W.) to refer both resolutions to the Committee on Public Lands. To this reference, Mr. W. said, he had at first objected, upon the grounds that the Committee on Public Lands was engaged in the laborious examination of another question, and that the subject of designating the funds receivable for the public dues, belonged more appropriately to the Committee on Finance. Upon further consultation, however, with several Senators friendly to the administration, Mr. W. had at length reluctantly assented to the proposed reference, which was accordingly made by the vote of the Senate, including that of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton.) No other report than that which was made, so far as Mr. W. was concerned, could have been anticipated; for to every Senator with whom Mr. W. had conversed, he had expressed his concurrence in the provisions substantially of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives,) and at the last session, when the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) introduced a resolution requiring payments of the public lands in gold and silver only, the Senate would well recollect that he (Mr. W.) had then expressed his opposition to that resolution, and so had a majority of the Senators now composing the Committee on Public Lands. When, then, the Senator from Missouri voted for this reference, he could not justly have anticipated any other report than that which was made by the committee. When, then, did the Senator from Missouri vote for this reference, and then denounce the committee for making the only report which he could have expected, in conformity with their previously avowed opinions? Mr. W. said it became his duty, as chairman of this committee, and as their organ, to report a bill containing substantially the provisions of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia. Again the subject had been discussed in the Senate, but Mr. W. had not participated in the debate, and the bill, by a large majority, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and now, when by the usual rules of parliamentary debate, the contest might well be considered as terminated, the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) before the vote on the final passage, had made a very elaborate argument against the measure. To all this Mr. W. would make no objection; but when that Senator, having exhausted the argument, or having none to offer, had indulged in violent and intemperate denunciation of the Committee on Public Lands, and of the report made by him as their organ, Mr. W. could not withhold the expression of his surprise and astonishment. Mr. W. said it was his good fortune to be upon terms of the kindest personal intercourse with every Senator, and these friendly relations should not be interrupted by any aggression upon his part. And now, Mr. W. said, he called upon the whole Senate to bear witness, as he was sure they all cheerfully would, that in this controversy he was not the aggressor, and that nothing had been done or said by him to provoke the wrath of the Senator from Missouri, unless, indeed, to differ from him in opinion upon any subject, constituted an offence in the mind of that Senator. If such were the views of that gentleman, if he was prepared to immolate every Senator who would not worship the same images of gold and silver, which decorated the political chapel of the honorable gentleman, Mr. W. was fearful that the Senator from Missouri would do execution upon every member of the Senate but himself, and be left here alone in his glory. Mr. W. said he recurred to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri with feelings of regret, rather than of anger or excitement, and that he could not but hope, that when the Senator from Missouri had calmly reflected upon this subject, he would himself see much to regret in the course he had pursued in relation to the Committee upon Public Lands, and much to recall that he had uttered under feelings of temporary excitement. Sir, (said Mr. W.) being deeply solicitous to preserve unbroken the ranks of the democratic party in this body, participating with the people in grateful recollection of the distinguished services rendered by the Senator from Missouri to the democracy of the Union, he would pass by many of the remarks made by that Senator on this subject.

[Mr. BENTON here arose from his chair, and demanded, with much warmth, that Mr. WALKER should not pass by one of them. Mr. W. asked, What one? Mr. B. replied, in an angry tone, Not one, sir. Then Mr. W. said he would examine them all, and, in a spirit of perfect freedom, that he would endeavor to return blow for blow, and that, if the Senator from Missouri desired, as it appeared he did, an angry controversy with him, in all its consequences in and out of this House, he could be gratified.]

Sir, (said Mr. W.) why has the Senator from Missouri assailed the Committee on Public Lands, and himself, as its humble organ? He was not the author of this measure, so much denounced by the Senator from Missouri, nor had he said one word upon the subject. The measure originated with the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives.) He was the author of the measure, and had been, and still was, its able, zealous, and successful advocate. Why, then, had the Senator from Missouri assailed him, (Mr. W.) and permitted the author of the measure to escape unpunished? Sir, are the arrows which appear to be aimed by the Senator from Missouri at the humble organ of the Committee on Public Lands, who reported this bill, intended to inflict a wound in another quarter? Is one Senator the apparent object of assault, when another is designed as the real victim? Sir, when the Senator from Missouri, without any provocation, like a thunderbolt from an unclouded sky, broke upon the Senate in a perfect tempest of wrath and fury, bursting upon his poor head like a tropical tornado, did he intend to sweep before the avenging storm another individual more obnoxious to his censure?

Sir, (said Mr. W.) the Senator from Missouri has thrice repeated the prayer, "God save the country from the Committee on Public Lands;" but Mr. W. fully believed that if the prayer of the country could be heard within these walls, it would be, God save us from the wild, visionary, ruinous, and impracticable schemes of the Senator of Missouri, for exclusive gold and silver currency; and such is not only the prayer of the country, but of the Senate, with scarcely a dissenting voice. Sir, if the Senator from Missouri could, by his mandate, in direct opposition to the views of the President, heretofore expressed, sweep from existence all the banks of the States, and establish his exclusive constitutional currency of gold and silver, he would bring upon this country scenes of ruin and distress without a parallel—an immediate bankruptcy of nearly every debtor, and of almost every creditor to whom large amounts were due, a prodigious depreciation in the price of all property and all products, and an immediate cessation by States and individuals of nearly every work of private enterprise or public improvement. The country would be involved in one universal bankruptcy, and near the grave of the nation's prosperity, would perhaps repose, the scattered fragments of those great and glorious institutions which give happiness to millions here, and hopes to millions more of disenfranchisement from despotic power. Sir, in resistance to the power of the Bank of the United States, in opposition to the re-establishment of any similar institution, the Senator from Missouri would find Mr. W. with him; but he could not enlist as a recruit in this new crusade against the banks of his own, and every other State in the Union. These institutions, whether for good or evil, are created by the States, cherished and sustained by them, in many cases owned in whole or in part by the States, and closely united with their prosperity; and what right have we to destroy them? What right had he, an humble servant of the people of Mississippi, to say to his own, or any other State, your State legislation is wrong—your State institutions, your State banks, must be annihilated, and we will legislate here to effect this object? Are we the masters or servants of the sovereign States, that we dare speak to them in language like this—that we dare attempt to prostrate here those institutions which are created and maintained by those very States which we represent on this floor? These may be the opinions entertained by some Senators of their duty to the States they represent, but they were not his (Mr. W.'s) views or his opinions. He was sincerely desirous to co-operate with his State in limiting any dangerous powers of the banks, in enlarging the circulation of gold and silver, and in suppressing the small note currency, so as to avoid that explosion which was to be apprehended from excessive issues of bank paper. But a total annihilation of all the banks of his own State, now possessing a chartered capital of near forty millions of dollars, would, Mr. W. knew, produce almost universal bankruptcy, and was not, he believed, anticipated by any one of his constituents.

But the Senator from Missouri tells us, that this measure of the committee is a repeal of the Constitution, by authorizing the receipt of paper money in revenue payments. If so, then the Constitution never has had an existence; for the period cannot be designated when paper money was not so receivable by the Federal Government. This species of money was expressly made receivable for the public dues by an act of Congress, passed immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, and which remained in force until eighteen hundred and eleven. It was so received, as a matter of practice, from eighteen hundred and eleven until eighteen hundred and sixteen, when again, by an act of Congress then passed, and which has just expired, it it was so authorized to be received during all that period. Now, although these acts have expired, there is that which is equivalent to a law still in force, expressly authorizing the notes of the specie paying banks of the States to be received in revenue payments. It is the joint resolution of eighteen hundred and sixteen, adopted by both Houses of Congress, and approved by President Madison. That joint resolution is in these words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable, and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

Commenting upon this resolution, the Senator from Missouri in his speech of December last declared:

"This is the law, continued Mr. Benton, and nothing can be plainer than the right of selection which it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury."

"The words of the law are clear; the practice under it has been uniform and uninterrupted from the date of its passage to the present day. For twenty years, and under three Presidents, all the Secretaries of the Treasury have acted alike. Each has made selections, permitting the notes of some specie paying banks to be received, and forbidding others."

Here this joint resolution is admitted by the Senator from Missouri to be "the law," and that the practice under it has been uniform to receive the notes of specie paying banks. If then to authorize the reception of the notes of specie paying banks in payment of the public dues, be a violation of the Constitution, it is obvious, that the Constitution never has had any existence, except in the golden visions of the honorable Senator from Missouri. Sir what more is done by the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and now ordered to be engrossed by the Senate, than had been already accomplished by the joint resolution of eighteen hundred and sixteen? This bill as thus engrossed is as follows:

"AN ACT designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided: that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit: from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received on account of the public dues; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be so receivable; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no notes shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash: Provided, That, if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank in the ordinary course of business receives on general deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank."

Now the principal difference between the provisions of this bill and the joint resolution of 1816, consists in the exclusion by the bill of notes of small denominations from revenue payments. Yet the Senator from Missouri would leave the resolution of 1816 in full force, un repealed, unmodified, and yet objects to the measure now before us. The Senator from Missouri would have remain in force, a resolution of Congress, by which the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion receive for the public dues bank notes, even of one dollar, and yet he objects to a measure by which that discretion is limited to the receipt of notes of higher denominations. By the resolution, as it stands, the Secretary of the Treasury may collect the whole public revenue in bank paper; by the bill, as proposed, a portion of the public dues must be collected in gold and silver; and yet the Senator from Missouri objects, and denounces the measure as a repeal of the Constitution, by authorizing the payment of the public dues in bank paper, as if it were not authorized already by the joint resolution of 1816, which, as regards the customs, is untouched even by the Treasury order. Strange inconsistency! singular delusion! But has it come to this, that Congress has surrendered an unlimited discretion, as regards the funds receivable for the public dues, into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and must not now interfere? That, in the opinion of the Senator from Missouri, it is all right that the Secretary of the Treasury should possess the discretionary power of receiving or rejecting bank paper in payment of the public dues; of discriminating between different individuals and different branches of the public revenue; of putting up and putting down bank paper at his pleasure, but that for Congress to interpose and define or limit that discretion is a violation of the Constitution. That for the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the currency at his pleasure, and put up and put down State banks and their paper, is all right; but that for Congress to limit and define his power in these respects, is unconstitutional. The Secretary of the Treasury, then, must be above Congress, and above the Constitution, possessing an omnipotent, unchangeable, irreversible power on this subject. Is not the Senate astounded by the avowal and advocacy of such doctrines upon this floor—doctrines worthy of the Polignacs of France, and of the Stuarts of England, but wholly incompatible with the genius of our institutions, and directly contradictory, as shall be shown hereafter, to the opinions upon this subject of our patriot President. Are the American people prepared to sustain these doctrines—doctrines which are essentially monarchical, which take from Congress all power over this subject; which deny their authority, the authority of the representatives of the people and of the States, and erect the Secretary of the Treasury into a dictator, whose mandates we may not control or alter? Sir, if the Secretary of the Treasury may thus abolish our power on this subject, and render it unconstitutional for us to interfere with his orders, why may not every other Secretary of every other Department claim similar power and the same exemption from our control? Such doctrines are the very essence of despotism, and now for the first time have they been openly avowed upon this floor, and in this country. Tell me not then that the Secretary of the Treasury may receive or reject bank paper at his pleasure; may receive it, as he now does, for customs, and reject it in payment for the public lands, and that it is unconstitutional for Congress to regulate, define, and limit, that discretion. Standing upon the broad basis of the Constitution, he would resist such doctrines, for they can only be maintained by a total overthrow of free government, and the establishment of arbitrary and despotic power.

But the Senator from Missouri tells us, that he objects to the bill of the committee as an act of Congress, when it should have been a resolution. Sir, does that Senator contend that in directions given by Congress to the Secretary of the Treasury, as regards the funds receivable for the public dues, there is any distinction between a be it enacted, and a be it resolved, by the Congress of the United States? The Constitution prescribes no such form, and recognises no such distinction. It requires joint resolutions, except for adjournment, as well as laws, to be approved by the President, and when this is done they have the same obligatory energy in limiting and directing the acts of our public agents. Sir, when the Senator from Missouri urged this new objection he seemed to have forgotten his speech of December last, in which, when commenting upon the joint resolution of 1816, he declared, "THIS IS THE LAW;" but now that Senator would have us believe that a joint resolution is not equivalent tion to a law of Congress. But if there be this distinction between a law and a joint resolution, in support of this plea of abatement, upon which the Senator from Missouri now relies, it shall be shown, before the close of this address, that the Senator from Missouri has himself, within the last twelve months, proposed laws, and amendments to laws, expressly authorizing the receipt of bank paper in payment of the public dues, and consequently, if his own argument be true, has proposed a repeal of the Constitution. Before, however, proceeding to this branch of the subject, let me ask, if the reception of bank paper in payment of the public dues be a violation of the Constitution, then not only have Congress, but this administration, and every one that preceded it, uniformly violated the Constitution. Down to the period of the Treasury order of July last, this administration has constantly received bank paper in payment of the federal revenue, and is still receiving it, even under the Treasury order, in payment of customs. The argument then of the Senator from Missouri, is a bitter denunciation of the whole course of the President on this subject preceding the Treasury order, and it is also a denunciation of the principles of that order, so far as it does not exclude bank paper in payment of customs. The administration is now receiving bank paper in payment of customs, and no change on this subject is proposed by the President; and yet the Senator from Missouri tells us, that for Congress to authorize the reception of bank paper, in payment of the public dues, is to repeal the Constitution. Here is conclusive evidence, that the Senator from Missouri goes far beyond the views of the President upon this subject. But the Senator from Missouri objects to the proviso of the bill introduced by the Committee on Public Lands, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to withdraw the deposits from any bank which refuses to pass to the credit of the United States as cash, the notes of such specie paying banks, receivable under this bill, as the bank receives on general deposit. This proviso is a wholesome restriction upon the abuse of power by the deposit banks. It will curtail, and was intended to curtail, the power of the deposit banks. It will arrest an odious monopoly, by preventing the deposit banks from making their notes the only paper receivable for the public dues, thus rendering, for all practical purposes, the paper of these banks the only currency of the Federal Government, to the manifest inconvenience of the people, and the severe oppression of other State banks equally as solvent as these institutions. It will prevent an oligarchy of deposit banks from controlling the currency, and exercising a power over the prosperity of the country quite as despotic as that possessed by the Bank of the United States. If we reject this proviso, we shall only have disenthralled the American people from the Bank of the United States, one master, to substitute eighty masters, a combination of which, uncontrolled by this proviso, might hold in their power the prosperity of this nation. This same power was confided, in relation to the removal of the deposits, to the Secretary of the Treasury, as regards the Bank of the United States, and the existence, as well as the exercise, of this power by that officer, was deemed, by the Senator from Missouri, most wise and salutary. Yet the Senator from Missouri now objects to this power, and says he would not entrust it even to the administration of the President, or of his successor. Indeed! The Senator from Missouri would not confide to the Secretary of the Treasury the necessary power to remove the public moneys from any deposit bank, thus abusing its authority, and oppressing the people in the contingency referred to in the proviso, and yet he would permit the joint resolution of 1816 to remain unrepealed and unmodified, by which the Secretary of the Treasury might at his discretion regulate the whole currency of the country, receive or reject bank paper at his option, change and rechange his orders upon this subject, introduce or exclude the currency of gold and silver, and exercise over this whole subject powers unregulated and uncontrolled. Sir, the Senator from Missouri stops at the molehill of this proviso, whilst he surmounts the mountain which rises to our view, upon a survey of the enormous powers which that Senator would entrust, without any regulation, into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. W. said he would now proceed to prove that the Senator from Missouri had himself originally proposed something similar to the provisions of the bill which he now denounces as a violation of the Constitution; and especially that he had directly proposed, by resolution as well as laws, to authorize the receipt of bank paper in payment of the public dues; and, until very recently, limited himself to the exclusion of notes under twenty dollars, as proposed by the bill of the committee. And first, Mr. W. read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 9th April, 1834, as follows:

"The following motion, submitted by Mr. BENTON, was considered:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made ***"

3. In the joint resolution of 1816 (for the better collection of the revenue;) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country."

Here it will be perceived that the Senator from Missouri then considered the joint resolution of 1816 as requiring alterations by Congress, so as "to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period." Here then was a direct proposition, by that Senator, to do precisely what is done by the bill of the committee, as regards the exclusion from revenue payments of notes only "under twenty dollars." Why then does the Senator now denounce what was then his own project as a repeal of the Constitution?

His project then was, not as it now is, to exclude all but gold and silver from revenue payments, and cut loose the Federal Government from the paper system, but the very reverse, namely—to authorize bank notes not under twenty dollars to be received in revenue payments. And, how received? Why, by regulations then proposed by him, to be made by Congress—by alterations of the joint resolution of 1816. The honorable Senator then also proposed to make "the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country." The terms common currency, as distinguished from exclusive currency, are italicised in the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, and the suppression confined to "the small note circulation." This suppression of "the small note circulation," of notes under twenty dollars, was to be effected by the instrumentality of the revenue system of the United States. Now is not all this precisely what is proposed in the bill of the committee? and are not that bill, and this resolution of the honorable Senator, substantially the same? Since this period, a great revolution appears to have taken place in the opinion of the honorable Senator, both as regards questions relating to the currency and to constitutional law. Then, that Senator was satisfied to encourage the circulation of banknotes not under twenty dollars, and to receive them in revenue payments. Now, nothing will answer his purpose but gold and silver; and, to authorize any thing else to be received in revenue payments, is denounced as a repeal of the Constitution! If this doctrine be true, then the Senator from Missouri stands upon the Senate journals self-contricted of an attempt to repeal the Constitution.

But the Senator from Missouri has embodied the twenty dollar principle as connected with the federal revenue, in an act of Congress, not a resolution.

Mr. W. here read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 6th of April, 1836, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of a bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners, &c. The following amendment, proposed by Mr. BENTON, being under consideration, Sec.— And be it further enacted, That no bank note of less denomination than twenty dollars shall hereafter be offered in payment, in any case whatsoever, in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department; nor shall any bank note of any denomination be so offered, unless the same shall be payable and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie, at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him."

This section was, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, embodied in the act of Congress referred to, and is now the law of the land, having passed both Houses of Congress, and received the sanction of the President. This provision, it is true, is confined to payments by the United States. But if the United States, under this law, are to pay out bank notes not under twenty dollars, how can this be done if they are not authorized to receive such notes? What could be more contradictory than a bill, the first section of which should authorize notes not under twenty dollars to be paid by the United States, and the second section of which should prohibit the United States from receiving in payment any thing but gold and silver? How could the United States, by law, in all time to come, pay out that which by law they were debarred from receiving? The Senator from Missouri, then, has, by law, connected the Federal Government with the paper system. This section, adopted on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, would come in very properly as an additional clause in the bill now before us; but as an additional proviso to the bill, which shall be quoted hereafter, proposed by that Senator, to re-establish a currency of gold and silver for the Federal Government, it would be ridiculous and contradictory.

Mr. W. stated, the Senator from Missouri had still further committed himself on this subject. He had not only directly countenanced the payment of the federal revenue in bank notes, but had himself proposed, at the last session, the creation by Congress in this District of new banks, authorized to issue notes not less than twenty dollars. Mr. W. here read from the journals of the Senate, under date of 4th of June, 1836, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia."

On motion of Mr. BENTON to recommit the bill with instructions—to report separate bills for the incorporation of new banks, with small capitals, adapted to the capacity of the District to sustain specie banks, and strictly limited to the business of the place; the said incorporations to contain among other provisions the following principles: 4. The banks to issue no notes of less denomination than twenty dollars; and all notes of less denomination than twenty dollars by other banks to be prohibited from circulation within the District. 5. All the notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one-half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank."

Now, Mr. W. would ask, if Congress could by law establish even in this District a certain number of banks authorized to issue notes of a certain denomination, could it not exercise the smaller power of authorizing the reception of bank notes in revenue payments? But (Mr. W. said) he quoted this to show that even at this late period the Senator from Missouri was not prepared to do execution on all banks and all bank paper. There were some curious matters connected with these propositions of the Senator from Missouri. His fifth proposition required "all notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank;" and this same provision the honorable Senator also proposed to apply to "the deposit banks," "in consideration of being made of continued depositories of the public moneys." Sir, the honorable Senator from Missouri would have the banks pay in a currency better than that required by the Constitution. By that instrument gold or silver is a legal tender in payment of debts, and a bank note is only an evidence of a debt due by the bank to the holder of the note; but the honorable Senator would require the banks to pay their notes in gold and silver, one half of each metal. When a note of a thousand dollars shall be presented to a bank for redemption in specie, it is hoped the honorable Senator will not require those of less personal prowess than himself, to carry away five hundred dollars in silver, when the bank otherwise might pay the whole amount in gold. Such equal division of the precious metals, however beautiful in theory, would be most inconvenient in practice; and if the honorable Senator is so equally attached to gold and silver as to be resolved on having a precisely equal circulation of each, there is one way which, if it were not presumptuous, Mr. W. could recommend to his serious consideration. It was this. That Senator took great delight in exhibiting a new and favorite coin of his which he called BILLON. Mr. W. hoped he pronounced the word correctly; he was sure the Senator from Missouri did. This coin was composed partly of copper, and partly of silver, though not precisely one-half of each, the Senator having suffered great injustice done to the silver, by permitting a great preponderance of copper, a very inferior metal, not recognised by the Constitution as a tender. Now, Mr. W. would suggest, that if the Senator from Missouri would have coined a new species of BILLON, composed of gold and silver, precisely one-half of each in value, would it not answer his purpose? Mr. W. would not warrant that it would answer, but would only suggest it to the consideration of the Senator from Missouri, as a substitute for his proposed entire equalization of the circulation of gold and silver, by compelling the banks to redeem their notes in one-half of each metal, especially as these banks might not find it very convenient to comply with these requisitions, and as a greater quantity of one metal than of the other might find its way; from time to time, out of the country, and thus destroy this metallic equilibrium of the honorable Senator.

Thus far the Senator from Missouri seemed to have confined his views to the exclusion of notes under twenty dollars in revenue payments. But on the tenth of June last, he changed his position, and introduced into the Senate the following bill: A BILL to re-establish the currency of the Constitution for the Federal Government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That bank notes and paper currency of every description shall cease to be received or offered in payment, on account of the United States, or of the Post Office, or in fees in the courts of the United States, as follows: of less denomination than twenty dollars, none after the 3d day of March 1837; of less denomination than fifty dollars, none after the third day of March 1838; of less denomination than one hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March 1839; of less denomination than five hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March 1840; of less denomination than one thousand dollars, none after the 3d day of March 1841; and none of any denomination from and after the 3d day of March 1842.

"SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That any person holding an appointment under the laws of the United States, and any bank employed to keep public moneys, which person or bank shall neglect, evade, violate, contravene, or in any way elude, or attempt to elude, the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of an offence against the laws; and the person so offending shall be liable to be dismissed from the service, and the bank so offending shall, on satisfactory information, be discontinued as a depository of public moneys."

And here Mr. W. would remark, that by this bill, bank notes were permitted to be received in revenue payments, until the third of March, 1842. If then, the argument of the Senator from Missouri be correct, that to authorize, by act of Congress, the receipt of bank notes in revenue payments, be a repeal of the Constitution, this bill of the honorable Senator should have been entitled a repeal of the Constitution until the 3d of March, 1842. The provisions of this bill were somewhat remarkable. All bank notes under twenty dollars were immediately excluded—the twenty dollar notes being the next greatest violators of the Constitution, were executed in March, 1837; those of fifty dollars in March, 1838; those of one thousand dollars were reprinted till March, 1841; and in Mar. h. 1842, execution was done on all "bank notes and paper currency of every description," and "the currency of the Constitution" was re-established. Now how was this prodigious revolution to be effected? Why, by dismissing from office any officer of the Government who should receive or offer in payment any thing but gold and silver, by which all were to be excluded but converts to the metallic currency of the honorable Senator, and by discontinuing as a depository of the public moneys, any bank which should commit a similar offence. Now does any Senator believe, that any bank would accept the deposits on such terms? That it must pay out the public moneys in nothing but gold and silver, and transfer the precious metals from place to place, thousands of miles, at the will of the Government. Recollect, that not only "bank notes," but also "paper currency of every description" is excluded by this bill, and consequently bank drafts would be as effectually refused by this bill as bank notes. Indeed the authority to receive "funds" eastern or western, from any bank, constitutes one of the Senator's objections to the bill of the committee. Let us suppose then that the Government has two millions in silver at Natches, which it desires at four different points, each one thousand miles distant. Will it transport these wagon loads of silver from point to point, where the money is wanted by the Government—for recollect the Government must have the hard money, for it is to pay out, as well as receive, nothing but this? Is this practicable, or is there a bank in the Union that would accept the deposits on such terms as these? The banks are to be continued by this bill as depositories of the public moneys, as the fiscal agents of the Government, and yet we are to reject the paper of our own agents. The amount of the public revenue of last year was forty-seven millions of dollars. Now all this we are to entrust to the custody of the banks: we are to trust them to the amount of forty-seven million of dollars, and yet refuse to receive any portion of their paper, or, in other words, trust them for forty-seven million of dollars, and refuse them credit even for a twenty dollar note. We are first asked to employ the banks as fiscal agents, and then set about the work of their destruction. Sir, the passage of this bill would ensure the abandonment of the deposit bank system, and as fiscal agents we must have, it would ensure the re-establishment of a Bank of the United States, with all its oppressive powers. And here let me ask, can any thing be more inconsistent, as well as impracticable, than to employ the State banks as fiscal agents, as depositories of the public moneys, and yet reject their paper? If it be unconstitutional to receive one dollar of the public dues in the paper of any bank, is it not equally unconstitutional to make these unconstitutional banks, issuing this unconstitutional currency, our fiscal agents for the whole amount of our revenue, by bank credits? Under our deposit bill, when we confide money to a deposit bank, have we not previously taken its bond to repay? And if we take its bond, why not its paper? Sir, to carry out the gentleman's doctrine, he should discard the deposit banks as fiscal agents, and employ hundreds of separate individual agents, constantly traversing the country in all directions, with mules or wagons loaded with gold and silver. Such a system, and to this I would come, would require an army of agents greater than our whole standing army, to receive, transfer, and disburse, the forty-seven millions of gold and silver, the amount of this year's federal revenue. Such a system would enlarge the patronage and power of the General Government to an almost unlimited extent, and, if successful, paralyze the State Governments by the destruction of State banks, State credit, and State institutions. But the whole system is impracticable, and it is time that the country should know that such is the opinion of the whole Senate, with the single exception of the Senator from Missouri himself. Sir, that Senator may rally three or four votes against the bill of the committee, but it will be from objections to the details of the measure, and not because they adopt the opinions of the Senator from Missouri on this subject. If the Constitution is repealed by the reception of bank notes in revenue payments, why did the Senator from Missouri never come to the rescue till the 10th of June, 1836, and why did he then permit the session to pass by without any vote upon the measure, and why has he not reintroduced it at this session. The fact is, and the country should know it, that the Senator from Missouri can get no vote for this bill of his, except his own. Now, at this moment, he may bring it forward, or at any period of the session; we are anxious he should do so; and all we ask is a vote by ayes and noes, to show the American people that the Senator from Missouri stands alone on this subject. Now the measure of the Senator from Missouri is not only impracticable, but defeats the great object of suppressing the small note currency, and enlarging the circulation of gold and silver. The Federal Government, aided by its revenue, by the depositories of its money, and by State legislation, might gradually suppress all bank notes under twenty dollars, and gold and silver would then necessarily fill the vacuum, and constitute the common currency of the country in the ordinary transactions between the dealer and consumer. This would disarm the State banks of nearly all power to do evil, arrest excessive issues of bank paper, substitute gold and silver for all that great portion of the circulation of banks which consists of notes under twenty dollars, render and preserve the banks sound and solvent, our currency stable, and put an end to all apprehension of that explosion of the paper system with which many believe we are now threatened. This was a practical reform of the currency, and one which (Mr. W. said) he was deeply solicitous to see effected; but it can only be effected by the co-operation with Congress of the State Legislatures. The reform, too, must be by gradual and successive steps. Therefore the bill only proposed the refusal of the five dollar notes after the 30th December, 1839, and the refusal of the ten dollar notes after the 30th December, 1841, periods when Congress will be in session; and if the States will not then co-operate with us in this reform, we must, as the representatives of their wishes, repeal or modify the measure.

But will the measure of the Senator from Missouri effect any useful purpose? It holds out to the State banks no inducements to suppress their small note currency. It is a declaration of war by this Government against the people of the States, and the banks of the States. It demands that, out of a gold and silver currency in circulation, of twenty-eight millions, (as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury,) we should pay in this currency a revenue of forty-seven millions, according to the receipts of this year. It demands, then, an impossibility, unless an explosion of the State banks is created by draining them of their specie. It demands that this gold and silver be, at all the various points of collection or payment, at all times, in sufficient quantities to make these revenue payments and disbursements also. It would withdraw gold and silver from general circulation, and confine its use almost wholly to revenue payments and disbursements. It is, finally, an effort on the part of this Government to render all the notes of all the State banks uncurrent within the limits of the States, and is equivalent to a demand made by Congress upon the State banks to surrender their charters, or upon the State Legislatures to repeal them; and Mr. W. said he had never been authorized by the State of Mississippi to demand, in their name, a repeal or overthrow of any of their State institutions. To the extent that he was now willing to go, Mr. W. said he had distinctly expressed himself in an address preceding his election, in favor of the abandonment of the small note currency—in favor of receiving the notes "for larger amounts" "of the solvent State banks," for "all dues to the National Government"—in favor of the enlargement of the circulation of gold and silver, and against "an exclusively metallic curcy." Mr. W. said, having been elected with the open avowal of these doctrines, he hoped he stood not only upon the basis of his own previously expressed views, but also upon those of his constituents, in supporting the present bill, and opposing that of the Senator from Missouri.

It remains now to be shown (said Mr. W.) that this bill is in perfect accordance with the policy and recommendation of the President, and is similar to other measures which have received his sanction. In the message of December, 1834, the President declared as follows:

"The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness.

"The attention of Congress is earnestly invited to the regulation of the deposits in the State banks by law. Although the power now exercised by the Executive Department in this behalf is only such as was uniformly exerted through every administration, from the origin of the Government up to the establishment of the present bank, yet it is one which is susceptible of regulation by law, and therefore, ought so to be regulated. Those institutions have already shown themselves competent to purchase and furnish domestic exchange for the convenience of trade, at reasonable rates; and no doubt is entertained that in a short period all the wants of the country in bank accommodations and exchange will be supplied as promptly and as cheaply as they have heretofore been by the Bank of the United States. If the several States shall be induced gradually to reform their banking systems, and prohibit the issue of all small notes, we shall in a few years have a currency as sound, and as little liable to fluctuations, as any other commercial country."

Here are several facts and principles distinctly stated by the President. First, that the State banks could perform all the services required of the Bank of the United States. Second, that the deposits in the State banks should be regulated by law, and as little discretion as regards the banks left with the Executive as possible. Thirdly, the recommendation to the States of a gradual suppression of the issue of small notes, and the expression of the opinion, that with this reform the State banks could furnish a sound currency. Now all this is in exact concurrency with the bill of the committee, and directly contradictory of the views of the Senator from Missouri. So far from desiring the destruction of the State banks, the President considered their services indispensable, as depositories of the public moneys, and fiscal agents. So far from opposing regulations by Congress on this subject, and restrictions of executive power, the President distinctly recommended it. So far from desiring the establishment of an exclusive gold and silver currency, and the exclusion of the notes of all State banks from revenue payments, the President desired only the suppression of small notes, and expressed the opinion that with this reform, the State banks could furnish a sound currency, and of course safely and properly receivable in revenue payments.

Again, in the message of December, 1835, the President declared as follows:

"It has been seen that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills, and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium. Severed from the Government as political engines, and not susceptible of dangerous extension and combination, the State banks will not be tempted, nor will they have the power which we have seen exercised, to divert the public funds from the legitimate purposes of the Government. The collection and custody of the revenue being, on the contrary, a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts; by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposits in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform in the whole paper system of the country. If, by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country."

Here it is perfectly clear that the exclusion of the notes of the State banks from revenue payments, and the establishment of an exclusive metallic currency, were not contemplated by the President. On the contrary, his views were limited to the gradual suppression and disuse "of all bank bills below twenty dollars" as the only true practical reform "ultimately" to be accomplished. And how did the President propose accomplishing this reform? Why by such regulations by Congress in the management of the revenue and custody of the deposits, as would prove auxiliary to State legislation in effecting this object. Now is not the bill of the committee precisely in accordance with these views of the President? Does not this bill propose such regulations being made in the management of the revenue, as will, if aided by State legislation, suppress the circulation of all notes below twenty dollars; and the bill of the Senator from Missouri is in direct opposition to this message; for by the use only of gold and silver in revenue payments he abandons all hope of so managing the revenue, as to make it available in suppressing the small note currency. The object of the President is the disuse of notes under twenty dollars, that of the Senator from Missouri the disuse of every thing but gold and silver.

Nor does the Treasury order in any manner contravene those principles, embodied in former messages. That this order was perfectly legal and constitutional; that it was in accordance with the discretionary powers vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by the joint resolution of 1816, Mr. W. said he never doubted; that the motives of the President in issuing this order were pure and patriotic was beyond dispute. The measure was evidently temporary, designed to repress inordinate speculations in the public lands; and it is expressly declared in the President's message to be of little importance, "if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation." That it never was designed to establish the principle of excluding bank notes from revenue payments, is evident from the fact that payments of customs are received, as formerly, in bank paper. There yet remains one other evidence on this subject, which is conclusive. The fifth section of the act of Congress of June last, regulating the deposits of the public moneys, is in these words:

"That no bank shall be selected, or continued as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie; nor shall any bank be selected or continued as aforesaid, which shall, after the 4th of July, (1836,) issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars; nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States which shall, after the said fourth day of July, (1836,) issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

Now this act passed both Houses with unprecedented unanimity. In the Senate it was passed with but six dissenting votes, namely: Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Grundy, Walker, and Wright, not one of whom opposed it on account of the 5th section, but, as clearly stated at the time, because of the distribution principle contained in the thirteenth section. So far as the 5th section is concerned the vote of Congress may well be considered as unanimous in its favor. The President also, in his last message, in stating the reluctance with which he signed this bill, gives as the reason the distribution principle of the 13th section, but he thus distinctly eulogises the provisions of this 5th section as follows: "In the acts of several of the States prohibiting the circulation of small notes and the auxiliary enactments of Congress at the last session, forbidding their reception in payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger proportion of the precious metals infused in to our circulation." Now the only act of the last session forbidding the reception of small notes on public account, is this fifth section of this act thus eulogised by the President and approved by him on the 23d of June last. Yet this very section is a repeal of the Constitution, if the bill of the committee be thus truly designated by the Senator from Missouri, for both are laws, not resolutions, and both forbid the reception of small notes only.

Let us compare their provisions in this respect:

The bill of the committee declares: "From and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received on account of the public dues;" extending the prohibition in December, 1841, to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes under twenty dollars.

The fifth section of the deposit act declares: "Nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States which shall, after the said fourth day of July, (1836,) issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

Where is the distinction in principle as regards the reception of bank paper on public account between the two provisions? and the Senator from Missouri, in thus denouncing the bill of the committee as a repeal of the Constitution, denounces directly the President of the United States. Congress, no more than a State Legislature, can make any thing but gold or silver a tender in payment of debts by one citizen to another; but that Congress, or a State Legislature, or an individual, may waive their constitutional rights, and receive bank paper or drafts in payment of any debt, is a principle of universal adoption in theory and practice, and never doubted by any one until at the present session by the Senator from Missouri. The distinction of the Senator in this respect was as incomprehensible to him (Mr. W.) as he believed it was to every Senator, and, indeed, was discernible only by the magnifying powers of a solar microscope. It was a point-no-point, which, like the logarithmic spiral, or asymptote of the hyperbolic curve, might be forever approached without reaching; an infinitesimal, the ghost of an idea, not only without length, breadth, thickness, shape, weight, or dimensions, but without position—a mere imaginary nothing which flitted before the bewildered vision of the honorable Senator, when traversing, in his fitful somnambulism, that tessellated pavement of gold, silver, and billion, which that Senator delighted to occupy. Sir, the Senator from Missouri might have heaped mountain high his piles of metal; he might have swept, in his quixotic flight, over the banks of the States, putting to the sword their officers, stockholders, directory, and legislative bodies by which they were chartered; he might, in his reveries, have demolished their charters, and consumed their paper by the fire of his eloquence; he might have transacted, in fancy, with a metallic currency of twenty-eight millions in circulation, an actual annual business of fifteen hundred millions, and Mr. W. would not have disturbed his beatific visions, nor would any other Senator—for they were visions only that could never be realized—but when, descending from his etherial flights, he seized upon the Committee on Public Lands as criminals, arraigned them as violators of the Constitution, and prayed Heaven for deliverance from them, Mr. W. could be silent no longer. Yes, even then he would have passed lightly over the ashes of the theories of the honorable Senator, for, if he desired to make assaults upon any, it would be upon the living, and not the dead, but that Senator, in the opening of his (Mr. W's) address, had rejected the olive branch which, upon the urgent solicitation of mutual friends, against his own judgment, he had extended to the honorable Senator. The Senator from Missouri had thus, in substance, declared his "voice was still for war." Be it so; but he hoped the Senate would all recollect that he (Mr. W.) was not the aggressor; and that whilst he trusted he never would wantonly assail the feelings or reputation of any Senator, he thanked God that he was not so object or degraded as to submit, with impunity, to unprovoked attacks or unfounded accusations from any quarter. Could he thus submit, he would be unfit to represent the noble, generous, and gallant people, whose rights and interests it was his pride and glory to endeavor to protect, whose honor and character were dearer to him than life itself, and should never be tarnished by any act of his as one of their humble representatives upon this floor.

NOTE.—This bill, thus denounced by the Senator from Missouri as a repeal of the Constitution, has since passed the Senate by a vote of 41 to 5, and the House of Representatives, 143 to 59.

SPEECH OF MR. CHAPIN, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, February 27, 1837—In Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, on the motion to amend the bill to provide for certain harbors, &c. by adding an appropriation of $7,000 for works at Buffalo, New York.

MR. CHAPIN said he had proposed the amendment under consideration, because an appropriation of seven thousand dollars for works at Buffalo harbor was recommended in the estimates of the Engineer Department accompanying the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which was wholly omitted in the bill. The harbor bill, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, provided for works already commenced under the authority of an act of Congress. For all such works appropriations were to be made, annually, until they should be completed, based upon the estimates of the Engineer Department, to whose charge and superintendence they had been committed. The provisions of this bill do not correspond at all with the estimates furnished and laid on our tables. In some instances, the appropriations called for are omitted altogether—in others, they are largely reduced. The aggregate of the estimates of the department for the year 1837, amounts to the sum of two millions three hundred and twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars; the aggregate of the appropriations for which provision is made in the bill, as reported, is the sum of nine hundred and forty-five thousand dollars, falling short of what is required by the Engineer Department more than one half. Representing a district of country that has a deep interest in the improvement of harbors on the northern lakes, he could not, consistently with a proper regard to his duty, suffer the bill to pass without expressing his dissent to the conclusions of the Committee of Ways and Means. He avowed it to be his settled conviction, that a judicious expenditure of the public treasure, having proper regard to economy, and the great national objects to be effected by the speedy completion of these important works, required that Congress should respond fully to the calls of the Engineer Department, by making liberal appropriations. He had devoted much time to the examination of this interesting subject, and was prepared to vote every dollar of appropriation to carry out and complete the present system of improving the harbors on the lakes called for by the department, and he hoped the various provisions of the bill, applicable to these works, would be amended accordingly. In the remarks he was about to submit, he should not, therefore, confine himself exclusively to the consideration of the amendment proposed, but he should take a wider and more comprehensive view of the subject, in order to call the attention of this branch of Congress, and the country, to the vast importance of these improvements, as connected with the internal commerce of the northern and western States.

At this late period of the session he was fully aware, that the time of the House is too precious to be consumed in debate; he could assure gentlemen he did not intend to occupy more time than he deemed indispensably necessary, claiming for himself the privilege—a very common one—of presenting his views somewhat more in detail to the country through the medium of the press.

The official communications annually made to Congress by the Engineer Department, in relation to the public works under their superintendence, are justly entitled to great consideration. Indeed, the estimates furnished by the resident engineer, and sanctioned by the distinguished officer at the head of the department, ought to furnish the measure of such appropriations, unless good cause can be shown why they should not. It might be said; without hazard of contradiction, there is not to be found in the public service a class of officers more intelligent, vigilant, trustworthy, and patriotic than the corps of United States Engineers. Combining science with practical experience, and an intimate knowledge of the navigation and commerce of the country, they are eminently fitted for the discharge of the public trusts confided to them. Their estimates for appropriations are founded, without exception, upon actual surveys and examinations made on the ground, and furnish the most accurate and satisfactory information that can be acquired on the subject. For one, he had great confidence in these estimates, and he hoped the House would sustain the call of the department.

It is a part of the system of national protection to provide for the improvement and construction of harbors. They are works of great importance, and of public utility, clearly within the scope of the constitutional powers of Congress, and the legitimate objects of national legislation. The General Government derives revenue from commerce, in which the States, as such, cannot participate. The improvement of the harbors on the lakes having become, therefore, a part of the settled policy of the United States, it seems to be just that expenditures for necessary works should be commensurate to the increasing commerce of the country, and the magnitude of the interests involved. Vast numbers of enterprising citizens have embarked in the commerce of these inland seas, under the reasonable expectation that Congress will make adequate appropriations to finish the works already begun, and authorize others where they are needed, by which means the dangers of navigation will be diminished, and the facilities of trade increased. Such expenditures are no longer to be regarded as of partial, local, or doubtful benefit. They are objects of vast national importance, affecting, to a large extent, the internal trade of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, and the Territory of Wisconsin, whose shores are washed by these lakes.

The strongest argument that can be suggested in support of liberal appropriations for these public works results from a simple narrative of facts, showing the increase of the commerce and navigation on the lakes. It would be instructive to present them somewhat in detail, as connected with the present argument, and for future reference.

In 1828, about the period when the present system of improving the harbors on the lakes commenced, the gross revenue collected in the district of Oswego, as ascertained from the Register of the Treasury, was only $64,653; in 1835, it was $36,424 49, and in 1836, it exceeded $52,000. In the district of Genesee, in 1828, the customs collected were only $131 26; in 1835, $26,071 74, and in 1836 they amounted to $60,000.

It appears from the transactions of the custom-house at Oswego, for 1836, that the aggregate of American vessels entered was eighty-seven thousand seven hundred and forty-five tons; of the same cleared, ninety-three thousand three hundred and twenty-three tons. The aggregate of foreign vessels entered was sixty-one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven tons; of the same cleared, sixty thousand five hundred and fifty-four tons.

During the past year 26,998,697 pounds of merchandise were received at Oswego; of this amount 16,039,226 pounds were destined to Canada and the upper lakes. There were also received during the same year 292,444 feet of sawed lumber, 35,217 feet of timber, and 160,000 bushels of foreign wheat.

There was, also, shipped on the canal from Oswego, in 1836, seventy-two millions two hundred and thirty-nine thousand and eighty-four pounds of property, paying toll by weight; eight millions three hundred and ninety thousand nine hundred and forty-eight feet of sawed lumber, and one hundred and ninety-two thousand one hundred and twelve feet of timber.

In discussing a subject of such vast importance to the people of the United States, it is impossible to keep out of view the immense extent and cost of the internal improvements, projected, commenced and finished under the authority of the several State Governments, and in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, which have been, or will be brought to bear with wonderful effect upon the trade, commerce, and general prosperity of the States and Territory bordering upon the lakes. The works of the General Government, in the opening of harbors, commence where the internal improvements of the States terminate. New avenues for commerce in the fertile regions of the West are opening almost daily. The canals and railroads are the commercial channels leading to and from the lakes. Most of the harbors named in the bill on your table, are the points of the actual or proposed terminations of such canals or railroads. The people of the States do, therefore, expect that the General Government will provide for the protection of shipping against the winds and waves, while receiving and discharging their cargoes, by the construction of piers, and by causing the obstructions to be removed at the entrance of harbors.

In 1822 there were about ten sail of vessels, and only one steamboat on all the upper lakes. In 1836 there were thirty-nine steamboats, three ships, six brigs, and one hundred and forty-seven schooners and sloops, with an aggregate tonnage of twenty-five thousand two hundred and six tons. Thirteen steamboats of the largest class, and numerous other vessels, are now on the stocks, which will be ready for the opening of navigation in the spring.

During the past year, there were eight hundred and ten arrivals, and the same number of clearances, of steamboats, and one thousand and forty-seven arrivals of ships, brigs, schooners and sloops, and the same number of clearances, at the harbor of Buffalo, with an aggregate of six hundred and forty-two thousand and sixty tons. During the same season there were one hundred and eight thousand passengers going west from Buffalo in steamboats. The returns of the collector of canal tolls, at Buffalo, in 1836, show an increase of seventy per cent of merchandise and property sent beyond the State of New York through the Erie canal, and an increase of tolls collected there, of nearly fifty per cent.

MR. MERCER of Virginia, rose and inquired, whether the appropriation for Buffalo harbor was recommended by the Engineer Department.

MR. C. said he had so stated in the outset, and that he had no further knowledge of its necessity than such estimate, which he again referred to.

The following statement, which was believed to be authentic, exhibits the astonishing increase of the commerce of Chicago and Toledo:

"At Chicago, in 1833 were but four arrivals from the lower lakes, viz: 2 brigs and 2 schooners, say 700 tons. In 1835 there were about 250 arrivals, nearly all of which were schooners, averaging about 90 tons burden each, or 22,500 tons in all. In 1836, the first arrival was the eighteenth day of April. From that time to the first day of December, 226 days, 456 vessels (49 steamboats 10 ships and barques, 2 brigs, 263 schooners, and 8 sloops,) arrived, averaging 47,550 tons, as follows: 85 ships, steamboats, barques and brigs at 350 tons each, 21,250 tons; 263 schooners, at 100 tons each, (many of them carry 150 to 200 tons) 36,300 tons, or 57,550 tons in all, without including the sloops. To give a more concise view of the increase of our commerce, for the years above named, we place it in the following order:

Year.	No. of arrivals.	Average Tonnage.
1835	250	22,500
1836	456	57,550

"As there are several vessels now on the way which will arrive here this season, we may safely state the tonnage at 60,000! being an increase of 59,300 tons in three years!

"Toledo dates its birth as a town in June, 1834. At that period, the space occupied by its present site, with the exception of one or two small clearings, was a dense forest. Its population scarcely amounted to 150. Not a steamboat of the larger class entered the Maumee river that year, except the Daniel Webster, which came in on her last trip in November. But few steamboats or schooners, (we have not the means of a precise computation,) entered the succeeding year, 1835. In 1836, from the opening, to the close of navigation, there were, exclusive of the small steamboats that ply daily between this and Detroit, 601 arrivals, viz: 690 steamboats and 211 schooners, averaging 118,600 tons, as follows: 390 steamboats, at 250 tons each, 97,500 tons; 211 schooners, 100 tons each, 21,100 tons making in all 118,600 tons."

Detroit, Milwaukee, Michigan City, and numerous other places of less importance, on the borders of these lakes, are making astonishing advances in trade, wealth, and population. It is said, upon good authority, that two hundred and twenty-three vessels discharged cargoes at Milwaukee during the last season. The census of this town was taken under the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Wisconsin, and the population was ascertained to number one thousand and three hundred, where, eighteen months before, there were but two families. These facts are surprising, even to those who live in this age of wonders. Every where in the vast fertile regions of the west, the country is advancing with railroad velocity, outstripping the calculations of the wildest enthusiast. The lake coast of New York, and Pennsylvania, and the northern part of Ohio, have more than doubled in population within the last eight years, since the General Government began the construction of harbors, and Michigan has increased from a population of about twenty thousand, to upwards of two hundred thousand souls; from a wilderness, to a comparatively dense population of enterprising and industrious citizens.

It is impossible, at the present day, to assign limits to the future population and wealth of the States bordering upon the western lakes. Their productive industry, owing to the fertility of the soil, and other natural advantages, will soon equal that of any other portion of the United States of the like extent. The lakes, which are the natural avenues for their trade, are destined to be covered with vessels engaged in an active and profitable commerce.

A project has been set on foot to overcome the Falls of St. Mary, and open the navigation of Lake Superior, which, it is believed, may be accomplished at a comparatively trifling expense, as it will require but three locks, of seven feet lift each, and a canal of less than a mile in length. By this means, more than twelve hundred miles of coast navigation would be added to the present.

The whole amount appropriated, from the commencement of the improvement of the harbors on the northern lakes to the close of the last session of Congress, was one million two hundred and ninety-eight thousand eight hundred and forty dollars and eighteen cents. This sum has been applied to the following improvements:

The expenditures mentioned in the above tabular statement, it should be borne in mind, are for works extending along a coast navigation of twelve hundred miles, where, prior to 1828, no good harbors existed on the main land, except at the extremities of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. Then, a trip from Buffalo to Detroit was considered as dangerous as crossing the Atlantic—vessels being often compelled, by sudden storms and adverse winds, when they had nearly reached the place of destination, in order to avoid being wrecked on the coast, to put back, and make the port from which they had sailed. Now, vessels of all descriptions cross Lake Erie with almost as little danger as they ascend the Hudson. The change has been wrought by the appropriations alluded to. Already twelve good harbors have been created on Lake Erie, and three on Lake Ontario. These have been generally made by removing the bar at the entrance of the harbors, and by constructing piers of wood and stone to break the force of the waves, and prevent the accumulation of sand and gravel in the channels. This experiment has proved entirely successful. The object of the appropriations now asked for is, in most cases, to make these structures permanent; in some few others, it is to remove the bar between the piers.

No good harbors now exist on Lake Michigan. This fact accounts for the destruction of human lives, and the loss of property, which occurred on those waters during the past season. It is computed that property to the value of two hundred thousand dollars was destroyed by one storm, at and near Chicago, which was entirely owing to the impossibility of passing over the sand bar at the mouth of the river, between the piers. The following extract from the message of Governor Dodge to the Legislature of Wisconsin, presents a clear and correct view of this branch of the subject:

"The shipping interest of Lake Michigan for the last two years, has increased to a great extent, and little has been done to protect it. Appropriations for the construction of harbors and light-houses are of the first importance to protect our commerce, as well as the lives of enterprising citizens on Lake Michigan. Many lives, and property to a large amount, have been lost, for the want of the necessary harbors on this lake. I would suggest the propriety of asking of Congress an appropriation sufficient to cover the expenses of surveying all the necessary harbors on Lake Michigan, and the construction of such harbors and light-houses at the most eligible situations, for the security and protection of our lake trade."

The following is an extract from a memorial of the General Assembly of Indiana to the present Congress, asking an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars, for the improvement of the harbor at Michigan City, Indiana:

"That, owing to its natural and relative position, Lake Michigan may be emphatically styled, in its commercial importance, the Mediterranean of North America. The business in this lake has increased in a ratio far exceeding that of any other newly-occupied navigable waters. The amount of merchandise landed at the different points on the whole lake, it is believed, would not fall short of twenty millions of dollars. The amount landed at Michigan City alone, exceeds three millions of dollars. The losses sustained by damage to vessels and merchandise on the lake during the past year, which mostly has been for want of harbors, has not been less than a million of dollars. In two years past, more than fifty lives have been lost, many of them young, intelligent, and promising, who met with a premature and watery grave for want of harbors; vessels being under the necessity of encountering the severest gales at sea, without any other hope than that of being able to outride the storm!"

In 1836, five millions one hundred and fifteen dollars and ninety three cents, as appears from the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office, were paid into the Treasury, on the sales of public lands, in the state of Michigan; yet the bill before us contains only the pitiful sum of forty-five thousand dollars for harbors in that State. This is a narrow, illiberal policy, unjust to the enterprising citizens who have emigrated from the eastern States to settle and improve the public domain, and unworthy the character of a great and powerful empire.

The pioneers of the west may be regarded as the forlorn hope in the march of improvement. Their lot is a life of hardship, privation and enduring toil, exposed alike to the dangers of savage warfare, and the wasting diseases incident to all new settlements. They level the forest, reclaim the swamps, clear up and fence their farms, subdue and fit the soil for cultivation. They enlarge the bounds of civilization. They may be said to live not for themselves, but for their children—for the good of their country. Every consideration of justice, humanity, and patriotism, calls upon the Congress of the United States to extend to those hardy, brave, enterprising citizens, who first occupy the public lands, and convert a howling wilderness into fruitful fields, to the fostering care and protection of the Government. Open to them the facilities of trade with the commercial cities on the seaboard. Enable them to send the products of their labor to market, where they may receive in exchange the commodities of the southern States, the manufactures of New England, the teas of China, and the spices of India, at such reasonable cost, that they may not be entirely deprived of the luxuries of life common to all who inhabit the old States of the Union.

The expense of transportation from Buffalo to Chicago, Milwaukee, or Michigan City, during the summer months, is about one dollar per barrel bulk; later in the season, when the weather becomes tempestuous, and the dangers of navigation increase, the price of freight advances to four or five dollars per barrel bulk, which, of course, becomes a charge upon the consumer. This enormous charge falls upon those least able to bear it; it falls upon the settlers on your public lands. The charge for freight would be nearly uniform, at all seasons of navigation, provided the harbors on Lake Michigan were made accessible to shipping, and secure against storms. This would, also, reduce the rates of insurance, which become, of necessity, a tax upon the people of the west.

It has long been the settled policy of Great Britain to extend her commerce whenever it can be done with profit, and to gain a foothold by occupying the ground in advance. With the manifest and avowed design of securing a portion of the trade of the rich agricultural States bordering on the lakes, the Parliament of Upper Canada have assumed the stock of the Welland canal, so that it has become a Provincial work. It is said, upon good authority, that the Welland canal and locks are to be enlarged, so as to admit the passage of vessels of the largest capacity that navigate the lakes. The British Government is making extraordinary exertions to open a navigation for ships around the rapids of the St. Lawrence, and the work is now in progress. This important work, which is to be constructed upon a magnificent scale, it is expected, will be finished in two or three years, when an uninterrupted communication will exist between the ocean and the western lakes for ships and steamboats of three hundred tons burthen. It requires no gift of prophecy to foretell, what I do not hesitate to declare as my firm belief, that many gentlemen present will have the gratification to see British vessels discharging their cargoes at Oswego, Sodus Bay, Toledo, Detroit and Chicago, which were freighted with merchandise at the docks of London or Liverpool.

It is stated in the journals of the day, that the Parliament of Upper Canada have appropriated eight hundred thousand dollars for the construction of a railroad from Niagara to Detroit, which will form a connecting link in the chain of railroads chartered, or finished and in operation, from the city of Boston, through Massachusetts, New York, Upper Canada, and Michigan, to Lake Michigan, and extending westwardly from Chicago to Galena. A canal is also projected to connect Lake Ontario with Lake Huron, by a short and feasible route through Lake Simcoe. Such are the vast and magnificent plans of internal improvement adopted by the only power on earth which can, from its local position, become a competitor of our maritime cities for the immense trade of the fertile and productive regions bordering on the lakes. It touches our national character, not to be outdone by our powerful competitor in this noble field of commercial rivalry. Let not the golden prize be seized and borne away by another, in consequence of a spiritless and parsimonious policy on the part of the Congress of the United States.

It must be apparent to the most casual observer that Great Britain intends to avail herself for the present, and secure for the future, the advantages of her position in regard to the trade of the Canadas and the adjacent States. With this view the British Government is strengthening and completing its system of fortifications in the Canadas, which will answer the double purpose of maintaining the supremacy of the crown, by over-awing the disaffected and disloyal among his majesty's subjects in the provinces, and of efficient defence against the arms of the United States in the event of war.

It is a maxim in political economy, that a redundant population tends to weaken the State. The emigration of the inhabitants of the old States of the confederacy to the States and Territories stretching along and beyond the chain of western lakes, will long preserve that medium density of population so congenial to a happy and prosperous condition of society. It was a saying of the Emperor Adrian, "He had rather see the Empire full of people than rich." Let the surplus population of the Eastern and Middle States pour forth into the valley of the Ohio and the Mississippi, the prairies of Michigan and Illinois, and the mineral region of Wisconsin, where the labor of the agriculturist must reap a rich reward, and well-directed enterprise can not fail to prosper. In reference, therefore, to the general welfare of the Union, no impediment should be thrown in the way of public improvements which have a tendency to encourage emigration, and keep down the increase of population within the old States to proper limits.

In the further improvement of harbors on the lakes, it is desirable that a system should be pursued, having due regard to the commercial facilities which will be most needed by the country as it advances in wealth and population. With these important objects in view, Lakes Huron and Michigan ought to be surveyed by engineers, who should be required to report all the statistical and topographical information they might be able to collect, to Congress, accompanied with a general plan for the improvement of such harbors as will best serve to diminish the dangers of navigation, and meet the demands of increasing trade. This would bring the prominent points into view, and throw open to the public the natural avenues for internal commerce. It would, moreover, shut the door against those applications to Congress for appropriations which originate in a spirit of speculation, with interested individuals who seek private gains at the expense of the public. It seems to be generally admitted, that those points on the lakes where the business of the country naturally centres, at the mouths of navigable streams, at the terminations of canals and railroads, do require accessible, convenient, and safe harbors; wherever such do not exist, it is believed to be the duty of Congress to provide the means for their construction.

Compare the expenditures of the General Government for objects of admitted national utility, in the new States, with the munificent appropriations for our maritime cities; for the improvement and defence of the seaboard, and the protection of our foreign commerce, wherever a sail whitens the ocean. Look at your marble palaces for custom-houses, rivalling in architectural beauty and grandeur, the splendid edifices of Greece and Rome; look at your granite dry docks at Boston and Norfolk; look at the impregnable defences of your seaports; look at your line of battle ships under cover in your navy yards—all constructed at the expense of the Treasury of the United States; look at your Delaware breakwater, which has already cost the Government over fifteen hundred thousand dollars, and is only half completed—then turn your eyes to the western lakes, and behold the unprotected condition of your internal commerce; witness the annual sacrifice of the lives of American citizens in navigating those dangerous seas; the vast destruction of property in gales and storms, owing almost entirely to the want of accessible and safe harbors for shipping. Who can fail to perceive, at a glance, the great inequality which prevails in the distribution of the favors of the Government? the marked injustice of Congress towards the neglected public interests of the West? This unequal state of things should no longer exist—a speedy remedy ought to be provided. The people of the West have the right to demand that equal and exact justice should be done alike to all portions of the Union presenting substantial claims for the consideration of Congress. They desire nothing more. In the present condition of our finances, with a Treasury overflowing, all the various branches of the public service may be abundantly provided for, and the leading interests of the country protected, which fall within the constitutional powers of Congress, without imposing the slightest additional burden upon the people.

Mr. C. said he could not conclude, without expressing his acknowledgments to the Committee of Ways and Means, for raising the appropriation for the improvement of Big Sodus bay at his own request, from five thousand dollars, as contained in the original bill, to twelve thousand. The necessity of the increase was the more urgent, as an incorporated company was now engaged in the construction of a canal, of large dimensions, to connect Sodus bay with the Erie canal and Cayuga lake. When the bar, at the entrance of this harbor, between the piers, shall be removed to a sufficient depth, it will become one of the best harbors for shipping on Lake Ontario. The harbor is spacious, the water within the bar, is of sufficient depth for a ship of the line—the anchorage is good; it possesses, moreover, the important advantage of being a convenient refuge for vessels in severe gales.

FORTIFICATIONS AT NEW LONDON, &c.

REMARKS OF MR. INGHAM, OF CONNECTICUT,

In the House of Representatives, February 24, 1837—

In Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on the motion of Mr. PARKS of Maine, to reconsider the vote of the committee agreeing to an appropriation of $59,000 for the construction of fortifications at New London, and $20,000 for a like object at the mouth of Connecticut river, in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. INGHAM said, that as the amendment submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. Cambreleng) contemplated the construction of fortifications at two different points in the State of Connecticut, he was desirous of making a few remarks in reference to its proposed reconsideration, though it was not his intention, at this late period of the session, to detain the committee with a lengthy argument.

The amendment embracing this appropriation, (said Mr. I.) had been adopted in a manner too decisive, he had thought, to have admitted a further question of its expediency. Nor was there at this time a solitary objection to it interposed. But the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Parks,) failing in a proposition to secure the construction of a similar work at the mouth of the Penobscot, in his own State, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which this amendment was adopted. The gentleman scarcely objected to the expediency, the importance, and even the necessity of the measure; indeed it would be difficult for him to find an objection entitled to the serious attention of the committee; but since an appropriation for a similar work in Maine had been denied, therefore the gentleman proposed to retaliate by doing to Connecticut the same injustice he complained of towards his own State! Leaving the honorable member to justify this course as his own sense of propriety might dictate, it was quite certain that an opposition originating in such motives would hardly commend itself to the notice of that House, and, unless sustained by more weighty reasons than the loss of an appropriation for another object, could surely meet with but little favor.

The amendment under consideration provided for the appropriation of $50,000 for fortifications at New London, and $20,000 for a like object at the mouth of the Connecticut, as a defence to the coast, and protection to the commerce of that river, and section of the country. There was a bill before the House, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, embracing an appropriation for the construction of a new public work at New London, but it had no reference to any other part of the State. That bill also related exclusively to new works not yet commenced, embracing no provision for such as had fallen to decay, or those of a more recent date already in progress but not completed. A bill, precisely identical with this, was reported by the same committee at the last session, but not acted upon; and it was at least problematical, whether it would ever receive the action of Congress; or, in the event of such action, whether it might be of a favorable nature.

In view of these circumstances, and of the defenceless condition of our seaboard, it was, early in the present session, thought advisable by one of Mr. I.'s colleagues (Mr. Haley) and himself, to call the special attention of the Secretary of War to the subject. They accordingly addressed to him a written communication, containing a statement, somewhat in detail, of the facts, and requesting that suitable measures might be adopted, to place that part of the coast alluded to in a more perfect state of defence. After full consideration, the Secretary made a response, by recommending to the Committee on Military Affairs, the appropriations contained in this amendment; that committee approved of the recommendation, and subsequently transferred it to the Committee of Ways and Means, whose more appropriate duty it was to report the necessary appropriations for rebuilding or repairing old works, or completing those already commenced. The measure was likewise approved of by that committee, who had instructed their chairman to report the necessary appropriation for carrying it into effect, by way of amendment to the general bill. It would, therefore, be seen that it had received the sanction of the Secretary of War, and of two of the standing committees of the House, and he hesitated not to say, that there was not an item in the whole bill which had been subjected to an examination so rigid, or which was more fully sustained by the united opinions of those specially charged with the consideration of such subjects.

Nor, continued Mr. I. did this proposition rest upon the bare opinions of Secretaries and committees, valuable and conclusive, in the opinions of many, as such authority might be. A mere cursory examination of the vicinity in which it was proposed to construct those fortifications, and of its former history, would alone be sufficient to satisfy any one that no part of the country was so destitute of protection, and that, with few exceptions, none had suffered more severely for want of it.

The whole southern boundary of the State of Connecticut from Rhode Island on the east to New York on the west, bordered on the waters of Long Island Sound, and, throughout the whole distance, there was nothing, except at New London, deserving even the name of a fortification; and the amount which had been expended even at that point was comparatively trifling, compared with its vast importance. The sea-board contained, in a succession of towns and cities, a dense and wealthy population, presenting, by their exposed situation, every possible motive and facility for invasion. The Sound being in the immediate vicinity of the city of New York, and having Long Island on the south, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and a part of New York on the north; commanding also the entrance to the Thames and Connecticut rivers; furnishing an outlet to their commerce and navigation: and, at the same time, affording, in Gardner's Bay and other harbors, a convenient station for a naval force, has; as a favorite resort for ships of war always constituted a valuable and desirable point of acquisition to an enemy. Such was the fact in the late war, and in that of the revolution. A superior naval force in the Sound was always sure to command Long Island, and is thus enabled to occupy its numerous bays and harbors with perfect security, and in full view of a densely populated sea-board, extending a distance of one hundred and fifty miles, with innumerable points of access, and destitute of the most limited means of defence. Indeed there was no portion of the whole Atlantic coast, of an equal extent, so liable to invasion. In some sections of the country, the parts bordering on the sea present no motive for attack; at others, the approach of an enemy is prevented by shoals and obstacles of a similar nature; and where such was not the case, the dangers of an open sea in the rear rendered it hazardous for ships of war to land an armament, and await its return. In that part of the coast, however, for whose protection this amendment provided, no such difficulties existed. An enemy had simply to pass around the eastern extremity of the island, which, notwithstanding the very efficient means of defence at Fort Adams could be accomplished without difficulty, take a position in almost any part of the Sound, or in the bays or harbors of Long Island, and there wait in security an opportunity to land on the defenceless shore at the north. By embracing a favorable occasion, a force such as could be, without difficulty, furnished by two or three ships of the line, might land upon the coast, obtain possession of its villages, and complete any work of destruction to which a state of hostility would point, and then, under cover of the night, secure a retreat. Their power, moreover, would not be limited to the immediate sea-coast. The Connecticut river, in the absence of adequate defence at its mouth, offers a convenient channel for extending invasion to the interior. The navigation of the river, and of that section of the country which, from causes of frequent occurrence, was often impeded, thereby compelling vessels to occupy a station within a short distance of the Sound, must ever present a mark of destruction impossible to be overlooked. The consequences of such exposure are too obvious for detail.

Mr. I. said, however, he might be excused for alluding to the amount of property which was thus consigned to the forbearance of any who might come in the character of an enemy. The Connecticut river, at the mouth of which it was proposed, by this amendment, to erect a small but permanent work of defence, and which ranked as the most important in the Eastern States, arose near the limits of Canada, and extended through the whole of New England to Long Island Sound. It was navigable for boats two hundred and fifty miles, for sloops and ordinary coasting vessels to the city of Hartford, and for vessels of a much larger class to the city of Middletown, a distance of nearly forty miles. The valley of the Connecticut, through which this river passed, in fertility of soil and capability of resources was scarcely equaled, and not surpassed by any country in the world; and, in addition to the places already named, the banks of the river, from its mouth almost to the confines of Canada, present a series of populous and flourishing villages, whose inhabitants have embarked their capital in a manner peculiarly exposed to hostile incursions.

Shipbuilding constituted an extensive branch of enterprise to those residing within a short distance of the Sound. The manufacturing interests also, in that part of New England, were of superior importance, and, in connection with the amount of property invested in commerce, were obviously deserving of attention.

An honorable gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Hall) had thought proper to oppose this amendment as utterly unimportant; but, surely, a moment's consideration must satisfy him that the citizens of his own State, and all others residing near the banks of the Connecticut, had more than an ordinary interest in fortifying the harbor at its mouth—a conclusion at which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Grennell) had early arrived, and, from the time of its introduction, given it his efficient support. The commerce of that river, universally admitted to be extensive and important, was the joint product of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. It afforded the only channel through which the various articles of domestic use and consumption, and the raw material for manufactures, were carried to the centre of New England; and through which, in return, the produce of the country found a market in the Atlantic and West India ports.

Such, said Mr. I. were the interests, and such the section of country, which would be left exposed to plunder and destruction, in case of a war, should the motion of the gentleman from Maine prevail. They had been referred to more in detail than he at first intended; but, without some definite information, gentlemen from other States could not be presumed to have such an intimate acquaintance with simply local facts as would enable them to do justice to the question. The exposed condition of property in that region was not merely imaginary. It was a fact, undoubtedly familiar to gentlemen from the east, that the want of suitable defence at the precise point contemplated, had been the occasion of severe suffering to a portion of the people of Connecticut. During the late war with Great Britain a detachment from the British squadron, then in Long Island Sound, entered the Connecticut river under cover of the night, passed up a distance of eight miles to a flourishing village on its right bank, and before sunrise the next morning burnt twenty-one sail of vessels, many of them large and valuable merchant ships, and all private property, which ordinary prudence on the part of the Government would have furnished with adequate defence. The value of property thus destroyed, in less than two hours, was more than sufficient to have constructed a fort and garrisoned it during the whole war; and the question now recurred whether, with millions of surplus, which Congress had tasked its wisdom in endeavoring to dispose of, they would appropriate this comparatively small sum for the protection of so large a branch of the commercial interests of the country.

A similar state of affairs might again produce similar, or, indeed, far more disastrous results; and he trusted that a full consideration of its importance would satisfy gentlemen of the necessity of some legislative action upon the subject.

Mr. I. said he would request the indulgence of the committee for a few moments to the remaining point contemplated by the amendment—the harbor of New London, at the mouth of the Thames. In the report of the Chief Engineer, communicated to this House on the 30th of March, 1836, "New London harbor" is said to be "highly important to the commerce of Long Island Sound; and as a port of easy access, having great depth of water, and easily defended, is an excellent station for the navy. It is valuable, also, as a shelter for vessels bound out or home, and desirous of avoiding a blockading squadron off Sandy Hook." Indeed, sir, said Mr. I. this harbor is one of the most eligible for ships of war on our maritime frontier, and would be invaluable to an enemy invading that part of the coast. It is, or, in more appropriate terms, ought to be, defended by Forts Griswold and Trumbull. The latter is an old and imperfect work, though in a state of tolerable preservation, and is situated on the west side of the harbor, near its mouth. At that place a garrison is constantly maintained. Fort Griswold, on the opposite side, is in a dilapidated condition, and has not been garrisoned since the late war. From its elevated position it is a work of superior importance; commanding not only the city and harbor of New London, but a direct approach to its adjunct, Fort Trumbull. While the defence and security of this harbor have always been admitted a matter of primary importance, comparatively nothing has been done towards effecting it. In June, 1813, the frigate United States, and her prize, the Macedonian, entered the harbor for protection. They were closely pursued by a British squadron, under Commodore Hardy, which was met at the mouth of the river, and kept in check until the ships could be removed a greater distance up the river, and there moored in safety. The farther advance of the British squadron was, for several days, restrained, through apprehensions of danger from the two forts, whose real and absolutely defenceless condition was not discovered by them until some time subsequently. But the fact is material, as exhibiting the necessity of such constructions, and the probable safety that would have resulted from them in a state of perfect defence. The inhabitants of the immediate vicinity were more thoroughly apprized of their true condition. Lest the enemy should land in sufficient force to obtain possession of the blockaded ships, the militia were called out in their defence, and the citizens of Connecticut may always recur with pride to the readiness with which that call was answered. It is a fact in history, which reflects upon them the highest honor, that when the public armed ships of the United States were left defenceless within their limits, they relinquished political hostilities, never before equalled in bitterness, and united in defending them. The presence of those ships within her territory produced dangers, annoyances, and invasions, which Connecticut, in every probability, would otherwise have escaped. Attacks upon our villages, the plunder and destruction of private property, and constant alarms and skirmishes with the enemy, were, through the want of suitable fortifications, the consequence of protecting the national vessels. But they were protected, and retained in security, until the close of the war. Our claims for these services have been sleeping in the public archives for more than twenty years, neglected and forgotten, and, sir, these are the services, and these the militia, which you have this day solemnly voted never to remunerate.

Large appropriations have been expended by the General Government in the construction of fortifications at most of the important stations in the Union, but it is a source of regret to find the State of Connecticut so entirely overlooked.

The amount appropriated by the Federal Government, from 1791 to 1833, for fortifications in Massachusetts, is $607,698 46. In the State of New York, $3,504,412 15, and in the State of Rhode Island, from 1791 to January 1st, 1837, $1,220,268 40. By reference to the expenditures for similar objects in Connecticut, it will be found that, during the same period, they amount to only $79,196 29. Including the appropriations for the present year, this discrepancy is still further increased. A bill on your table which, liberal as it is in expenditures in other States, I shall still vote for, believing them to be expenditures which the defence of the country require, contains a further appropriation of $100,000 for Fort Adams at Newport, and a similar amount for Fort Schuyler on Throgs point, New York. But the question naturally arises, why this difference exists? why Rhode Island, with a sea coast of only about forty miles in extent, shares so liberally in the public favor, and Connecticut, with more than ninety miles of coast, more exposed in situation, and containing interests at least equally demanding attention, obtains no share in those distributions.

In reference to the expenditures for these objects, in the States alluded to, I wish not to be misunderstood. Their public utility and importance is readily admitted. The objection is to another branch of the subject; to that partial legislation, which can see the necessity of fortifications in one State, and become conveniently blind when its attention is directed to another.

It is indeed true, as suggested by gentlemen during the discussion, that a work of this description can be of no great practical utility in time of peace; but the same is true of one half of the navy, and the greater part of the fortifications throughout the country. The whole system is one of precautionary measures, adopted in anticipation of future events, which, whether they are ever to occur, is a matter of contingency.

[The debate was renewed when the bill came into the House, and, on Mr. I.'s motion, the whole clause was again taken up, and the item of $50,000 for New London agreed to, and is now incorporated in the bill. It is due also to Mr. I. to state that the foregoing speech, as it appears, has not undergone that gentleman's revision.—Rep.]

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

REMARKS OF MR. NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN,

In Senate, March 1, 1837—The resolution of Mr. WALKER, in favor of the immediate acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, being under consideration.

Mr. NORVELL said, that somewhat more than two months ago, the President had transmitted a message to the Senate of the United States, concerning the civil, political, and military condition of Texas, and its relations with Mexico. In that message he observed the following passage: "It is true, that with regard to Texas, the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, the Chief of the Republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized Government of Texas annihilated within its confines. But, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Mexico. The Mexican Republic, under another Executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader, and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion. Upon the issue of this threatened invasion, the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence, at such a crisis, could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have heretofore held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions." It is true, sir, that this second invading army has not penetrated into Texas. It is true that not a hostile foot is to be found in Texas. But it is equally true, that the late Chief of the Mexican Republic has been released from imprisonment by the Texan Government, and that he has returned home. It is probable that this course was agreed upon by both of the contending parties, with the understanding, that if public sentiment in Mexico should be found to authorize it, the Mexican Chief would himself recognise the independence of Texas. If no such understanding had taken place, was it certain that another invasion of Texas, more formidable than the first, would not be attempted? In either event, it would be more prudent, more wise, more consistent with the delicate relations which exist between the United States and Mexico, to wait until we can see the result of the return to that country of the Mexican Chief, before we venture upon the decisive measure of recognition, and of throwing additional embarrassment into the way of a peaceful adjustment of our serious differences with Mexico. The policy of this Government, with regard to foreign nations, and to the domestic contests which take place among them for power, has, from the time of Washington to the present day, always been cautious, prudent, and strictly impartial. We have waited until their new Governments had acquired stability, and were placed beyond the probability of change, before we recognised their independence.

The Executive of this country could not, it would be remembered, be induced to acknowledge the independence of the Spanish American Republics, until they had carried on their struggles with Spain for several years; and this, too, when we had no serious differences to adjust with that monarchy. The contest for Texan independence has not been going on for more than about one year. We have, at this time, difficulties of great magnitude with the Republic of Mexico. The Senate, two days ago, unanimously voted against the adoption of any hostile measure towards that republic. And could they now, consistently with that vote, prematurely commit the peace of the nation? Could they now honorably take advantage of the weakness and distractions of Mexico, and recognise the independence of Texas, without knowing what course the Mexican Chief himself would take on the subject? Would this be magnanimous? A short delay would remove all difficulty. This delay would not be inconsistent with the indulgence of all our sympathies for the Texans. In a month or two, we should learn the views of Santa Anna in relation to Texas. In the mean time the Executive, charged with the foreign relations of the country, ought to be permitted to act according to circumstances, upon his own responsibility, with respect to the acknowledgment of Texan independence. This course would be in harmony with the action of the other branch of the Legislature on the subject. They had made an appropriation to enable the President to send a diplomatic agent to Texas, whenever he should receive satisfactory evidence that she was actually an independent power, and deemed it expedient to send a minister to that country. Mr. Norvell, therefore, submitted a substitute to the original resolution, declaring "that whenever information, satisfactory to the President of the United States, should be received, that Texas has in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties, and of fulfilling the obligations, of an independent power, it will be expedient to acknowledge the independence of that Republic." It would, he said, be observed, that while the language and spirit of his amendment were similar, in most respects to the resolution adopted at the last session on the same subject, there was this material variation in the amendment from the resolution: that was an abstract declaration; this devolved upon the President the responsibility of deciding when such a state of things might exist as to justify the recognition of Texan independence. The amendment would obviate the necessity of delaying this recognition until the next session of Congress, if, in the judgment of the President, it could be safely and wisely made before that time.

CONNECTICUT MILITIA CLAIMS.

REMARKS OF MR. INGHAM, OF CONNECTICUT

In the House of Representatives, February, 1837—Upon the motion of Mr. TOUCEY to amend the Army Bill, by inserting a clause for the payment of the claim of the State of Connecticut for the services of her militia during the late war.

Mr. INGHAM said that, although that was a question of more than ordinary interest to the people of Connecticut, as involving a claim of that State upon the General Government of nearly one hundred thousand dollars, it was, in his judgment, quite as important to know whether Congress would constantly refuse to pay a demand against which no serious objection could be raised. The claims of Massachusetts, resting on precisely analogous grounds, had been recognised and paid, but no disposition had been shown to meet those of Connecticut; and he was desirous of having the question settled, whether Connecticut was entitled to the same justice which had been dispensed to Massachusetts and other States. The claim was for services rendered by the militia, and disbursements made, during the late war with Great Britain. By a resolution of the last session, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported a bill for its liquidation and payment; and the amendment, which was proposed and lost in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which was then under consideration, was a literal transcript of the substantial parts of that bill.

But, said Mr. I. it was asserted by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee that this amendment could not be incorporated into this bill. That, indeed, was a new discovery, for there was no rule of the House opposed to it; and, in point of fact, that very bill had been so amended, both in the Senate and in the House, as to make provision for the payment of the Tennessee volunteers in 1836, or, in other words, to pay the militia of Tennessee. The two cases were, in principle, perfectly analogous; and the only tangible difference between them was, that the demand of Tennessee originated within the last twelve months, while those of Connecticut had been of twenty-two years standing. The bill appeared to be competent for meeting the claims of the Tennessee volunteers, and when the amendment for that purpose was offered, no such objections were heard from the gentleman; but when it was proposed to satisfy other claims by a similar amendment, the gentleman immediately discovered that such a proceeding was not in order. They had been told that it was proper to provide in that bill for the claim of Tennessee, because it had been subjected to the examination of the Committee of Claims. True, and the claim of Connecticut had been subjected to the examination of the Committee on Military Affairs. They were both standing committees of that House, and equally entitled to its confidence and respect. The objection, at best, was a mere matter of form, and if it was intended to act upon the subject at all, a more suitable opportunity could not be presented.

Gentlemen have said that they were ready to meet this claim whenever the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs should come up in its order. But wherefore not meet it at once? The claims of other States had been transferred to, and incorporated in, the bill under consideration, instead of being suffered to remain on the calendar, and come up in their order, and where could exist the validity of the objection against the claim of Connecticut taking the same course? It was well understood by every member there, that unless the amendment should be incorporated into the bill, the subject could not possibly receive the action of that Congress. Mr. I. hoped, therefore, that he should hear no more said about taking up this claim in its order, and especially by gentlemen who proposed to be friendly to it.

It was said by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Hardin,) that about $200,000 were appropriated at the last session of Congress to improve the harbors within the State of Connecticut, and that she was "a favored State." It would be difficult to see the precise bearing of this fact, even if it were correctly stated, upon the question before the House. It was true that Congress did, at the last session, so far open its eyes to the neglected condition and just claims of Connecticut, as to appropriate about $55,000, not $200,000, as stated by the gentleman, to advance the interests of commerce in that State. What was meant by the declaration that she was "a favored State," Mr. I. knew not, unless it was an act of favor to refuse payment of her honest claims upon the General Government, which had been due more than twenty years.

But the gentleman did not stop there. He had asserted that the Executives of some of the New England States, during the late war, withheld the command of their militia, when in the service of the United States, from the officers of the United States, and that he would never consent to pay for the services of militia under such circumstances; and the gentleman said he wished to know if this claim was not obnoxious to that objection. Sir, (said Mr. I.) I will advert to the history of that claim; and, when I shall have done so, I greatly mistake the character of the honorable gentleman if he himself would not be willing to vote for its payment.

During the first year of the war, but little expense had been incurred for the defence of that State; but, in June, 1813, the frigate "United States," and her prize "the Macedonian," were driven into her waters for protection, by a superior naval force of the enemy. They were removed a short distance from the Sound to a place of greater security, where they remained until the close of the war. The coast, throughout its whole extent, was immediately laid under a strict blockade, which was rigidly enforced until the peace of 1815. There was imminent danger that the enemy would debark in the vicinity of New London, pass over land to the ships in the river, and destroy them. To prevent such an occurrence, the militia were immediately called out in sufficient force, placed under the command of a brigadier general in the service of the United States, and posted on both sides of the river, between the British squadron and the ships. In consequence of this movement these vessels were preserved; but the enemy soon commenced the pillage and destruction of private property. Numerous vessels were taken in Long Island sound, and in April, 1814, a great amount of shipping was destroyed in Connecticut river. In August of the same year, an attack was made upon the village of Stonington. The skill and gallantry with which the place was defended, were matters of history, and required no commendation. The commerce of the State was suspended, and almost entirely prostrated, from June, 1813, to the close of the war. It was one of the most gloomy periods of their political history. Differences of opinion as to war, and the course of policy pursued by those in power, greatly embarrassed the administration of the General Government. The militia, however, with the most patriotic motives, rallied for the preservation of the public property—the ships of war. They did preserve them. They were saved from recapture and destruction by the enemy through their patriotic efforts. They devoted their time, they expended their money, and they hazarded their lives, for the protection of the property and honor of the nation. The enemy were compelled to recede, and the ships remained in security until the close of the war. The great and wanton destruction of private property, during that period, was justly attributable to the fact, that the national vessels occupied the waters of that State, and were defended by her militia; yet (said Mr. I.) they asked no compensation for the vast amount of individual loss and suffering, but simply remuneration for services rendered, and disbursements actually made, in defending our ships of war, when they were unable to defend themselves. A more meritorious claim could not, in his opinion, be imagined. It had subsequently, in 1816, been presented to the Government for allowance, with all the vouchers and evidences in its support; but was rejected, for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, and which he [Mr. Ingham] would now briefly consider.

The militia in question had been called into service under a requisition of the National Executive, and commanded by an officer of the National Government, until the 12th of September, 1814, when the command was assumed by a major general of militia, under the Executive of the State.

No change, however, occurred in the plan of operations, but the campaign was properly and successfully conducted.

It was (he said) well known that a difference of opinion existed between the chief Executive of the Union, and the Executives of several of the New England States, in reference to the true construction of the 3d section of the 1st article, and the 2d section of the 2d article, of the Constitution of the United States, relating to the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. An opinion was entertained, by many of the distinguished jurists in New England, that the militia of the States, when in the service of the United States, should continue to be commanded by their own officers, and not by those of the General Government. This opinion was embraced both by the Executive of Massachusetts, and by the Supreme Court of that State, to which the question had been submitted. Assuming such to be the true construction of the Constitution, the Governor of Massachusetts refused to submit the militia of that State to the command of the officers of the General Government. The Governor of Connecticut, having also adopted similar views, accordingly on the 12th of September, as already stated, transferred the command of the militia near New London to a major general of that body. The Executive of the United States properly resisted such a forced construction of the Constitution, and refused to allow any claim for the services of militia rendered under circumstances of that character. At a subsequent date, however, when the asperity of party contests had, in some measure, subsided, Mr. Monroe, at that time President of the United States, was induced, by the solicitations of the State of Massachusetts, then urging her claim, to review the subject, and though he strictly adhered to his former construction of the Constitution, under which the claims of Massachusetts and Connecticut had been disallowed, yet in view of the modified tone of public sentiment, and the disclaimer by the then Executive of the former State of the principle maintained by his predecessor, he thought it advisable to waive the obligation. In a special message upon this subject, communicated to Congress on the 23d of February, 1824, he says:

"I have been led to conclude, on great consideration, that the principles of justice, as well as a due regard for the great interests of our Union, require that this claim, in the extent proposed, should be acceded to. Essential service was rendered, in the late war, by the militia of Massachusetts, and with the most patriotic motives. It seems just, therefore, that they should be compensated for such service in like manner with the militia of the other States. The constitutional difficulty did not originate with them, and has now been removed. It comports with our system to look to the service rendered, and to the intention with which it was rendered, and to award the compensation accordingly, especially as it may now be done without the sacrifice of principle. The motive, in this instance, is the stronger, because well satisfied I am, that, by so doing, we shall give the most effectual support to our republican institutions. No latent cause of discontent will be left behind. The great body of the people will be gratified, and even those who now survive, who were then in error, cannot fail to see, with interest and satisfaction, this distressing occurrence thus happily terminated. I therefore consider it my duty to recommend to Congress to make provision for the settlement of the claim of Massachusetts, for services rendered in the late war by the militia of the State, in conformity with the rules which have governed in the settlement of the claims for services rendered by the militia of the other States."

Upon the communication of that message, and also upon a memorial from Massachusetts, Congress proceeded to the consideration of the subject, and, after the most mature deliberation, adopted the views of the President, determined to allow the claims, and an act was accordingly passed providing for their settlement. Under that act a great proportion of them had already been paid, and it only remained for Congress, in the present instance, to follow the same course of proceeding, and leave no further sources of jealousy or complaint. The two cases were, in all respects, precisely parallel, and the objections to them the same. Massachusetts and Connecticut had proceeded together in their difficulties with the General Government, and were, nearly at the same time, found to entertain different political sentiments. He was not (he said) and never had been, one of those who approved the peculiar opinions that had given rise to those difficulties, but he believed that no consideration of that nature ought to influence him, or any other member of the House, in determining the merits of this claim. Adverting once more to the character of the claim, he would no longer detain the House. The Connecticut militia were not called into service by State authority, but under a requisition of the President; and the motives with which that call was responded to; the nature of the services rendered, their importance in securing the national property from destruction, were all facts which could not fail to commend their claim to the most favorable attention of Congress. It had never been met by any legislative enactment, but was rejected by the President rather on the ground of expediency than positive law. The only objection ever offered to their validity had been waived by him who was principally instrumental in raising it. It had been abandoned by the President, and the payment of similar claims to the State of Massachusetts had been directed by Congress. After some further remarks, Mr. I. concluded by expressing a hope that, in the room of any further delay, the amendment under consideration would be adopted.

[The amendment was adopted by the House, engrafted on the bill, which was passed, and having been concurred in by the Senate, subsequently became a law.]

SPEECH OF MR. HUNTSMAN, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, March 2, 1837—
On the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, and an appropriation for a Minister to that Republic.

MR. HUNTSMAN said: Mr. Chairman, I must apologize to the House for requesting their attention for a short space of time, while I attempt to disabuse the people of Texas from the vast contumely and misrepresentation (unintentional, no doubt) which have been thrown upon them by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Masen,) and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Hoar.) Sensible as I am that neither of the honorable gentlemen would knowingly, or intentionally, either injure or misrepresent the Government or an individual of Texas, it becomes the more necessary, on my part, to present such a body of facts to Congress as will explain the original cause of the settlement of American citizens in Texas, the inducements and guarantees held out to them, the obligations imposed upon them, and a historical detail of the rise, progress, and operation of those causes of complaint, of oppression, injustice, and despotism, which were practised by the mother Government, which created the late civil wars in Texas, and which finally led to the establishment of the independence of those provinces. The high character which both of the honorable gentlemen have in this House and elsewhere, for talents and intelligence of the first order, would at once forbid the attempt, on my part, to measure strength with them in political discussions upon any subject, when such fearful odds are arrayed against me. But, sir, with one single advantage only, I will peril myself in this conflict. I hold the sword of Truth in one hand, and the eternal principles of Justice in the other. With these I will go forth, conquering and to conquer; and I will not only promise the gentlemen themselves, but all mankind, and as many of the ladies as are here to listen to me, that they have been misinformed, deluded, and wholly mistaken, in the history and facts appertaining to the connection, and final separation, of Texas and Mexico. They have been misinformed in regard to the character of the emigrants to that country, the motives of their action, and the wrongs they have suffered. Many of them I know personally; many of them are my friends—have been my constituents; are equal, in point of talents, respectability, and high-souled patriotism, to any gentleman on this floor. Many who have gone to that country have been members of Congress, of State Legislatures, judges of courts, or occupied other high stations under this Government. I cannot consent to class these with the outlaws, the profligate, the banditti, and fugitives from justice, which the gentleman from Ohio seems to suppose constitute the mass of population in Texas. I ask that gentleman to distrust his information; if he has registered upon his memory the facts in relation to Texas that he has disclosed here to-night, I beg him to blot them out for ever. That no trace of them be left, I solicit him to go to the other branch of this Legislature, where the expunging process seems to be in operation, and have every particle of it expunged secundum artem from his mind.

I live in a section of the country convenient to Texas, where the intercourse between us is quite frequent; where our communications are uninterrupted; where many of the friends, relatives, and connections of my constituents have located themselves, and I claim the right to know something of the nature and character of the whole controversy. As time is precious, I will run rapidly over the main facts in relation to this matter, with the hope that when the House shall be put in full possession thereof, neither the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, nor a salary and outfit for a Minister, will be withheld from that country. Antecedent to the establishment of the imperial Government under Iturbide, in May, 1822, and while these colonies were struggling for independence from the yoke of old Spain, many Americans engaged in the Mexican service, to aid and assist in achieving that independence for the South American provinces, which was achieved. For these services the new Government had nothing to give, but promised those enterprising Americans large bounties of land. Amongst others of that day (who fought in the Mexican wars) of my acquaintance, there is one deserving of particular mention, I mean Colonel Reuben Ross of Tennessee. I believe he was a native of Virginia. He had a colonel's command in the Mexican service, and went through many hard fought battles with the royal forces, and upon one memorable occasion, when he was in command in an engagement, the various evolutions which are frequent in battles brought him in contact with the commander of the royal forces, both on horseback. The intrepid and gallant Ross, whose soul burnt high with patriotism and noble daring, attacked the Don in single combat. The Spaniard fell, and Ross lost a finger. The Government of Mexico awarded him a large body of land in Texas. He was my constituent: he lived then in a district I had the honor of representing in the Senate of Tennessee. After the independence of the country was established, and the authority of old Spain had ceased, Colonel Ross procured his grants for the lands, and upon his return home he was treacherously murdered, with most of his company, in the Mexican dominions, by those same Spaniards whom he had so long and so nobly fought to make free. I mention this fact to show that many of the Americans fought for the Mexicans then, as well as they have fought for the Texans since—that these lands were dearly bought. I could, if time would permit, cite many daring deeds of valor performed by Ross and others, which equal the battle of Jacinto, the Alamo, or any other, against the armies of old Spain. I contend that the Mexican Government has less reason to complain of an interference by volunteers from the United States, and of the propriety of our acknowledgment of the Texan independence, than any people upon the face of the earth. It was precisely what she implied of our citizens in her contest with old Spain. She sought the aid of our citizens to fight her battles. She sought our sympathies and our prayers for her success. She sought an acknowledgment of her independence while the royal armies were yet in some portions of the country, and in possession of some of the strongest forts. She obtained it all. And, presupposing that every word of complaint which has been so dolefully uttered by the gentlemen from Ohio and Massachusetts, in regard to our enterprising young men seeking service in the armies of Texas, is true, it is no more than was solicited, accepted, and sanctioned with great joy by the Mexicans, upon precisely a similar occasion between them and old Spain. Mexico was extremely willing to receive the voluntary aid of our enterprising men then; but, like the lawyer's ox that was bored by the bull of the farmer, it alters the case now.

But to proceed with the history: revolution succeeded revolution in the South American provinces and Spanish North America. In May, 1822, Gen. Iturbide, by fraud, force, and the assistance of the catholic priesthood, (who are in all countries more opposed to republican government and the liberty of man than any other sect,) established an imperial government, and was chosen emperor. The example of our Government, which lay contiguous, and the germs of liberty which began to sprout from an imperfect knowledge of our institutions, and an intermixture with a few of our men in their armies, in a short time produced another revolution. Iturbide was dethroned, a sentence of banishment was passed upon him; he went into exile, returned, was taken captive, and shot. Victoria was elected by the people; a republican constitution was formed, modelled in most of its leading principles in imitation of that of the United States; notwithstanding this, he had to encounter civil wars, conspiracies, treasons, and rebellions, during all his administration. Pedrasso, elected successor to Victoria, was in a short time deposed by Guerrero, who in his turn was deposed by Bustamante, and at length he was deposed and driven into exile by the modern Napoleon of the south, Santa Anna, who had waded through seas of blood and mountains of carnage, and the perfidy of the priesthood, to empire. He abolished the Congress of the Republic by a military decree, organized a tribunal composed of his own creatures in its place, merely to register his despotic decrees. He abolished the local legislatures, established military and arbitrary tribunals in their place, abolished the trial by jury, and settled down in a complete despotism of the worst kind, because it was a military one. To this prostration of the constitution that he had sworn and fought to support, the overthrowing of a government of liberty and laws, the abolishment of the trial by jury, and the establishment of a military despotism, the people of Texas objected. There was much of that Anglo Saxon blood, descended from that immortal band of Englishmen who took their honor in one hand and their sword in the other, and obtained magna charta from King John.

Santa Anna being enraged at the thought of resistance to his decrees from a few thousand Texans, when he had fought and conquered through millions until the imperial diadem was ready to be placed upon his head, swore utter extermination from the face of the earth of all the inhabitants of Texas, and particularly of the North American or Anglo Saxon race, not even sparing the women and children. With this view he started for Texas at the head of his hosts, to execute his infernal purpose. But, Mr. Chairman, it becomes necessary for me to leave him upon the road to Texas, and return to that gallant people, for the purpose of bringing up their history from where I left it, in the hands of the gallant Ross, before the establishment of the empire, under Iturbide. It will be held in remembrance that Ross and others received grants for their services performed against the royal forces of Old Spain, before the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. During all the civil wars and convulsions, conspiracies and rebellions, that took place in the Mexican republic, from the establishment of their federal constitution, in 1824, the Government had been inviting foreigners from every country to go and settle in Texas, and carry as many families as possible; every inducement was held out to invite emigration thither; large bounties of land were offered for this purpose. The reason for this proceeding was obvious. Being torn to pieces by civil and central revolutions, which, succeeding each other in rapid succession, their finances were exhausted, their armies were wasting away in civil wars, their convulsions were so quick and terrible that they could not spare either men or money to defend the frontiers against the habitual attacks of the Camanche and other hostile Indian tribes. Such a scourge had those Indians become to the frontier settlements and to Texas, that they at pleasure overran the Spanish towns and villages, took the inhabitants into captivity, and made servants of them. In other instances these hordes of barbarians would take possession of the frontier towns, compel the inhabitants, who were large owners of stock, to go and drive up their own horses, mules, and cattle, until these Indians would select all the most valuable of them, and drive them off, after committing acts of rapine and murder of the most atrocious character upon the inhabitants, and no help could be received from the Government at Mexico.

These enormities were repeated year after year, and no prospect of better things were in anticipation. To stop those lawless excursions of plunder, murder and robbery, to beat back those ferocious barbarians, and protect the Spanish citizens who were the annual victims of rapine and violence, the Mexican Government adopted the only practicable mode of affording that relief that she had in her power to render. It was to make large grants of land to citizens of the United States, who would either pay money at a stipulated price into their empty coffers, or who would settle down with one, two, three, or four hundred families upon those lands, and defend the country from the savage inroads.

I personally knew of some companies who were organized in Tennessee. They elected their representatives, sent them to the city of Mexico, publicly and notoriously, without any guile, fraud or circumvention, to negotiate this business. I will mention the names of three of these representatives or ambassadors, who were despatched upon this mission: Col. Andrew Erwin, who had been for a number of years a member of the North Carolina and also Tennessee Legislatures, and a gentleman of considerable talents and experience, together with Doctor Douglass and Col. John D. Martin, a lawyer of high standing. They went, as well as the representatives from other companies, to the city of Mexico, and remained some months upon the business of this mission.

After a full examination of the constitution of 1824, establishing a federal government, with full guaranties for the perfect enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and a toleration of their religion, and other rights and immunities similar to our own, a number of purchases were made, mostly for the consideration of obtaining settlers upon these lands. Grants were issued. The grantees procured settlers and emigrated to the country. Immediately upon these events, the savage roamed no longer in hostile array over the plains of Texas. They were beat back into their own boundaries. The tomahawk and scalping knife rested from their labors. The Spaniard sat down under his own vine and fig tree, and enjoyed his property and the fruits of his industry in peace. The Anglo Saxon blood which had got into the country was a perfect guarantee against lawless depredation. The settlers furnished their own guns, their own provision, their own ammunition; the Mexican Government did not even furnish so much as one flint to aid in this matter.

But the frontier settlements were secured, when Bustamante undertook to overthrow the liberties of his country, in one of the many Mexican revolutions. Santa Anna declared himself the champion of the constitution of 1824, the defender of the Federal Government. He had previous to that defeated the last mad expedition that had been sent out by old Spain to subjugate the South American provinces. He became the hero of Tampico. The patriots of Mexico looked to him to put down the tyrant Bustamante. The Texans hoisted his flag—it was considered then the flag of liberty—they took two forts with their rifles, and left Santa Anna to operate in the centre, without having a foe in their country. He did operate; he deposed Bustamante. But, to the great mortification and disappointment of all the friends of liberty throughout the world, he got into power under pretence of patriotism, and instantly overturned the constitution of his country. He started to rivet the chains of despotism by abolishing free government, and substituting a military one, in the manner I before related. He came. The splendid defence of Col. Fanning, in destroying nine hundred of Santa Anna's men with less than half that number, and placing hors de combat several hundreds of others, will live immortal in story; and notwithstanding the warrior and his brave little band have sunk into the tomb by the blackest treachery, instead of the force of the Spaniard's prowess, yet ages unborn will drop a tear of admiration and sympathy upon the tombs of those immolated heroes as they pass the fated spot.

Next in order is the Alamo, where the brave and gallant Crockett, with his one hundred and fifty comrades, headed by himself and Col. Travers, made a defence against five and twenty hundred Mexicans, which would do honor to any general in any age. And although they fell, they fell like the strong man of old; they pulled down the pillars of Santa Anna's strength with them; for that immortal little band destroyed fourteen hundred of the enemies of liberty, and shed a lustre of immortality around their names which will secure them the brightest page in history. Their heroic deeds will be told in poetry and song to generations yet unborn, and the blood that was shed at the Alamo will generate millions of men, to fight the battles of freedom throughout the world.

A brilliant feat is yet to follow. Houston and his army was alive, and the God of battles was with them. The battle of San Jacinto soon followed, which sealed the tyrant's fate, redeeming a country from bondage, and proved to the world that tyranny and oppression cannot prevail against that indomitable Anglo Saxon spirit which is now pervading the whole earth.

I have, Mr. Chairman, given a brief history of the rise and progress of the Texas settlement and revolution, and placed the relations in which Texas stood to Mexico in a fair point of view, so that it may be understood by the House. I shall, as briefly as possible, answer some of the objections that have been made by the honorable gentleman from Ohio and Massachusetts to any immediate action upon this subject. The gentleman from Ohio seems to suppose, first, that the people of Texas should have waited longer, and petitioned the Mexican Government for a redress of grievances; and secondly, that our Government should give notice to Mexico, before we acknowledge the independence of Texas. I will examine these points in the order they are presented. The Texan Government selected one of her favorite sons, Austin, whose father had obtained large grants in Texas, to go to Mexico, for the express purpose of petitioning for a redress of grievances, and such modifications in the local government as suited the condition of the people, and which it would have been honorable to Mexico to grant. But, behold, she placed the agent in irons, kept him near twelve months in confinement; and no person could carry a petition, unless at the risk of his life, or incarceration in a dungeon. An order had already been issued to disarm the people of Texas, preparatory to their overthrow. The approaching crisis was too manifest and plain; and if I had been a Texan, I should not have carried a petition for a redress of grievances, when the certain reward was a pair of handcuffs, and the four walls of a prison.

The second point my friend from Ohio has presented for our consideration is, that we should give notice to Mexico that we intend to acknowledge the independence of Texas. This is certainly a new theory. There is no precedent upon earth for it. The United States acknowledged the independence of all the South American provinces, without giving any notification to Old Spain in regard to it. France, Spain, Holland, and the balance of the European Governments, acknowledged the independence of the United States, without notifying England thereof. We have only to look to the Government de facto, as has been most abundantly proven by my friend from North Carolina, (Mr. Bynum,) and are only bound to consult our own interest, discretion, and honor. Whenever we conclude that a Government is, in fact, independent, and is capable of fulfilling its obligations as a nation, to the rest of the nations of the earth, we can acknowledge her independence without violating the law of nations, or any moral obligation. France, Spain, and Holland acknowledged our independence before it was achieved entirely, and we acknowledged the independence of Mexico while the royal armies of Spain were in possession of the strongest forts in the country. I assert, sir, there is not now a Mexican foot that can tread upon the Texan soil. There is not one opposing man in the country. Texas, at this day, is more free than Mexico was when she received our acknowledgment, or than we were when we received that of France, Spain, and Holland. But the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Mason) complains that it is too soon—that Texas has not been independent long enough. I answer, that I have read much in the law books about the statute of limitations, barring certain remedies respecting private rights, and sometimes in relation to public concerns of a municipal character; but I have never read in any book that the statute of limitations can be brought to bar an acknowledgment of the independence of a nation; and I will venture to assert, that it can be found nowhere unless it is in Mason's Reports. The gentleman is mistaken in another position. The President of the United States did issue orders to all the proper authorities of the Federal Government to see that the laws of neutrality were executed, and which prohibited the American people from engaging in the war between the Mexicans and Texans. So far as he was concerned, he fulfilled the law; but if the adventurous men of the west had thought proper to engage in this war, five hundred thousand men could not have guarded all the passes on a coast which is, by land and sea, a thousand miles long. It is useless to think of it. If adventurous men thought proper to engage in this revolution, without the authority of Government, there is not a man in the United States, I apprehend, who supposes that to be a cause of war with Mexico. Are not large armies of volunteers, both from England and France, at this moment engaged in the civil wars of Spain? How many foreigners engaged in the late revolution in Greece! Have not the Swiss troops been hired by every nation in Europe who would employ them? Yet this is no cause of war against their Government. It is true that war might grow out of that or any thing else; but it might grow out of any thing else as well as that. It cannot be seriously contended that, by the law of nations, it is a cause of war, and will not, I am sure.

man from Massachusetts, and dispose of them in their order. I have always listened to that gentleman with pleasure, and often with profit. I am confident his ear has been greatly abused by the slanderers of Texas. He supposes that an unauthorized set of freebooters or outlaws have seized upon Texas; that the profligate and the spendthrift and fugitive from justice, constitute the population. I might have mentioned that the colonies settled by Austin, Robertson, Leftwick, and many others which were purchased in the manner I have before related, are men of the first respectability in this or any other country, some of whom would do honor to a seat on this floor, and will rank high as the benefactors of the freemen of Texas. These men carried many families of respectable standing to that country, to comply with the conditions of their respective grants. It is understood to be a fine soil, delightful climate, and admirably adapted to the cultivation of sugar, cotton, and many of the tropical fruits. It is a country where a man of industry can better his condition; and therefore, these settlers and grantees went there by express contract with the Mexican Government, and not as usurpers in any respect whatsoever.

It seems, however, that the gentleman from Massachusetts has learned from some source, which he considers satisfactory, that Texas has not, of her own soldiery, more than three hundred men, and that it was impossible for her to support her independence without foreign aid. I think that gentleman has been greatly misinformed as to this matter. At this time, she has five thousand men; but for the present, I will consider it in that point of view. I lay it down as a position that is incontrovertible, and which has been demonstrated by all history, that it does not depend so much upon the number of men to defend their rights, as it does upon that intellectual and moral force, and indomitable spirit, which determines that it will not submit to oppression and tyranny. Three hundred men, imbued with this spirit, are equal to a host. It was three hundred men who marched with Leonidas to the pass of Thermopylae, and met and for days defied Xerxes at the head of four millions of men; for days they arrested the progress of the greatest army Asia ever saw. This little Spartan band destroyed multitudes of their enemies, and but for treachery, would have destroyed multitudes more. Alexander the Great, with thirty-five thousand men, became master of all Asia, containing three hundred millions of people. The celebrated retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, has been the theme for poetry and song for many centuries past. The battle of the Alamo, of San Jacinto, and others, will be ranked, by posterity, as the marvellous events of the age, and will take their station in the chronological events of the times. But my friend from Massachusetts seems to entertain a contemptible opinion of these three hundred Texan soldiers. As contemptible as they may be, I declare, most solemnly, that I had rather be in their situation than in that of the eleven thousand Massachusetts militia who marched all around their own capital, during the last war, and would not fight at all. I should now, notwithstanding the gentleman and myself are getting to be old men, like right well to be placed at the head of these three hundred Texans, and place the gentleman at the head of the same eleven thousand militia men, and let us take a bout or two. I am of opinion that, while his eleven thousand would be philosophising upon constitutional scruples, and upon boundary lines, my men could play the game of decapitation to such an extent as to solve all constitutional scruples upon the subject. I would learn him not to despise numbers; for we are taught that the battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift, but that the Lord of hosts has some direction in these events; and, so far as human eyes can see, there has been a most signal manifestation of it in favor of Texas.

It appears that the gentleman from Massachusetts is dissatisfied with the number of ships and guns that constitute the army and navy of Texas. I shall try to prove by a physical, rather than a logical, process of reasoning, that Texas has a thousand ships and fifty thousand guns. I go upon the principle that enough is equal to a million, and that a part is equal to the whole. With the three ships and twenty-nine guns which the gentleman from Massachusetts assigns to Texas, they have whipped and taken all the Mexican vessels that dared to venture upon the coast. Therefore, they have precisely enough, and enough is equal to one thousand ships and fifty thousand guns.

What I have said, Mr. Chairman, has been for the ear of those who have thought less, and perhaps examined less, upon the subject of Texas than I have. Many have gone from my district, and settled in that country; some of them have laid down their lives in battling for their rights; others have relations yet remaining, who feel intensely for those who have gone there. This question must, and will, be disposed of at this session in some way. We cannot expect to satisfy all. It is needless to wait for that. If we were to wait until the morning of the resurrection, many here would not vote for the recognition. Other, and far different, motives than the situation of the contending parties, will govern the action of a portion of this House. There are some who feel somewhat aristocratical by nature, and have no right good will for republican forms of government any how. There are others, in the North and East, who think that an annexation of Texas to the United States might probably follow a recognition of her independence, and that the balance of power would be thrown in that direction. Others are fearful it will be a slaveholding country. We may as well meet the question at once. It has to be met, and that shortly. No one can possibly suppose that Mexico can ever reassert her power in Texas. If I were permitted to use the language of the heathen mythologists, I should say that an assembly of the gods had congregated for the express purpose of taking into consideration the wrongs and oppressions inflicted upon Texas, and that a decree had been registered in high heaven that Texas shall henceforth be free, sovereign, and independent.

REMARKS OF FAIRFIELD, OF MAINE.

In the House of Representatives, March 2, 1837—On the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837; the question pending before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was on the amendment of Mr. PEYTON of Tennessee, proposing to create a new office, the incumbent of which should be called the Superintendent of the Public Deposites, and who should have the management of the correspondence and business of the deposite banks with the Treasury Department.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said that though he was not accustomed to making long speeches in this House, he had taken notes of the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) and had intended to reply to him at length. But as it was near 4 o'clock in the morning, and as much impatience had been manifested by the few members remaining in the House, he felt that he should be doing injustice, both to himself and them, to commence a speech at that time. He would also add that all necessity for it had been obviated by the able vindication by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Hamer,) of the majority of the select committee, and of the resolves which they had adopted, as the result of its investigation, under the order of the House. He wished, however, to say a word or two in relation to that part of the gentleman's remarks which applied to himself personally. And, he said, he must confess that at some of those remarks, he felt that degree of indignation which every honest man should feel, when he considered his veracity questioned. But, he was happy to be relieved from the pressure of these feelings, by the subsequent qualification of his (Mr. Peyton's) remarks. [Mr. PEYTON again rose, and said that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he had not, in any remarks he had made, intended to impute wrong motives to the gentleman from Maine.] Mr. F. said he was glad of the explanation, and felt bound to suppress the remarks that he had at first intended to make. Inasmuch, however, as the gentleman from Tennessee had questioned the accuracy of his (Mr. F.'s) recollection, and the probability of his having used the epithets which had been attributed to him in the testimony of Mr. F. he felt it to be his duty to say a word in reply. He would not advert to those circumstances which went, in his estimation, to render it probable that those epithets had been used, for it might perhaps excite feelings which he had much rather see allayed. He had no unkind feelings to be gratified towards the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other human being. He would, however, inquire for a moment into the relative positions occupied by himself and that gentleman. It had been said that it was strange, he (Mr. F.) should have sat down, and committed such a string of epithets to writing. The reason for committing his recollection of the facts to writing, had been fully explained in his testimony, and he trusted that they would be deemed satisfactory to every candid mind. He had understood that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had, while he, (Mr. F.) was not present, made a statement of facts as to the unhappy occurrence in the committee room between Mr. P. and Mr. Whitney, and had called on the other members of the committee to make statements also. Not knowing how soon, or under what circumstances, he might be called on to make his own statement, he (Mr. F.) thought it would be well, while the facts were fresh in his recollection, to put them upon paper. He did so without consultation with any of the members of the committee; and feeling an anxiety which he thought would be natural to all, under similar circumstances, to know how far the recollection of others corresponded with his own, he had shown it to several of the other members of the committee; and, as he had stated in his testimony, was pleased to find that he was supported by them. If there was any thing wrong in all this, he could not see it. It certainly was not done in a spirit of unkindness to the gentleman from Tennessee, or the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) and with his present views he should do the same again. The principal question, however, was, as to the truth of this statement; or rather, in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, as to the probability of its correctness. And here he would ask if it had not been fortified and confirmed by the testimony of the gentlemen from Alabama, Ohio, and New York? There certainly was no contradiction between them in the slightest particular. And, in regard to the testimony of the chairman, (Mr. Garland,) who had been called by Mr. W. in his witness, he (Mr. F.) would ask, if there was not a substantial agreement with all the other witnesses? Now, what is there against all this concurrent testimony? The recollection of the gentleman from Tennessee, who was a party to the transaction. He (Mr. F.) would ask the House to recur to the statement of the transaction, made by the gentleman from Tennessee on the 4th of February last, and see how it would compare with the testimony of the chairman who had been called by him as a witness. It was to be supposed that it was intended for a full statement, one containing the whole truth; and yet how very far does it fall short of the testimony of the chairman, comprising scarcely a tithe of it, to say nothing of the testimony of the other witnesses. And now, standing thus, may it not well be inquired whether the attempt comes with a very good grace from the gentleman from Tennessee, to impugn the accuracy of his (Mr. F.'s) recollection? But, however, that may be, he was willing that this House, and the country, should decide between them. He would not question the motives of the gentleman from Tennessee—the inquiry was simply as to the accuracy of recollection. And he would also here take occasion to say, with the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Martin,) that he did not impugn the motives of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the investigation which had been principally prosecuted by him through the select committee. He had no doubt but that the gentleman had been misled and deceived. That he had been acting on information which had turned out to be false. And here he must be permitted to say, notwithstanding the strong expressions of the gentleman from Tennessee—that he did not see how any one, unbiased by political considerations, could find any confirmation of the resolves adopted by the committee, in the evidence in the case—that for his part he could not see how any one could come to any other conclusion from the evidence, unless he were laboring under some strange hallucination of mind. But as the members were worn down and almost exhausted, having been in session about nineteen hours, he would forbear entering more fully into the subject.

The resolves adopted by the committee were as follows:

1. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money, have not all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department.
2. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department, has been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of said Department.
3. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department is not conducted through any agent, but is transacted directly with the Secretary of the Treasury, or some officer of the Department.
4. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That no agent, in any way connected with the public deposits, since the removal of said deposits from the Bank of the United States, has received any compensation from the Treasury Department.
5. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That several of the deposit banks have employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, for the purpose of receiving and transmitting information affecting the interests of said banks, both from the Treasury Department and other sources, and transmitting public documents. That that agent is Reuben M. Whitney, who receives such salary from said banks as they annually deem his services worth.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS. SPEECH OF MR. BYNUM, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, 1837, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—On an amendment to the bill containing appropriations for the civil list, proposed by Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, to defray the expenses of a diplomatic agent to the Republic of Texas, which involved the consideration of the independence of that Government.

MR. BYNUM said that he had arisen on the present occasion to address the committee with feelings of peculiar diffidence, arising from a full consciousness of his own incompetency to do any thing like adequate justice to the magnitude of the considerations involved in the very important question, which was then before the committee. He would gladly have deferred entering into a discussion involving so many considerations, until another day. The lateness of the hour (eight o'clock at night) precluded the possibility of a full and impartial investigation of the various topics that, that subject necessarily involved.

He had hoped that the committee would have consented to rise, reported the bill to the House, and obtained leave to set again; but this it had refused to do, and the friends of the measure then before the House, were compelled to enter on the discussion of this most important subject, whether prepared or unprepared to do it that justice which its importance imperiously demanded. He had always felt the deepest reluctance to obtrude himself upon the attention of that House, or its committee, and he felt doubly more so on the present occasion, knowing the state of feelings that all parts of the committee must at that time experience from the tediousness and fatigue of one whole day's sitting. Sir, (said Mr. B.) I will not complain of any course that this honorable body may deem it fit to pursue on this or any other subject in relation to myself. I have my duties to perform here, as a member of this body, and shall endeavor to do them, as I have ever done, in as well as out of this House, openly, fearlessly, and, I hope, independently; and should I in the discharge of those duties, in the course of my remarks, become tedious, or use any thing personally offensive, it would arise from the peculiar attitude which the course of the committee has forced me to assume, and not from any intentional feeling, on my part, to inflict any wound on the feelings of that body, or any of the humblest members of it, if there be any more so than others.

Now, sir, with these preliminary remarks, I will beg the attention of the committee to the subject before them. What was that subject? It is a simple proposition for this committee to determine on the existence of a certain fact, in relation to the existence or non-existence of a certain independent community. The amendment proposed by the honorable member from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson,) was for the appropriation of a certain sum for the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent to be sent to the independent Republic of Texas, and for the expenses of running the boundary line between the United States and the Government of Texas; which proposition involved in its decision the affirmation or negation of the existence of an independent community or Government in the territory of Texas.

He was truly glad that the House had at last been placed in a situation from which it could no longer escape from acting upon a subject so indispensably necessary, as well for the honor and high character of this Government, as for its true interest and national policy.

He had regretted, and had looked on with pain for some time, in witnessing the part that the majority of that House had been playing off on that subject during the greater part of the last session, and the entire part of this session up to the present moment. While he felt incapable of lecturing the House for any course it might in its wisdom pursue upon that or any other subject, yet he must confess that he, as well as the greater part of those who had observed the progress of this measure, had looked with disgust and indignation on their truckling, skulking, and shrinking from this question, which had been so much evinced, whenever any matter touching it had been called up there. If there was any thing either odious or alarming in its agitation, he for one had not had the astuteness to detect it. Why, then, this sudden timidity? this extraordinary precaution on the present, more than on every similar occasion? What was there novel or unprecedented in passing on the present proposition? If a stranger had been present, and were to judge from the course that certain honorable gentlemen had pursued, whenever an intimation had been made, near or remote, touching the present subject, he would have instantly concluded that it must have been one of a most extraordinarily novel nature, conjured up, too, perhaps, by the spirit of some foul demon, whose touch threatened little less than our political annihilation. Sir (said he) such a course on such a subject, he was free to confess, augured, to his mind, the most inauspicious results. He saw nothing to justify it in the conduct of politicians whose object was a straight-forward course, and fair dealing.

The people of this country were too intelligent to have eternally played off on them this game of political shuttlecock.

There was a time at which, when nations and politicians, as well as individuals, should assume the responsibility of their acts. This dodging and evasion of important questions, is not the true character of the American Congress; it is not in pursuance with the high-minded and illustrious examples given us by the patriots and statesmen of former days. It was not of them, to shuffle off the responsibility of meeting any questions however momentous. They had never shrunk from the assertion of a fact, that they knew to exist. Sir, he said, let us have no more of this? for the honor and dignity of our common country, if not for its policy and interest; let us not seek to avoid by evasions and indirection, that which we dare meet directly. It is pusillanimous to be afraid to assert, which we know, and all mankind conversant with the true history of the country know, to be the facts.

But, sir, is it proper that this nation should now decide on this simple question of fact, as to the independent, or dependent, existence of this community, that is now located in the Territory of Texas, under all circumstances.

I say it is incumbent on this Government to assert the fact, either negatively or affirmatively—that it is incumbent on this Government to do so, as an independent sovereignty, and which becomes apparent from the very necessity of the case. Our own interests require it, and justice demands it. Our protection and self-preservation require it; and I will show, independently of its expediency and necessity, we had precedents and examples abundantly set us, not only by our own nation, but by nearly every other civilized one in all Christendom.

The necessity of recognising every independent community as an independent nation, as soon as the fact could be ascertained, arises from the indispensable necessity amongst all other nations, of making them responsible for their own acts; and hence it is an obligation resting on the Government, and due from it to the people who compose that Government, to make all other communities responsible for their own acts, as soon as practicable; and this they cannot do, except by treating them as independent nations, and thereby making the whole responsible for the acts of its parts. Such, sir, is the position now taken by every distinguished writer upon international law; and such has produced the necessity of immediately recognising the independence of every community, as soon as all others lose their control over it, rightfully or wrongfully, and are thereby rendered no longer, by reason or justice, responsible for their acts.

Now, sir, (said Mr. B.) I think the honorable gentlemen, who have been so violently and inflexibly opposed, even to the consideration of this subject at all, begin to get a foretaste of the singularly awkward attitude in which, by their conduct, they would necessarily place their country, in their refusal to recognise the independence of a community not responsible to any other earthly power for its acts. Is there a statesman of intelligence in this, or in any other country, who is not impressed with the weight and importance of this reason? To his mind, it was perfectly conclusive, as to the necessity of action, and immediate action on the subject. This, said he, would apply, and was applicable, to all Governments, nations, and communities, and as a general principle, it was sanctioned by reason, justice, and necessity? Yet, sir, we have been gravely told, and repeatedly too, that there was no necessity for the action of this Government on that subject, and by honorable gentlemen professing the intelligence and accumen of statesmen. Upon principles, as it regards all nations, general policy should compel us to recognise, under all such cases, (apart from its necessity) for our more beneficial and commercial relations, and intercourse with such communities. Such, in his judgment, was the true policy, that this Government should pursue towards all Governments more indifferently situated. Yes, sir, if the Territory of Texas was two thousand miles distant from this Government, such should be the policy, that this Government, as a free independent Republic, should adopt towards it, to act in accordance with its necessity, with true policy, and with national law.

But, under what additional obligations are we placed, when we take into consideration the many surrounding and peculiar situations in which the case before us presents itself by the juxtaposition of the territory of Texas to that of the United States; by the yearly, monthly, weekly, and daily commercial transactions and intercourse carried on with that people and the people of this Government. Sir, if, under ordinary circumstances, the reason for action on such an occasion is correct, as he thought he had sufficiently shown, what ought to be the action of this House in regard to the case of Texas, then? If the interest of our people was alone to be consulted, the action of this body was necessary; it was more, it was demanded, and indispensable to the well-being and harmony of the commercial relations now carried on between the people of this country and Texas. In the great variety of business now transacted between those nations, it is natural to suppose that there has been, or will be, differences of opinion as to the powers and rights of each other, growing out of these various transactions between the two communities. Texas, or the people of Texas, may become the trespassers, either on the rights of our people, our commerce, or our soil. Now, sir, for such a grievance, from whom would you seek redress? This is bringing the question home, and within a nutshell, to the plain comprehension of all. Whom would your Government, Mr. Chairman, hold responsible for the outrages committed on the commerce of our people, their rights, and other trespasses on the soil by the inhabitants of Texas? Would you, sir, pretend to hold Mexico responsible for the acts of Texas now, and attempt to punish her for the depredations that the citizens of Texas might commit on our commerce or territory? Has Mexico any authority in Texas at this time, or has she had any within the last twelve or fourteen months? Has she a single officer, fort, army, or soldier now within the borders of Texas? Has she, or can she, by any possibility, exercise any control over the authorities, or the Government, or the people of Texas? Sir, not one particle, not one scintilla or iota of control or authority does Mexico now exercise in any part, near or remote, direct or indirect, within the territorial limits of the Government of Texas. Then how supremely absurd, how pre-eminently ridiculous, is it to pretend to hold Mexico responsible, and bound for the acts and conduct of the people of that Government.

Yet, sir, such is the extraordinary condition in which this Government is left, by the refusal to recognize the independent political existence of that Government at this time. Does any honorable gentleman not at once perceive, in what a deplorable position such a ridiculous, blind, impolitic course places this country? But let us pursue this subject still further, and observe in what it must terminate when carried out. Let us refuse to acknowledge the independent existence of this nation, and look not to that Government for redress of injuries inflicted by its citizens on our people. The palpable absurdity of applying to Mexico has been already shown, as she possesses neither power nor authority in any part of Texas. We have refused to consider Texas an independent nation; and therefore, as a nation, she can not be responsible for her acts, not being considered as such by us. In what dilemma then, do we (by the folly of our own acts,) place this Government. He had shown that Mexico, by no principle of reason or justice, could be made responsible for the conduct of the citizens of Texas. Texas not being considered an independent nation, cannot be made liable for the conduct and acts of her own citizens. Then, if neither Mexico nor Texas is responsible for the acts of the citizens of Texas, who are? There was no other nation that had put up any pretensions to the government over that territory, as he had, as yet, been informed of. Sir, (he said,) there was but one alternative left for gentlemen, to escape from this dilemma: having shown that this people could not, with any sort of propriety, be considered citizens of Mexico, and Mexico made responsible for their acts, and this House was about to decide that there was no such nation as Texas, with an independent Government, that made her responsible for the acts of her own people! this Government was made by that decision, as the only alternative left to view every citizen of Texas as a pirate, marauder, bandit, and lawless freebooter, subject to be hung on the yardarm of every ship at sea, or swung to the limb of every tree in your forests. Such, sir, is the unhappy result of false premises, when traced to their legitimate conclusions.

Can any man, or set of men, believe for a moment that the citizens of Texas, the armies of Texas, are mere freebooters, marauders, a banditti of pirates and outlaws, and that this Government should treat them as such? No, sir; no, sir! You cannot impose on the intelligent people of this country the conclusions to which you yourselves have come, as will be demonstrated, this night, by your votes; and it will be vain and idle for any gentleman who has taken this absurd position, to attempt to relieve himself in future from an opposition to a measure most irreconcilably at war with reason, with justice, and the true policy of this Government.

With this view of the subject, (said Mr. B.) he would now undertake to examine some of the facts, as they related to the actual condition of Texas in a political point of view. The very honorable and venerable gentleman on his left, (Mr. Hoar of Massachusetts,) in reply to his honorable friend from South Carolina, (Gen. Thompson,) had asserted that this committee should rely on facts—facts was what the honorable gentleman placed himself on. Sir, (said Mr. B.) I am a plain matter-of-fact man. I thank the gentleman for that idea. They are the facts in this case that he had mainly relied on to justify the opinions and sentiments which he had entertained on this subject. But for his knowledge of the facts in relation to that subject, his opinions might have been totally adverse to what they then were. It was upon the facts alone that he, Mr. B. was disposed to rest the decision of this question; and what were the facts in relation to the political condition and relations of Texas? The President, to be correctly informed on this subject, after giving the Commissioners of Texas to understand, during our last Congress, that as soon as it could be ascertained that they had organized a de facto Government, that they would be immediately recognised by this Government. Most prudently and wisely had he despatched a commissioner or agent to that Government, for the express purpose of ascertaining the exact facts, as near as practicable, of the real condition and situation of that Government, not relying on the statements of the commissioners of Texas, nor agent or partisans, he adopted the precautionary measure of sending one of his own—a gentleman well known here for his integrity and capacity.

He agreed perfectly with both of the honorable gentlemen from Ohio, (Mr. Mason) and (Mr. Hoar) of Massachusetts, that we should not be led away by our feelings on this subject, but should be governed by the facts. Now, sir, said he, what are the facts, so far as they had been able to ascertain them.

He would first notice rumour and common report, which, in absence of all other, might be properly received as evidence. Then, sir, what was common report on this subject, and which had been acquiesced in by all parties for the last twelve months, or thereabout? Have we not seen in the public journals—Mexican, American, and Texan—that the Mexicans had been defeated in Texas, and that every soul of them had been driven out of their territory, and that they had been the quiet possessors of the whole country for near twelve months. That the whole sea coast of both Texas and Mexico was now under the entire power and control of Texas. Such were the facts that we had learnt of all parties, and as yet were uncontradicted by any. But let us, as we should do, abide mostly by the evidence and facts put forth by our own witness, Mr. Morfit, the agent sent by the President to collect and report the facts to this Government. What said he in relation to the political condition of that country?

Mr. Morfit, our confidential agent, states as follows: "The Texans are in complete and undisturbed possession of all they claim; that they can at any time oppose an army of from five to eight thousand men to their invaders; and that they have a regularly organized and orderly Government." This, sir, is directly at variance with the statements just made by the honorable member from Massachusetts, who was so anxious that the facts of this question should be considered.

"The Congress of Mexico," continues Mr. Morfit, "which is now in session, seems to have exhausted all ordinary modes of raising revenue, and adverts to the necessity of levying new contributions. The national power and integrity of Mexico seems to be lost in these domestic difficulties; and hence Texas argues that no other army will be raised to cross the Rio Grande against her.

There is much reason in this assertion; and besides the feebleness of the Government, the people in the provinces adjoining Texas are opposed to the war, as they have already suffered severely in the progress and return of their own army through their country. Zacatecas and Chihuahua have manifested great desire for peace; and if the ambition of a few men contending for power could be allayed, Mexico would be quiet and Texas free."

"If we recur to the military incidents of Mexico, in which persons from the United States took part, even while that country was under the dominion of Spain, it will be seen that nearly all the conflicts were disastrous to her subjects, and that there seems to be a fatality against her that is likely to keep pace with all her pretensions on this side of her natural boundary, the Rio Grande. As early as 1810, the military post at Baton Rouge, whose commandant had committed many wrongs against Colonel Kemper, was attacked by 40 Americans under General Thomas, and the garrison, with Colonel Losses and 120 men, subdued. The Mexicans about that time had commenced a revolution against Spain; and Colonel Ross, with 500 men, proceeded into Texas, to aid the patriots. He attacked and took the strong fortress of Goliad without any loss, and soon after defeated and captured 1,500 Mexicans. This army determined upon the conquest of Mexico, and routed and cut to pieces 3,000 men near San Antonio. A reinforcement of 4,000 Mexicans assaulted Bexar, in the absence of the American generals; but the troops resolved to act themselves, and defeated the assailants with the loss of only three men.

"In 1812, General Toledo, who had revolted from the Spanish Government, took command of San Antonio, and, with Ross's force of 400, and 300 Indians, routed another Mexican army of 4,000. These events led to the general revolution which separated Mexico from Spain; and ever since then, whenever the Texans have been engaged either with the Mexicans to establish a republic, or against them to defend it, they have almost invariably prevailed. "In the year 1832, when the Texans near Nacogdoches had been aggrieved by the military at that post, and had ineffectually endeavored to procure their removal, they up arms for the purpose, and, with 250 undisciplined men, defeated 375 regulars under General Luis Pichus. In 1832, during the administration of Bustamante, and after the violation of the Federal Constitution, a detachment of 132 Texan settlers, under Captain John Austin, besieged and reduced the fort at Velasco, garrisoned by 173 Mexicans under Colonel Ugartichea, with great loss to the besieged."

"In 1835, the Mexican garrison at Anahuac, under Captain Tenorio, surrendered to Colonel Travis, commanding a smaller force. In October of the same year, the Mexican cavalry from the fortress at Bexar were completely routed. At Gonzales, a few weeks after, 92 Texans, under Colonel Bowie and Fanning fought the battle of Conception, and defeated 450 Mexicans.

"The battle near Bexar was fought in the same month, and 499 Mexicans were obliged to retire, under cover of the artillery of the town, before 290 Texans; and in December, the city of San Antonio and the Alamo, defended by 1,300 Mexicans under General Cos, surrendered to 400 Texans, commanded by Colonel Milam; on the 21st of April, 1836, the decisive battle of San Jacinto was fought, in which General Santa Anna, with 1,300 men, were defeated by General Houston, commanding 783; and on the 24th of the same month, all the Mexican forces retreated beyond the frontiers of Texas. This concluded the second campaign, and thence it is said, 'a new epoch in her history was dated.'"

Here, sir, is the evidence of our own witness—such are the facts, that the confidential agent of our own Government communicates to the Executive. Is he to be believed, or is he not? We have rejected the evidence of the commissioners of Texas, and called on one of our own. Will you now discredit your own witness? Will you attempt to do it? Sir, you cannot. In the most ordinary courts of justice no man is permitted to discredit his own witness. Now, sir, what is the evidence of this witness of our own Government? Why, that "Texas is a regularly organized Government, and is in full and successful operation; that she has expelled her invaders, and is in complete possession of every foot of territory that she claims," and is thereby, by all intents and purposes, made the de facto Government. These are the facts to which I would call the particular attention of honorable gentlemen who are so much disposed to try this subject by the facts; these are facts and evidence put forth by our own witness, and it is too late now to attempt to discredit him.

From the whole tenor of Mr. Morfit's report, it does appear to me most clear that Texas is the de facto Government, and that every syllable of it goes to show the entire improbability, if not the utter impossibility, of Mexico ever reconquering Texas. From the brief history that he has there set forth of these contending parties, it is impossible for any impartial observer to doubt longer of the utter impracticability of Texas ever becoming again under the dominion of Mexico. This fact no man can doubt who will read that report;—it is clear, lucid, and impartial, and speaks of facts alone, and not of rights.

It was upon these facts, that he now called on that House to act, without regard to any supposititious, hypothetical theories. It was the facts on which he had relied, and on which the committee should rely for the character of their action on that question, and he thanked most respectfully the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Hoar,) who had so particularly invited the particular attention of the committee to the facts, to which he had referred; he thought an attentive perusal of them, would leave but one impression on the mind of ever honest impartial reader, who would take the pains to examine them. But, said he, if there had been reason to doubt the statements that were contained in Mr. Morfit's report, the occurrences and events that had taken place since, were amply sufficient to remove them. What had they heard ever since the battle that had been fought at San Jacinto, which had rendered imperishable the fame of Houston, and spread over the fertile fields of sunny Texas, a blaze of immortal glory? You have heard it dinged in your ears, day by day—weekly and monthly, that Texas ought not immediately to be recognised. That Mexico was re-assembling troops to invade, and overrun, as by one fell swoop, and depopulate the entire province of that little band of devoted patriots, whose deeds of noblest valor alone had won for them a country and a home. But, sir, what had been the progress and march of these Mexican myrmidons? What one's foul footsteps had yet polluted that soil, rendered sacred to liberty by the valor of self-expatriated heroes, whose deeds have often eclipsed those of Greece and Rome, in the proudest days of their glory and renown? No, sir; not a Mexican soldier has dared to re-enter Texas since their entire defeat and discomfiture on the plains of San Jacinto. The defeat and capitulation of Santa Anna was decisive of the fate of Texas, and may be justly considered the birthday of this newborn Republic. Sir, (said Mr. B.) would to God I had a talent for eulogy: this night would I attempt to do justice to the memory of those noble spirits, whose deeds of gallantry have shed such a lustre around the name of Texan. Where now are your Bravos and Bustamantes? What one has yet shown himself within the jurisdictional limits of Texas? Have not the armies of General Bravo been dismissed, or, rather, have they not deserted, and refused to recross the Rio del Norte? Are they not in a wretched state of revolt and privation, and destitute at this moment of every means necessary for the subsistence of an army of successful operation? If the public journals of either country are to be credited, they are. The last accounts from Mexico bring us information, too, that the whole country is likely to declare in favor of Santa Anna, who stands pledged himself, doubtless, by his own solemn acts, not to invade Texas again, but to recognise her independence. These events all concur to corroborate and strengthen the statements of facts set forth by Mr. Morfit, in his report to the Executive. Then, sir, how is it possible that any intelligent man can longer doubt, with such facts and corroborating circumstances staring him in the face, of the independent existence of a de facto Government in Texas? He did not feel disposed to doubt the sincerity of honorable gentlemen there, though he thought there were adequate grounds to do so, when they saw fit to go so directly in the face of both facts and circumstances tending directly to the contrary; to which he too would most earnestly request the recollection of honorable gentlemen on that occasion.

The honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts and from Ohio, however, had doubts, and repudiated the idea of the independence of Texas being acquired by renegades, plunderers, and marauders, that had fled from justice in their own countries, and seemed to lay much stress upon their being land-pirates, speculators, &c.; although, he knew, the charge, as it related to nineteen-twentieths of that people, was entirely gratuitous and unfounded. He was willing, for the time being, and argument's sake merely, to grant it. Its fallacy, he would show, was too palpable not to be detected by the most superficial observer. What, he asked, had that house or this nation to do with the moral characters of the armies of either Texas or Mexico? Who could stand up there, and say the one was more debased than the other? What were the armies of Mexico, but convicts and pressmen of every hue, from the lascars mustered down to the sable sambo? The filth of every prison and dungeon in Mexico had been emptied into Texas, led on by bandits, that knew no law but that of plunder. He hoped that house would never descend so much as to undertake to decide on the moral character of the armies of any nation.

What if every man in Texas was a common highwayman, or robber, if you choose, or even assassins, that could not, nor should not, effect this question; nor even if they were ten times more debased than they had been described. The question was one of mere fact as to their independence, and in deciding that, we had nothing to do with their morals, color, or complexion; which, he imagined, none doubted would compare with that of their invaders. He again repeated, were the Texans the most degraded, abandoned people on earth, having gained possession of their country, and having established a de facto Government, we were bound in good faith to recognise them.

But the honorable gentlemen were as much, if not more so out in their other objection. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Hoar,) had said, that the army of Texas was composed of Americans, and that there were not more than three or four hundred Texans. Mr. B. did not know that there were as many, nor did he care to know it. Had there not been ten Texans in their armies, it would not have been at all material to the present issue. If they were able to hire men to fight their battles, it was their look out, not ours; or if they could get them from other nations to fight their battles for nothing, it was their good fortune, and they were entitled to all the benefits of it. The honorable gentleman, in making this objection, surely had not reflected on the history of other nations, which abundantly furnished the most analogous precedents and examples.

There had hardly been a war of consequence amidst ancient or modern nations, in which auxiliaries had not, in some manner or form, at some one time or another, been introduced. But for the auxiliaries of England under Wellington, would the French ever have been dislodged from the Tagus, and finally driven out of Spain? In that contest, every brilliant exploit was performed by foreigners; and were they not considered the armies of Spain, and did not the benefits of their victories redound almost exclusively to the benefit of Spain? But he needed not to dwell on foreign examples, when they abounded in his own country. What Indian war had occurred, in which we had not a part of our armies composed of Indian auxiliaries? Look at that time to Florida: were we not employing in our armies Creeks to put down the Seminoles? and what was the nature of our armies during our revolution. Where were the French—their navy—Lafayette and his illustrious compatriots and coadjutors in the cause of American liberty? Without the auxiliaries of France would Cornwallis have surrendered at York?

Sir, the gentleman has been exceedingly unfortunate in his objection. It is one that would have applied with equal or more weight to our own country in by-gone days. I hope he will review these facts, and give to them that weight, to which their truth entitles them.

24th Cong.....2d Sess.

Independence of Texas—Mr. Bynum.

H. of Reps.

The next branch of the subject that he proposed to examine, was, what had been the precedents in relation to the acknowledgment of new Governments that had been set by this Government, and its action in similar cases?

He did not hesitate to say that the recognition of Texas, under the present circumstances, was in strict conformity with nearly every precedent set by this Government, from the administration of the great Father of his country's liberties, (General Washington,) down to the present day. The fact of the existence of precedents for recognition had been most triumphantly argued in that House on a former occasion, perfectly analogous to the present, by a distinguished statesman from Kentucky, and had been so much more ably and eloquently maintained, and set forth, than he could do, that he would simply read from the speech of that honorable gentleman, now a Senator in another body, which was as follows:

"Mr. Clay continued, having shown that the cause of the patriots was just, and that we had a great interest in its successful issue, he would next inquire what course of policy it became us to adopt. He had already declared that to be one of strict and impartial neutrality. It was not necessary for their interests, it was not expedient for our own, that we should take part in the war. All they demanded of us was a just neutrality; it was compatible with this pacific policy, it was required by it, that we should recognise any established Government in Spanish America. Recognition alone, without aid, was no just cause of war. With aid it was, not because of the recognition, but because of the aid, as aid without recognition was cause of war. The truth of these propositions he would maintain upon principle, by the practice of other States, and by the usage of our own. There was no common tribunal among the nations to pronounce upon the fact of the sovereignty of a new State. Each power must, and does, judge for itself. A nation in exerting this incontestible right, in pronouncing upon the independence in fact of a new State, takes no part in the war. It gives neither men, nor ships, nor money. It merely pronounces that in so far as it may be necessary to institute any relations, or to support any intercourse, with the new power, that power is capable of maintaining those relations and authorizing that intercourse. Martens, and other publicists, lay down these principles."

"When the United Provinces formerly severed themselves from Spain, it was about 80 years before their independence was finally recognised by Spain. Before that recognition the United Provinces had been received by all the east of Europe into the family of nations. It is true that a war broke out between Philip and Elizabeth, but it proceeded from the aid which she determined to give, and did give, to Holland. In no instance, he believed, could it be shown, from authentic history, that Spain made war upon any power on the sole ground that such power had acknowledged the independence of the United Provinces.

"In the case of our own revolution, it was not until after France had given us aid, and had determined to enter into a treaty of alliance with us—a treaty by which she guaranteed our independence—that England declared war. Holland was also charged by England with favoring our cause, and deviating from the line of strict neutrality, and when it was perceived that she was, moreover, about to enter into a treaty with us, England declared war. Even if it were shown that a proud, haughty, and powerful nation like England, had made war upon other provinces, on the ground of a mere recognition, the single example could not alter the public law, or shake the strength of a clear principle.

"But what had been our own uniform practice? We had constantly proceeded on the principle that the Government de facto was that which we could alone notice. Whatever form of Government any society of people adopts, whoever they acknowledge as their sovereign, we consider that Government, or that sovereign, as the one to be acknowledged by us. We have invariably abstained from assuming a right to decide in favor of the sovereign de jure, and against the sovereign de facto. That is a question for the nation in which it arises to determine; and, so far as we are concerned, the sovereign de facto is the sovereign de jure. Our own revolution stands on the basis of the right of a people to change their rulers. He did not maintain that every immature revolution, every usurper, before his power was consolidated, was to be acknowledged by us, but that, as soon as stability and order were maintained, no matter by whom, we always had considered, and ought to consider, the actual as the true Government. Gen. Washington, Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Madison, had all, whilst they were respectively President, acted on these principles.

"In the case of the French Republic, Gen. Washington did not wait until some of the crowned heads of Europe should set him the example of acknowledging it, but accredited a Minister at once; and it is remarkable, that he was received before the Government of the Republic was considered as established. It will be found in Marshall's Life of Washington, that when it was understood that a Minister from the French Republic was about to present himself, President Washington submitted a number of questions to his cabinet for their consideration and advice; one of which was, whether, upon the reception of the minister, he should be notified that America would suspend the execution of the treaties until France had an established Government. General Washington did not stop to inquire whether the descendants of St. Louis were to be considered as the legitimate sovereigns of France, and if the revolution was to be regarded as unauthorized resistance to their sway. He saw France, in fact, under the Government of those who had subverted the throne of the Bourbons, and he acknowledged the actual Government. During Mr. Jefferson's and Mr. Madison's administrations, when the Cortes of Spain and Joseph Bonaparte respectively contended for the crown, these enlightened statesmen said we will receive a minister from neither party; settle the question between yourselves, and we will acknowledge the party that prevails; we have nothing to do with your feuds; whoever Spain acknowledges as her sovereign, is the only sovereign with whom we can maintain any relations. Mr. Jefferson, it is understood, considered whether he should not receive a minister from both parties, and finally decided against it, because of the inconveniences to this country which might result from the double representation of another power. As soon as the French armies were expelled from the peninsula, Mr. Madison, still acting on the principles of the Government de facto, received the present minister from Spain. During all the phases of the French Government, republic, directory, consuls, consul for life, emperor, king, emperor again, king, our Government has uniformly received the minister.

"If then, there be an established Government in Spanish America, deserving to rank among the nations, we were morally and politically bound to acknowledge it, unless we renounced all the principles which ought to guide, and which hitherto had guided, our councils."

Yes, sir, such were the sentiments at that time, of that most distinguished son of the West, of whose birth any country should justly be proud, whose known talents it were mean and low, even in an enemy, to disparage; however much he had and might differ with him in their political views, as it regarded the future policy of the nation, he never could so far forget what was due to candor and honesty, as to deny him the meed to which his talents and services to his country so pre-eminently entitled him. This speech, from which he had just read an extract, was delivered on the 24th of March, 1818, by Mr. Clay in the Committee of the Whole, on a proposition identical with that now before the committee, offered by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson.) The speech of that honorable gentleman it was seen covered the whole ground of precedent, and left but little for him, Mr. B. to say. The honorable gentleman (Mr. Clay) had shown them that the first precedent had been set on that subject by General Washington, than whom no nation nor age had ever produced a statesman of more consummate prudence and precautionary foresight. General Washington never stopped, said Mr. Clay, to consider whether the descendants of St. Louis were to be considered as the legitimate sovereigns of France. He saw France, in fact, under the government of those who had subverted the Bourbons, and he acknowledged the actual Government. Now, sir, what was the "actual Government" here alluded to, but the Government de facto. This was the first precedent set by the great founder of American liberty, which had been regularly followed up and pursued by his illustrious successors, in the persons of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe. The practice, so far as he was informed, seemed to have descended down from the primary days of the Republic, in an uninterrupted series of precedents, and examples, heretofore unquestioned by any source of intelligent statesmen, or politicians whatsoever.

Mexico herself had been acknowledged under circumstances by far more unfavorable than those under which it was now proposed to acknowledge Texas. At the time that this country acknowledged the independence of Mexico, it was a fact well known, that the mother country, (old Spain,) for nearly eighteen months after her independence had been acknowledged by this Government, held possession of some of the strongest fortresses in all Mexico. Mexico was recognised by this Government in 1822, at which time the armies of old Spain had complete possession of one of the strongest posts and most impregnable forts in the whole Government. Among others, she held possession of the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz, amongst the strongest posts in the world, Gibraltar and Quebec not excepted. Then, Sir, let us compare the then condition of Mexico with the present condition of Texas. Texas has expelled her invaders, taken captive the commander-in-chief of the armies, and President of Mexico; and there is not a post, fort, or fortress, or castle, at this time, of any description or denomination, in any part of her territory, in the possession of an enemy, nor has there been for near twelve months. Then how incomparably stronger are the claims to recognition on the part of Texas than were those of Mexico! Yet the recognition of Mexico met with but little opposition from any part of this Government. Why then this morbid sensibility in regard to Texas? strange, exceedingly so—it was unjust in the extreme. Sir, in reply to a communication, in relation to the recognition of Mexico, from Mr. Monroe, then President of this Government, the report of a committee of this House held the following language: "For a nation to be entitled to respect in foreign States, to the enjoyment of these attributes, and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is really sovereign and independent, that it governs itself by its own authority and laws." Now what other laws were in force at this time than those of her own enactments, in any part of the territories of Texas? None, sir, none: if our own agent and witness is to be believed, or the reports and statements contained in the journals of the three Governments of Texas, Mexico, or of the United States. This report contains the precedent sat at that time, by this House; thus adding additional weight to those precedents sanctioned, first by the illustrious founder of his country, and acquiesced in by every President down to the present time. He had perceived nothing more uniform than the course proposed to be taken by the amendment on your table offered by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. The precedents, so far, that had been set by both the legislative and executive departments and branches of this Government, he had shown, he thought, satisfactorily, were in favor of the recognition of Texas, and the immediate adoption of the amendment before the committee.

Mr. B. would now state what took place between this Government and the Republic of Colombia, as he found it in an extract from a letter written by the very honorable and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who then filled with great ability the station of Secretary of State of the United States under the administration of Mr. Monroe; and he was bound to believe that they contained the opinions of the honorable gentleman at that time. In his letter to Mr. Anderson of 1823, he then stated: "The formation of the Republic of Colombia, by the fundamental law of 17th December, 1817, was notified to this Government by its agent, the late Don Manuel Torres, on the 20th of February, 1821, with a request that it might be recognised by the Government of the United States, &c." * * * * *

"The request and proposal were renewed in a letter from Mr. Torres of the 30th of November, 1821, and again repeated on the 2d of January, 1822. The President, on the 8th of March, declared that the time had arrived when the acknowledgment of the independence declared by the Spanish American Colonies could no longer be withheld, &c. An appropriation was made by law, (4th of May, 1822,) 'for such missions to the independent nations on the American continent as the President should deem proper.'" Here, sir, was what in substance was then contended for, and sanctioned by that distinguished, though now eccentric, statesman of Massachusetts, whose diplomatic talents ranked inferior to no man now living, on this or the other side of the Atlantic, and which had ever been displayed by an ability equalled only by the extensiveness of his masterly power of research. In these instructions to our Minister, (Mr. Anderson,) the whole ground of time was covered. The first request was made to this Government by Don Manuel Torres on the 20th February, 1821, for the recognition of the independence of that republic. On the 8th of March, 1822, it was recommended by Mr. Monroe, the then Chief Magistrate; and on the 4th of May, 1822, an appropriation was made, virtually recognising the independence of that Government, but a little more than fourteen months after the first application had been made; and this, too, was done in the very face of the remonstrances of the Spanish Minister, (Anduago,) yet it was now contended that the application of Texas was too soon, and premature, who had been knocking at our doors for recognition about the same length of time, while not a voice had been raised against it by Mexico. This, he thought, was conclusive, as to the immateriality of the time for which a Government should apply to be recognised, and placed Texas on the identical grounds of former Governments that had preceded her in similar applications. He hoped the honorable gentleman who had represented his country with so much ability on this occasion in 1823, would not now be found to disparage the salutary principles for which he had then so ably contended. He too, in that communication, had taken ground in favor of the Government de facto, which he conceived to be the only true ground to be taken by this Government, and properly the only legitimate one to be taken by every Government on all similar occasions.

Mr. Wheaton, one of the profoundest modern writers on international law, in relation to the acknowledgment of France, of the independence of the United States, says:

"That the acknowledgment of the independence of the United States of America by France, coupled with the assistance secretly rendered by the French court to the revolted colonies, was considered by Great Britain as an unjustifiable aggression; and under the circumstances, it probably was so. But had the French court conducted itself with good faith, and maintained an impartial neutrality between the two belligerent parties, it may be doubted whether the treaty of commerce, or even the eventual alliance between France and the United States, could have furnished any just ground for a declaration of war against the former by the British Government. The more recent example of the acknowledgment of the independence of the Spanish American provinces by the United States, Great Britain, and other powers, whilst the parent country still continues to withhold her assent, also concurs to illustrate the general understanding of nations, that where a revolted province or colony has declared and shown its ability to maintain its independence, the recognition of its sovereignty by other foreign States is a question of policy and prudence only."

Implying most clearly, that if France had formed a treaty of commerce, or even an alliance with this Government, by which the independence, of course, of this Government would have been acknowledged as being the de facto Government of the land, that even then, and in that case, without the assistance rendered on the part of France to the United States, it would have been no cause of war on the part of Great Britain against France. Nor sir, it was not on account of the recognition of the independence of this country, on the part of France, that Great Britain declared war against her, but for the aid that she had overtly given and rendered to the United States, and thereby making herself in fact the first aggressor. France had confederated with the United States in the war against Britain, and the act of one confederate was, as it has ever been, received as the act of the other. France, then, in reality had first commenced with the United States a war to all intents and purposes against the powers of Great Britain. It was not, therefore, the recognition of the American independence that justified the Government of England in declaring war with France, but for an actual confederation and coadjutation with her enemies and their revolted provinces, without which, as Mr. Wheaton has most justly intimated, she could have had no just cause for war.

But, sir, as my honorable friends from the north and east had exhibited, he thought, most unnecessarily, too, an extraordinary sensibility on this subject, evincive of their untoward repugnance to touch it, he would show there must have been a most prodigious falling off in that quarter from the free and liberal doctrines that were advocated in 1823 by that most profound and erudite statesman, whom all New England now seemed proud to honor, and who had but recently received a portion of the suffrages of that very enlightened and enterprising section of this country for the first office in their gift. He alluded to an honorable Senator, who now occupied a seat in another part of that building, (Mr. Webster.)

Mr. W. in 1823, did not appear quite so timid. It was then that he stood forth on this floor, the champion of liberty, and with the fervor of his lofty eloquence advocated the cause of freedom in a foreign land, expiring beneath the grasp of a despot's hand.

There was not then felt such appalling forebodings from that quarter by the mere expression of an opinion by either the Executive or Legislative departments of this Government. There was not that chilling horror felt, which seems now to haunt the consciences of certain honorable gentlemen on this floor. Sir, said Mr. B. such was the language held by the highly gifted gentleman to whom he had alluded, in his speech in this house on a resolution introduced by himself for the appointment of an agent or commissioner to Greece, whom it was then proposed to be immediately despatched by the President, whenever, in his discretion, it might be deemed proper. "In reference to what might be the opinions of other nations on our course here," said Mr. W. "they might indeed prefer that we should express no dissent upon the doctrines which they have avowed, and the application which they have made of those doctrines to Greece. But I trust we are not disposed to leave them in any doubt as to our sentiments upon these important subjects. They have expressed their opinions, and do not call that expression of opinion an interference, in which respect they are right, as the expression of opinion in such cases is not such an interference as would justify the Greeks in considering the powers as at war with them. For the same reason, any expression which we may make, of different principles and different sympathies, is no interference. No one would call the President's message an interference; and yet it is much stronger in that respect than these resolutions."

These were sentiments that justly do honor to an American statesman. Here is a position assumed, that this house, nor this nation, should never abandon: as a free expression of opinion was identified with the rights of individuals, so it was essentially identified and inseparably necessary to the rights of nations. These were sentiments that it becomes every American patriot to sustain, as well for the honor as for the freedom and independence of his nation. Yes, sir, we have the right to the expression of our opinions, as well as a nation, as individuals, as to the dependent or independent existence of any Government or nation, without giving just cause for war, or for censure; nor should even the horrors of war deter us from the maintenance of this right. Sir, what is recognition, but an expression of our opinion, that a nation is free, or independent? And have we no right to do this for fear of giving offence to some foreign despot? Away with such craven fears, as anti-patriotic, and at war with every ennobling emotion of a heart that throbs with the feelings of freedom, for his own, or another's country.

But to show further authority to justify the position that he and his friends had taken on that subject, he would not confine himself to the writers on national law, or to the distinguished debaters and statesmen of his own country. He would show that it was a position that had been taken by England herself, of whose displeasure honorable gentlemen seemed to stand in such trepidation on the present occasion. It had been asserted and maintained by one of the most exalted and highly gifted spirits of the age, and who for high order of intellect, has at no time been surpassed by the first premiers of Great Britain. It was to be found in the correspondence between M. Zea, Minister, &c. of his Catholic Majesty of Old Spain, with the Court of Great Britain, and through the honorable Mr. Canning then prime minister &c. of that realm. In reply to M. Zea, complaining to Mr. Canning of the course that the Government of Great Britain had pursued in the recognition of the independence of Mexico, and the South American States, Mr. C. had taken up the subject of both the right and duty of other nations, than those combatant to recognise the de facto Government, and has in a most masterly manner, placed it upon grounds which must ever hereafter make it perfectly unassailable and indisputable. He has demonstrated most clearly and satisfactorily, that the Government de facto is the only one that should be recognised; and that it is the duty of all nations to do so; and that by doing so, affords no just cause of complaint against any power, and further, from war. Yes, sir, such will be found the opinions of the first English statesman of the age. But let Mr. Canning speak for himself. In his reply to the Minister of Spain, he states that

"The example of the late revolution in France, and of the ultimate happy restoration of his Majesty Louis XVIII, is pleaded by M. Zea in illustration of the principle of unextinguishable right in a legitimate sovereign, and of the respect to which that right is entitled from all foreign Powers; and he calls upon Great Britain, in justice to her own consistency, to act with the same reserve towards the new States of Spanish America which she employed, so much to her honor, towards revolutionary France.

"But can M. Zea need to be reminded that every Power in Europe, and specifically Spain amongst the foremost, not only acknowledged the several successive Governments de facto, by which the House of Bourbon was first expelled from the throne of France, and afterwards kept for near a quarter of a century out of possession of it, but contracted intimate alliances with them all; and, above all, with that which M. Zea justly describes as the strongest of de facto Governments, the Government of Bonaparte; against whom, not any principle of respect for the rights of legitimate monarchy, but his own ungovernable ambition, finally brought combined Europe into the field.

"There is no use in endeavoring to give a specious coloring to facts which are now the property of history.

"The undersigned is therefore compelled to add, that Great Britain herself cannot justly accept the praise which M. Zea is willing to ascribe to her in this respect, nor can she claim to be altogether exempted from the general charge of having treated with the Powers of the French revolution. It is true, indeed, that up to the year 1793, she abstained from treating with revolutionary France long after other Powers of Europe had set her the example. But the reasons alleged in Parliament, and in state papers, for that abstinence, was the unsettled state of the French Government. And it cannot be denied that, both in 1796 and 1797, Great Britain opened a negotiation for peace with the Directory of France—a negotiation the favorable conclusion of which would have implied a recognition of that form of Government; that in 1801 she made peace with the Consulate; that if in 1806 she did not conclude a treaty with Bonaparte, Emperor of France, the negotiation was broken off merely on a question of terms; and that if from 1808 to 1814 she steadily refused to listen to any overtures from France, she did so declaredly and notoriously on account of Spain alone, whom Bonaparte pertinaciously refused to admit as party to the negotiation. Nay, further, it cannot be denied that even in 1814, the year in which the Bourbon dynasty was eventually restored, peace would have been made by Great Britain with Bonaparte, if he had not been unreasonable in his demands; and Spain cannot be ignorant that, even after Bonaparte was set aside, there was a question among the allies of the possible expediency of placing some other than a Bourbon on the throne of France.

Independence of Texas—Mr. Bynum.

H. of Reps.

"The appeal, therefore, to the conduct of the Powers of Europe, and even to that of Great Britain herself, with respect to the French revolution, does but recall abundant instances of the recognition of de facto Governments by Great Britain, perhaps later and more reluctantly than by others, but by Great Britain herself, however reluctant, after the example set to her by the other powers of Europe, and especially by Spain."

"To come now to the second charge against Great Britain, the alleged violation of general international law:

"Has it ever been admitted as an axiom, or ever been observed by any nation or Government as a practical maxim, that no circumstances and no time should entitle a de facto Government to recognition, or should entitle third Powers, who may have a deep interest in defining and establishing their relations with a de facto Government, to do so? Such a proceeding on the part of third Powers undoubtedly does not decide the question of right against the mother country.

"The Netherlands had thrown off the supremacy of Spain long before the end of the 16th century; but that supremacy was not formally renounced by Spain till the treaty of Westphalia in 1648. Portugal declared in 1640 her independence of the Spanish monarchy; but it was not till 1668 that Spain by treaty acknowledged that independence.

"During each of these intervals the abstract rights of Spain may be said to have remained unextinguished. But third Powers did not, in either of these instances, wait the slow conviction of Spain, before they thought themselves warranted to establish direct relations, and even to contract intimate alliances with the Republic of the United Netherlands, as well as with the new monarchy of the House of Braganza.

"To continue to call that a possession of Spain, in which all Spanish occupation and power had been actually extinguished and effaced, could render no practical service to the mother country; but it would have risked the peace of the world. For all political communities are responsible to other political communities for their conduct; that is, they are bound to perform the ordinary international duties, and to afford redress for any violation of the rights of others by their citizens or subjects.

"Now, either the mother country must have continued responsible for acts over which it could no longer exercise the shadow of a control, or the inhabitants of those countries, whose independent political existence was in fact established, but to whom the acknowledgment of that independence was denied, must have been placed in a situation in which they were either wholly responsible for their actions, or were to be visited for each of those actions as might furnish ground for complaint to other nations, with the punishment due to pirates and outlaws.

"If the former of these alternatives—the total irresponsibility of unrecognised States—be too absurd to be maintained, and if the latter, the treatment of their inhabitants as brutes and outlaws, be too monstrous to be applied, for an indefinite length of time, to a large portion of the habitable globe, no other chance remained for Great Britain, or for any country having intercourse with Spanish American provinces, but to recognise, in due time, their immediate existence as States, and thus to bring them within the pale of those rights and duties which civilized nations are bound mutually to respect, and are entitled reciprocally to claim from each other."

Mr. Chairman, (continued Mr. B.) the lucid argument, the convincing reasoning, with which these opinions and sentiments have been enforced, the immense distance at which they have been placed by that most distinguished individual, beyond all future controversy, require from my hands no further comment.

Sir, I have here concluded my authorities for the justification of my action upon this truly important subject; and he would now appeal to honorable gentlemen, and with the utmost sincerity and candor ask upon what foot of political ground had they left to predicate their continued opposition to the measure before the committee. He thought he had shown (at least he had done it to his own satisfaction) that the recognition of a de facto government was not only just but necessary; that it was not only temporarily expedient, but that it was the true policy of all nations "ex necessitate rei" to do so; that it was a principle that had not been acted on along by one President of this Government, but by all before whom that question had come; that it had not been sanctioned alone by one precedent of this Government, but by every one that had taken place on the same subject; that it had been avowed, not by one, but by most of the distinguished men of this country, who had had an occasion to express themselves on the subject; and, finally, that it had been asserted and maintained by one of the most distinguished statesmen in all Europe, and acquiesced in by the Government of Great Britain, and silently sanctioned by nearly all of the powers of Europe.

He had now but a few remarks to make, of a more local nature, to some of the honorable gentlemen of that House, who had evinced, either by their action or expression, their indomitable opposition to the recognition of Texas under the present circumstances.

Sir, (he said,) I will pass over the unsettled state of Mexico. The invasion of Barradas, in 1829, several years after her independence was recognised by this Government. I will pass over the doubtful revolutions and throes with which that Government has been afflicted by the ascension to its presidency of Iturbide, Victoria, Montorio, Bravo, Pedrazza, Gurrero, Bustamante, and, finally, Santa Anna; to show how little security there is in the permanency of her own Government; the difficulty with which she has to contend, to keep in subjection her own citizens, and the increased improbability of her ever being able, in future, to invade and reconquer Texas. Mr. Chairman, (said he,) I fear that there are other signs in our political firmament than those that have yet appeared in the horizon, for this extraordinary opposition to a measure so palpably justifiable upon every variety of reason. I fear, sir, there is yet something at the root of this opposition that has not been set forth; there must be, to justify the action of this House. Can it be that fiend-like envy and jealousy which caused the expulsion from celestial bliss, of a Satan, a Moloch, and Beelzebub, to the infernal regions of damned spirits? Can it be that remote probability of adding to southern influence and preponderance in this nation; or does it arise from a feeling, tenfold worse, of anti-slavery? Are the prejudices against these institutions so strong, in a certain quarter, as to cause this justice to be withheld from that suffering people, contrary to every practice of our own Government, and so utterly repugnant to all the principles of right, of justice, the true and impartial policy of nations, and the irrevocable laws of universal equity? If such be the true causes of the hostility to this measure, it is time for every man to the south of the Potomac to know it; and we would be here recreant to our duty, traitors to the dearest interests of our people, to keep the fact concealed from them one hour longer. He would invoke gentlemen to review those opinions, if founded on such disastrous prejudices, before they became too deeply rooted to admit of amelioration. They could not be acted out there or elsewhere, short of throes and convulsions that must shock every quarter of this Republic to its inmost recesses.

But who were those that were now clinging to those prejudices as to some holy relic; and what had been their history since the first appearance of those reckless spirits, aspiring to guide the councils of this nation? He would omit the manifestations of its first spark, in that insurrection known by the name of the Pennsylvania whiskey insurrection, so promptly quelled, alone, by the virtue and patriotism of a Washington.

It was the same party that had raised the cry against the admission and treaty for Louisiana, which had shed immortal lustre over the name of Jefferson, which gave us the complete possession of the whole waters of the Mississippi, whose mighty streams were now laving the shores of nine sovereign and independent States, and pouring into the granaries of the world the almost invaluable products of its prolific and fertile valleys. Yes, sir, even at that time was the policy of that same party displayed against the acquisition of the most rich, flourishing, and now by far the most prosperous portion of this nation. Against that measure too, from this same reckless, envious, mistaken, misguided party, petitions after petitions were laid upon your tables, until they literally groined beneath their ponderous weight—while time had unfolded the fallacy of their predictions, and the impolicy of their course, which none were now so hardy as to defend. Millions after millions, to the reverse of all their prophecies, are now annually poured into your treasury, to enrich the older sisters of the confederacy, from the very soil acquired under the thunder of their anathemas. Under such a rebuke, by the lessons of experience, men, under ordinary circumstances, would pause in a career of error; but, sir, nothing daunted, this same party may be seen at work in the struggles that in 1819 or 20 took place on this floor, and in the opposite branch of this Capitol, in the agitation of the great Missouri question, that involved the restriction of slavery. That House then had been convulsed for a whole session or more, until the Union had well nigh been dispaired of. The same party had then brought this country almost to the eve of a revolution; but Missouri was admitted without restrictions, and the country was again saved from the fury of the reckless and ambitious. It was the identical spirit of fanaticism at work then as now; the same party that aspired to regulate other men's business—other men's religion and morals.

But their history stopped not there. We next had heard from them on the subject of the Sunday mails. The whole country was, for months and years, in ferment about the impropriety and irreligion of running Sunday mails. Your tables were again loaded with hundreds, if not thousands, of petitions, to stop your mails throughout the country on Sunday—to save your souls, and quiet their most tender consciences—until the report of his very honorable and veteran friend (Colonel Richard M. Johnson,) from Kentucky had exposed so effectually their absurdity and folly, that all felt, in future, ashamed to acknowledge that they had ever had the least to do with so ridiculous a subject; and thus they disappeared with that shame which has ever covered the folly of fanaticism when once exposed. Here, too, as on former occasions, one might reasonably have supposed that the lesson of experience would have had a remedial effect. But not so with the fanatics. They have ever proven themselves blind, as well to the lessons of experience as to truth and reason. This folly had scarcely been exposed by the report of that veteran statesman, (Colonel R. M. Johnson,) which did equal credit to his head and his heart, than you find the same identical party, (with some few exceptions,) conjuring up some mighty ignis fatuus against masonry. It too, like slavery, was a curse in the land, and against their tender consciences. Antimasonry became next their watchword, on whose broad banners my honorable friends over the way, on my right, (alluding to Messrs. J. Q. Adams and F. Granger,) had figured so conspicuously. Yes, sir, at one time we would have thought every mason in the land, by this proscriptive party, would have been put to the rack; but for the good sense of the hardy democratic yeomanry of this country, who have so often proved competent to arrest the march of the fanatics, under whatever name or garb they may have associated themselves, perhaps their unhallowed objects might have been effected. Antimasonry, too, has had its race, and is fast becoming obsolete. The mighty bubble has burst, and shame, confusion, and reproach, are the only inheritance left to its authors. It was conceived in folly, as its discension has been in shame.

Rebuffed and confuted in nearly every effort by the intelligence of the people, this spirit is yet sleepless in its attempts to acquire a ruling influence in the councils of the nation. They heed not defeat nor exposure. Where will you again find them? Look at the exclusive care that they would have extended to the Indians; murmurs long and loud were put up against the policy of moving the red man from the white; when every man of experience and practical knowledge must have known that there was no safety in both living and commingling together. Yes, sir, petitions after petitions crowded every portal of this House against the removal of the poor Indians, depicting in glowing colors, and advocated with all the flowers of rhetoric, on this floor, setting forth the cruelty and impolicy of this act. It was the blood of the red man that seemed to haunt their bewildered imaginations; and upon that subject too the whole nation for a while was convulsed to its centre, by these self same exclusives of humanity, tender conscience and liberty. Why, sir, the merest tyro in politics would laugh them to scorn. The just policy of the Government, as to the removal of the Indians, has been acquiesced in by every politician of intelligence in every portion of our country; and the chimeras of fanaticism have been left to recoil alone to the disgrace and folly of its authors.

Blind yet to these lessons of experience, however, and "nothing daunted at oft exposures," they have now seized, with death-like grip, on that ill-omened subject, abolition; and as some fallen spirits, determined, through revenge and rancor, to make one last dying struggle to regain the eminence they once had held amongst their followers—yes, abolition is now the hobby of that same deluded sect of politicians whose history he had brought up from the primary days of the Republic, and had shown it, when acted out, to have been a series of political fallacies and delusions. This abolition bubble, too, must burst, else this country will be bathed in the blood of its noblest spirits, and its rivers empurpled with its crimson gore; and generation after generation may rue the blind folly of fanaticism, spurred on either by envy, revenge, or worse, ambition.

Had gentlemen not already, from what had passed at the present session, got some foretaste of the beauties of abolitionism? or was the obtundity of our intellect so great as to require a kick or a cuff to induce us to take a hint? He thought there had been evidence enough, demonstrations enough, to satisfy every thinking, enlightened man, in or out of that House, what must be the inevitable result of even an attempt here to carry out the views of the abolitionists. He repeated it, that these views could not be put in practice without empurpling the whole waters of the South with the blood of thousands. Let no gentleman deceive himself; the contrary was an idle dream. While on that subject, he would take an occasion to reply to a remark made but a few days since, and, he had thought, for his ears.

An honorable gentleman had said, that "the South should best mind its own interest, that if any thing of the kind ever became necessary, the North and East had but to march an army to the South, and that they would make our own slaves conquer us." Sir, little do gentlemen know of the true feelings of southern men and southern tactics, who harbor such sentiments as those. Little must they dream of the crimes they would become instrumental in the commission of, should such event ever be attempted in this devoted land of freemen, which God in his infinite mercies arrest. Sir, would gentlemen believe, before the south would permit that, or any similar advantage to be taken of their condition in that way, that they would be driven to adopt measures too appalling almost to repeat here, and to contemplate—which human nature itself is shocked. Do gentlemen not know that the South would assemble by thousands, those unfortunate creatures, and in shambles have them executed in cold blood.

Sir, they would be driven to adopt such a course, sooner than suffer themselves to be butchered by them, appalling, shocking, revolting, as it would be to every feeling of humanity; for the laws of necessity admit of neither rule nor mercy. Have honorable gentlemen thought seriously, who thus spoke slightly of this subject? He feared not. It was the great fault common to all abolitionists. They only thought of their object, without once thinking of the means by which it was to be accomplished; and in that their leaders, no doubt, had been guilty of a practical imposition on the public mind. What was their mode in getting up these abominable petitions? He spoke from such information as he had been able to procure on the subject. A petition was handed round, sometimes at their meetings, or Sunday schools, and at others privately, (pretty much, said he, in this way.) The persons handing it around, who were generally some of the lower clergy, addressed the signers thus: "My friend, I want your signature to this petition?" "What petition?" replies the signer. "An't you against slavery?" says the clergyman, or his agent. "Oh, yes," says the signer; "it is a most abominable damning crime, to hold our fellow beings in bondage!" "Sign this petition," says the applicant, "and show that you are against it; and instruct our members in Congress to abolish this heinous sin, so much against our religion and free institutions. You, sir; you, madam; you, my young friend, (to the boys;) you, my little miss;" and, without a further explanation or comment, all sign the instructions to regulate our action here. [You are right in that, said Mr. CUSHMAN from New Hampshire, to my certain knowledge.] And in this manner, sir, said Mr. B. are such petitions gotten up, and such feelings and prejudices propagated throughout that country, against southern men and southern institutions, which are now shaking to its centre every pillar that sustains our republican freedom; while, through ignorance or design, the means by which the object of abolition is to be effected, is cautiously kept concealed from their unthinking subscribers.

Sir, why do they not tell them the truth, when these petitions are presented, and that before their object can be accomplished on that subject, the youngest amongst them will lie cold beneath the silent sod, from the decrepitude of old age; and that the fairest portion of their fellow-companions, brothers, friends, and playmates, will be converted into soldiers, many of whose carcases will be made a prey for the fowl vulture and war-dogs of the South; nor even then would they have depicted the half part of the scene of this threatening, coming havoc. Sir, I ask my honorable friends from that region: Have these deluded men, who are advocating and agitating this subject, thus informed the people, that they are producing of these consequences, which must flow from their conduct, if persisted in, as certain as the radiance of heaven is reflected in the sunbeam. Sir, if they have, what demon has dared to put his hand to pen, to invite such afflictions to lay waste, by kindred slaughter, the fairest fields of this mighty empire of republican freemen? No, sir, no, sir, I can not, I will not believe it; they have been deceived; they have deceived themselves; there cannot be such fiends in human shape, either in the north, the east, west, or south. They have not been taught "the cost of such a job," its price of blood, of treasure, of toil, and of human carnage; and all this to be brought about by the "meek and lowly followers of the Father of Peace."

Let me entreat, said Mr. B. most kindly and tenderly, honorable gentlemen, who now occupy seats on this floor; who represent districts where the moral sense of the community is rotten upon the subject of slavery, from their entire ignorance of its condition, and identity with our institutions, to return home and endeavor to correct and enlighten their misguided zeal, and place before them in their true and unalterable colors, the baleful results that must be inevitably consequent to the cultivation of such prejudices against one portion of this community by the other. Let them be taught the calamities that they invite by their acts to visit this "their own native soil." Let the truth in relation to this subject be proclaimed, that every man in future may mistake not the evil hour of his country's afflictions, so that with seeing eyes, and hearing ears, he may embrace the dire fruits of a misguided frenzy, and fiendlike fanaticism. It was due to their country's peace and safety, to enter their remonstrance against the progress of doctrines so monstrous, and pregnant with such a train of evils. Let them be induced to look nearer home for objects of their sympathy and charity, and he doubted if there be not many more entitled to them near their own household than the sable Africans, whether they are to reside in Texas or the United States.

It had been remarked, by a distinguished author, that nothing was more common than to find men of ability and intelligence, from a false philanthropy, in distant lands in search of evils to reform, while, around their own doors, unheeded, swarmed innumerable abuses, crying aloud for every correction and alleviation that the ingenuity of man could invent. Individuals, as well as communities, before they look abroad, should first turn their eyes towards home, and see if nothing there required the hand of reform. He had no disposition to make any invidious comparison of the poor, the wretched, or oppressed, between any sections of this country; but, he doubted not, that there was as little to be found to the south, and southwest of this, as in any section of country on the face of the globe; and, if there were tears to be shed for suffering humanity, gentlemen might find objects much more entitled to them in another quarter; perhaps these nicknamed philanthropists might find them much nearer home, if not in their own household.

He had been led to make this digression, somewhat, on the subject of slavery and abolition, because he now saw that it was the only efficient cause of the opposition to the recognition of the independence of Texas. He did not believe that honorable gentlemen could lay their hands on their hearts, at this time, and say that it was not the efficient one that prompted this opposition. We have nothing to do with the institution of slavery in Texas, unless we undertake to regulate the institutions of the world; and if the opposition arose from a jealousy, that it might at some future day add political weight or influence to the southern States, that fact, too, should be known for history's sake. The South should not longer be deceived in believing that we met here to legislate for the general advantage of all sections of our country. If their institutions were so odious to any portion of our brethren as to induce them to withhold justice from a gallant though infant little Republic, struggling to burst asunder the fetters that have hitherto bound her to the yoke of despotism, and emerge to the rank of independent nations, in consequence of the similarity of its institutions to our own, there was no longer safety nor security in relying on our councils for protection here. If such a jealousy of our weight (so entirely dependent on remote future contingencies,) and prosperity was tolerated in any quarter of this Republic, the South should know it, and prepare to rest on their own arms and their own resources in all future contingencies. The greatest enemies to the peace, the harmony, the happiness, prosperity and durability of this Government, were not to be found in the South; the worst enemies to our liberty, and to humanity, were to be found in that section where the spirit of abolition and disappointed political ambition had mostly prevailed; it was where the moral sense was rotten to the core by the indulgence of a religious phrenzy and fanaticism. There, and amongst them, abided the worst enemies to this Government, to the Union, and its liberty. It was there where all eyes should be turned, and which should elicit all the patriot's care; it was they that must be subdued, conquered, or reformed, or this nation was in twain; they were the true arch enemies of our peace and our Union, with a predetermined opposition to every measure with which southern interests or the subject of slavery was connected, directly or remotely.

But, sir, said he, I will here leave this branch of the subject, and he hoped for ever.

This Government, and its authorities, if he had not been incorrectly informed, had already done ex necessitate, what it was proposed in effect to be done, by the amendment of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (General Thompson,) then on the table. He had been informed, from the best authority, that the civil authorities at New Orleans had seized a Texan vessel, for some supposed or real offence committed on our commerce; and a regular judicial investigation had been gone through with; in which both the vessel and crew had been treated as belonging to the Government of Texas, and not that of Mexico. There then was a virtual acknowledgment of the Government of Texas, from the very necessity of the case, on the part of our authorities, which went far to establish that necessity of recognition for which he had before contended; and that he insisted had not been all. He had learnt from the highest authority, that since the Minister of that Government, (Colonel Wharton,) from whom, and his Secretary, Colonel Wolf, he confessed himself much indebted for much information he had on that subject, had been at that court, that one of the first officers in the cabinet of President Jackson, and it might be deemed in part, a cabinet measure, had also called on the Minister from Texas, either for reparation or explanation, for certain acts committed by the Texan navy or commerce, on that of the United States; treating Texas thereby, to all intents and purposes, as the de facto Government, and acknowledging constructively "ipso facto," her independence.

He had understood, too, that notes or communications had been received by the representative of the Government of Texas from him then highest in authority, in which that representative had been addressed as the minister or representative of the Government of Texas. Here, then, was a virtual recognition of a fact, from the very necessity of the case, by both the heads of the department, and the civil and judicial authorities of the country, which this house was about to shrink from, to, in his judgment, its eternal shame and degradation; from a spirit of pusillanimity, or what was, if possible, worse, of envy and jealousy of its redounding to the advantage of one section of this country more than another; from some apprehension, perhaps, that it might directly or indirectly effect that subject, which seems now to threaten us of being the Pandora's box of all our future mischiefs; infecting our whole political atmosphere with discords and "furies damned," crying aloud for havoc and civil war. But upon that subject he had said enough; he had considered the whole of it, in every variety of form with which it had presented itself to his mind; and to no subject had he ever come to a more satisfactory conclusion, as to the justice, expediency, and necessity of the measure, than the immediate recognition of the independence of the Republic of Texas, and the indication of the feelings of this body, by the adoption of the measure on the table; the justification of which I am now ready, henceforth and for ever, to throw myself upon the judgment of my God and my country.

DOCTRINE OF CONTEMPTS.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAIBORNE, OF MISSISSIPPI.

In the House of Representatives, February 10, 1837—

On the motion to arrest R. M. WHITNEY, Esq. for an alleged contempt.

The following resolutions, introduced by Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts, being under consideration—

Resolved, That whereas the select committee of this House, acting by the authority of this House, under a resolution of 17th January last, has reported that R. M. Whitney has peremptorily refused to give evidence to a summons duly issued by said committee, and has addressed to the committee the letter reported by said committee to the House; therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directing the Sergeant-at-arms to take into his custody Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the House to answer for an alleged contempt of this House.

Mr. CLAIBORNE of Mississippi moved to amend them, by adding thereto, "and that he be allowed counsel when brought to the bar, should he desire it."

Mr. CLAIBORNE then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. C.) let no man call me the friend of Reuben M. Whitney. If he stood in that group, I could scarcely identify him. I am no lawyer, nor do I appear here as his advocate: I confess myself prejudiced against him. The many charges, mysterious and undefined, which have been brought against him here by gentlemen high in rank—the constant denunciations with which he has been visited—the glittering tomahawk which has been held over his head, like the sword of Damocles—have made upon my mind unfavorable impressions. There are other reasons, sir, which I will not name. But he is an American citizen, accused of a serious offence, and I demand counsel for him. Sir, I voted last session, time after time, in a minority, with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) for his committee of investigation. I voted uniformly for it this session; but I will not consent that a resolution shall pass to drag to this bar a free citizen of the Republic, to be tried by those who are prejudiced against him, without securing to him the privilege of counsel. I denounce it as a high-handed and arbitrary proceeding, unworthy of the age in which we live, and disgraceful to the tribunal that sanctions it.

[Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts here rose and accepted the amendment offered by Mr. CLAIBORNE.]

Mr. C. continued. I am glad that the gentleman has agreed to this act of justice. It removes from this proceeding its most obnoxious feature. But I doubt, if I do not deny, the propriety of dragging Whitney to this bar. I have my doubts whether he has been guilty of a contempt. Sir, your doctrine of contempts is a dangerous doctrine, that originated in times unfavorable to human liberty; in those old days of privilege and prerogative, when the rights of the citizen, if understood, were not defined, and when parliamentary bodies were used by Kings as instruments of oppression and persecution. The power of Congress to punish for contempts, if such a power exists at all, is not expressly conferred, but is incidental, and arises ex necessitate rei. Where is the clause in the Constitution making the grant and defining a contempt? Sir, it is a constructive and incidental power. The powers and privileges of Congress are not like those of the British Parliament, unlimited, undefined, and omnipotent; on the contrary, they are abridged and specific. Our courts of justice have the power to punish for contempts; but it is not a constructive power, arising out of the mere act that established them, but was conferred by a statute, restraining in its character, in 1789. The common law does not invest the federal courts with this power, nor can we derive it from the common law. As a system, the common law does not constitute any part of the law of the United States, according to the highest courts of the country; an opinion, too, upon which Congress has uniformly legislated. No department of Government can therefore derive any such authority from it. In 1831, after the memorable trial of Judge Peck, of Missouri, Congress deemed it necessary to define, by law, the nature of contempts of court.

Mr. Speaker, this whole doctrine of contempts, as held in England, as dangerous and tyrannical, not only because it is undefined, but because from it there is no appeal. One court cannot supervise the decision of another. There can be no appeal, for instance, from the King's Bench to the Common Pleas, nor from the Chancery to the Exchequer. However wrong the judgment, or evident the error, or severe the punishment, there can be no appeal. The power is unlimited, beyond control, and may be applied, without cause, whenever the ruling party thinks proper to adjudge it. Sir, if the common law is not in force here, if we have no lex Parliamenti, if all our privileges are strictly limited and defined, whence do you derive the power now assumed? Have your deliberations been obstructed? Beware, sir, how you venture upon these constructive doctrines to deprive a free-man of his liberty. How long will it be before a majority here may muzzle the freedom of the press, and punish a difference of opinion as a contempt? We shall have revived upon us the seditious law. Beware, Mr. Speaker, of English precedents unfavorable to individual rights.

"To introduce examples from the British House of Commons," observed the late Chief Justice Parsons, of Massachusetts, in a case of legislative privilege before him, "cannot much illustrate the subject. The privileges of that House are not derived from any written constitution, but have been acquired by the successful struggles of centuries, directed either against monarchy or an hereditary aristocracy. The exertions of the Commons have generally been popular, because the people were supposed to reap the fruits of them. In this State we have a written Constitution, formed by the people, in which they have defined not only the powers, but the privileges of the House, either by express words, or by necessary implication. A struggle for privileges in this State would be a contest against the people, to wrest from them what they have not chosen to grant."—[4 Mass. R. 1.]

Ours is a written Constitution. The powers and the privileges of Congress, which may be in some measure regarded as distinct, are there laid down. We cannot transcend them. Any effort to enlarge them would be to usurp from the people authority heretofore not granted to us by them. Tell me, sir, where is their grant to you to issue a warrant against Whitney? You arraign him before a tribunal prejudiced against him; some of those who compose it are his avowed enemies; you try and convict him; there is no appeal from your verdict; you may imprison, fine, mutilate, or even transport him, and there is no redress. You claim this stupendous power as an incidental right, for it is nowhere granted. Sir, do you think the people will tolerate an assumption so monstrous? I deny that you have any constitutional authority to sustain this doctrine of constructive offences. You might be pardoned for assuming incidental powers to preserve this body from indecorum or violence; but, in a case like this, where no actual violence has been committed, where no positive indignity has been offered, and where a citizen merely declines to appear before a committee, whose chairman, he alleges, has menaced his life, the exercise of such a doubtful prerogative would be very inexpedient.

Sir, there is one striking difference between the British Parliament and the American Congress. The former considers itself a court of general, and, in respect to contempts, of exclusive jurisdiction, claiming to derive from the custom of Parliament, which is part and parcel of the law of England. All the books so recognize it. Its judicial powers were fully shown in the celebrated debate, in 1771, upon a resolution to punish the Lord Mayor of London for an alleged contempt. In 1830, however, in the House of Peers, the Lord Chancellor, in the teeth of all previous authority, denied the existence of positive power in Parliament. He admitted that it could imprison for self-protection, but not punish in any other mode. Now, sir, if such a doubt was entertained by one of the highest functionaries and one of the ablest lawyers in England, in the face, too, of those innumerable precedents cited by Lord Raymond, Coke, Salkeld, Chitty, East, and others; if he declares its exercise unfavorable to public liberty, is it unreasonable for us to doubt its constitutionality in this country, and the expediency of resorting to it? Sir, when we exercise this power of arresting and holding in custody a citizen, do we not violate that part of the Constitution which declares "that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law?" In the well known case, in 14 East, of Burdett vs. Abbott, when it was contended that the arrest of Burdett, for a contempt, was in violation of that celebrated act of Parliament from which this clause of our Constitution was derived, Lord Ellenborough declared that it did not violate that act, because it was authorized and warranted by the law of Parliament, which was equally the law of the land. Sir, that answer may have been very correct in England, but it cannot be sustained in this country, where there is no such law, and where there is no express grant of such a power in the Constitution. There is no more dangerous power than that which justifies the punishment of constructive contempts. Unlimited, undefined, unknown to the people, its exercise comes upon the citizen like the penalties of the laws of the Roman tyrant, which were printed in italics, and elevated beyond the reach of vision.

Whence is this prerogative derived? If from the Constitution, point out the clause. If conferred by the Constitution, is it not the duty of Congress, before resorting to it, to settle and define its boundaries, and to prescribe the penalties by law? But it is said to be a necessary incident of a legislative body, necessary to preserve its existence, and enable it to transact the public business. There may be some foundation for this delicate but dangerous claim to inherent, undelegated grants, as regards actual contempts committed in the presence of this body, and obstructing its operations. Such a claim may be allowed on the principle of necessity; but where is the necessity of the power in regard to constructive or implied contempts, and what is the limitation upon it? The moment we step beyond the doctrine of punishment for actual offences of this kind, we venture upon a terra incognita, whose boundaries have never been delineated; whose powers and extent have never been defined by any code, ancient or modern. Let us pause, and closely examine the tenures by which we claim, before we enter upon grounds so uncertain, so dangerous, so obnoxious to the spirit of our Government and people. It may be very convenient for this House to punish a citizen for an implied misdemeanor, but the convenience of the doctrine does not grant the power. Show me, sir, a case of absolute necessity to warrant the exercise of this power. What is the doctrine of constructive contempts? How far does it go? Where does it stop? If you send interrogatories to a citizen of Virginia, can you drag him from his home, and incarcerate him here, should he refuse to answer? Or would you consign him to the jail of his own county? Who would arrest him? Who commit him? If you fined him, who would collect it, and, when collected, how would you dispose of it? Sir, in my opinion, an action would lie against your Sergeant-at-arms for the false imprisonment of Whitney; and a judge would be bound to release him on a habeas corpus; would you arrest this judge for a contempt? Suppose a citizen should shut himself up in his castle, and resist your process even unto the death of your officer; would you try, and condemn, and execute him? How, when, where? Suppose your Sergeant should apply to a magistrate of this city for a posse comitatus, and be refused; would you punish the magistrate for a contempt? Can you punish editors who speak contemptuously of your proceedings? If so, God help the letter-writers! Can you convert this House into a judicial tribunal, which shall be judge, witness, accuser, and prosecutor, in its own case, and inflict any punishment it chooses? If so, where is the freedom of the citizen; where our boasted trial by jury; where that "due process of law," that "LIBERTY" guaranteed by the Constitution? Carry out these undefined, discretionary doctrines, and it will demonstrate either your unbounded power, or your utter impotency. Tell me not, sir, of the precedents of the British Parliament. That is a body confessedly omnipotent. This is one of limited powers. Their claim to punish for offences of this nature is drawn from a system of recognised law. We are mere agents for the exercise of limited and specific grants; and I thank God that it is so. I rejoice that freedom of speech and the right of self-defence cannot be curtailed; that all your enactments in relation to these are void; that gentlemen cannot, if they would, have a legislative auto da fe, and burn every man for contempt, who will not follow them, or applaud their acts.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to my second position. I deny that this House can justly punish any one for a contempt or breach of privilege, so long as the gross and outrageous procedure of the member from Massachusetts (Mr. John Quincy Adams) remains unpunished. Sir, it is mockery to carry out this solemn farce. Talk not to me of vindicating your insulted dignity by the prosecution of Whitney. You have no dignity to vindicate. [Here the Chair interposed, and said that the rules did not permit reflections upon the House.] Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. C.) I wish to violate no rule, and will confine myself to matters of fact. An outrage long matured, maliciously devised, and boldly perpetrated, has been offered to this House, in the face of the whole country. Your rules have been violated, and your judgment defied, by one who rejoices in the alarm and excitement he occasions, like the midnight incendiary who fires the dwelling of his enemy, and listens with pleasure to the screams of his burning victims. [The Speaker again stated that personal remarks could not be allowed.] Sir, (continued Mr. C.) I speak as a creole of the South, a slaveholder and a planter, whose all of earthly hope is identified with Mississippi, when I denounce the conduct of that member as disgraceful and unpardonable. [Cries of "order!" in the neighborhood of Mr. Adams, and of "go on! go on!" from the southern members.] Sir, if the rules allowed me, I would say that instead of trifling with Reuben M. Whitney, this House had better redeem its lost reputation and atone to the outraged South, by visiting upon this political Erostratus the punishment due to his crime.

Sir, if a man, venerable for his age and station, heretofore high in the confidence of his country, and endowed with extraordinary abilities, not diminished by the wear and tear of time, is suffered in this hall, under the broad light of heaven, thus to insult you, I say you have no right to take cognizance of a doubtful offence, committed by an obscure citizen. If you meanly shrink from chastising where chastisement is due; if you suffer the proud and influential to escape, and vent the fury of your passions upon a powerless citizen, you will stand before the country like some tyrant king, feared indeed, but distrusted and despised. Why is it that so many here, who have been conspicuous in crying order! order! at every violation of the rules, who are so prudish, petulant, and squeamish when their own dignity is disputed; are willing to engage in this prosecution, when they have just refused to censure the perpetrator of an outrage that has no parallel in parliamentary history? Sir, when gentlemen answer me this, in foro conscientia, I will calmly listen to their arguments for this prosecution. I will try to be persuaded of the propriety of converting this body into a grand council, to sit upon political creeds, and determine what is heterodox in our articles of faith; or into a committee of inquest, the instrument of defeated minorities or triumphant majorities, empowered to prosecute and punish obnoxious individuals.

Mr. Speaker, I have hitherto sat in silence, when the subject of SLAVERY has been brought up here, and stifled within my burning bosom the sentiments which I could not utter. From my earliest childhood I have been taught that none but a slaveholder had a right to discuss the subject; and when I heard gentlemen constantly declaiming about it, nothing but your rigid rules prevented me from saying that the utterance of such sentiments in the State from which I come, by a statute drawn by my own hand, would doom them to the highest punishment known to the law. Let not gentlemen seek to disguise their designs, by confining their remarks to the abolition of slavery in this District. It stands here, as in the States, upon a tenure which you cannot dispute. It is a vested, indefeasible, inalienable right, existing prior to the cession by Maryland and Virginia—a right which those States did not and could not surrender. They themselves have no such power to violate vested rights. I deny your jurisdiction over the question, in any form; you have no authority to entertain it, even for a moment. It is a flagrant and dangerous assumption of power; a stretch of prerogative that can never be submitted to. Whenever such a power is assumed, you affect the stability of property, you violate a sacred charter, you throw open to every invader the closed portals of the Constitution. You manumit by fraud and violence the slaves that you affect to pity; you doom them to beggary, outlawry, prostitution, and crime, and turn against them the arms of their own masters. Sir, gentlemen are eloquent on this subject. All their eloquence falls like an iceberg on my heart. I feel the impropriety of their course. I see it in the alarm and distrust they have produced, in the anxious vigils of my neighbors, in the broken slumbers and startling dreams of the beautiful beings that we idolize and watch. What comfort, what guarantee, do your promises carry to the insulated plantations of the south? What know you of our condition, living, as you do, in crowded cities, where your lamp-eyed streets are sentinelled, and ten thousand bayonets bristle for your protection? Sir, your false benevolence, your officious interference, your incendiary publications, have already done us irreparable injury. You have demoralized our slaves, and fired them with discontent, and made them feel a chain which they never felt until now. In their natural condition, before your emissaries came among us, they were more honest, virtuous, and independent, had more pride of character and love of country, than nine-tenths of the incendiaries that sign these petitions. Mr. Speaker, I am no prophet of evil, and speak on Cassandra voice; but I tell you, in the names of the 50,000 freemen I represent, that we must be quieted on this question; not soothed not drugged with opiates into temporary apathy, but we must receive a solemn assurance that our rights are neither to be questioned nor debated. When I speak of the South, I include this District. We plant our feet on this position. If you can legislate on the subject here, you have jurisdiction in Virginia. If you preach your crusade in this metropolis, the contagion will soon spread in the adjoining States. If you locate your colony of free negroes and enthusiasts here, you establish a battery from which may be thrown burning shells, filled with mischief and massacre, into every dwelling in the South. Here will be the rendezvous; here bigotry will muster its forces; from this political Vatican it will send forth its anathemas; and in a few years, a southern man will be hissed as he walks that avenue. Mr. Speaker, I will not impeach the great body of the people of the North. It may not be her fault that the red squadrons of fanaticism are careering through her territories; that there is now in her bosom an agrarian and Vandal spirit, which would shake the doric edifice of her morals, and trample down the corinthian porticoes of literature and art. But it will be her crime if she does not resist and stifle its denationalizing stream, until it swells into a tide of blood. It will be her crime if she sits tamely by, while her sons heave in among us poisoned missiles and burning tiles. Sir, in times gone by this would not have been allowed. One common blood cemented the broad altar of liberty around which we worship. When the iron hurricane of war swept over this country, our fainting banner was borne aloft amid the dun battle and the dusky storm by united valor. And now, when the confederacy is sought to be destroyed; when the incendiary is lighting his torch, and the vultures of society are looking on with felon eyes—oh, now! may the sainted spirits of the dead, may the holy memories of the past, inspire the brave and patriotic, in every quarter of the north, to rally upon the ramparts of the Constitution. Sir, with my hand on this heart, I can freely say that, in defence of the Union, I would shed my blood. But there are rights and institutions dearer still, part of our inheritance, essential to our existence, indispensable to our peace; and I should be a traitor and a craven to shrink from their defence. Sir, continued Mr. C. my talented friend from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens,) in a speech of extraordinary eloquence and passion, declared that, on this subject, the South had no fears. I differ with that honorable member—I do fear, sir; not for my sunny State; not for my gallant constituents; not for our fleecy fields; not for our spreading commerce; not for the innocent that cluster around our firesides; but for this glorious Union. We fear for this, sir; the horrid consequences, the long years of war, the conflicts between anarchy and despotism, growing darker and bloodier in the dusky vistas of futurity; I pray God, sir, to preserve our country. Mr. Speaker, if this House joins the abolitionists; if you thus permit their avowed organ upon this floor to menace us with a future interference with our domestic rights, I warn you of the catastrophe that is at hand. We will abandon your councils; we will seize our arms and tear down the banner of union that floats over our heads. On you be the crime—on your hands the blood. But by our common ancestry, by the recollections of the past and the hopes of the future, by the altars of our holy religion, by our hundred battlefields and the bones that rest upon them, I implore you to retrace your steps. Sir, we are on the verge of a frightful crisis. Look abroad for the evidences of alarm that crowd upon the eye. See this paper, now circulating here, boding of disunion. View your excited galleries. In that one, see a thousand freemen in solemn crowds, as if to witness the funeral obsequies of the republic. In this, a splendid array of beauty, imploring you, with the eloquence of grief, to save them from the consequences of yesterday. Sir, will you suffer it to go forth to the world that, by a vote of this House, you have asserted the right of Southern slaves to petition for their freedom? Will you pause to punish an obscure citizen, while you allow the member from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) to banquet upon the excitement he has occasioned?

Who, sir, is this Reuben M. Whitney, that the House should pause now to inquire into his offences? He has been denounced, week after week, on this floor, as a perjured traitor, knave, and villain. Grant that he is. Have these denunciations made no impression? Have they not been aided by all the seductions of eloquence, the influence of character, and the contagion of passion? Have they left no prejudices in the minds of members against the accused? Have these burning anathemas, caught up and circulated by a thousand pens, been forgotten? No, sir; no! If it be possible for a body like this, where the ordinary rules of evidence and pleading cannot be strictly observed, to form a correct judgment in any criminal prosecution, I insist upon it that, in this case, we should not go into a trial. How many here can put their hands on their hearts and say they have no preconceived opinions unfavorable to the accused—opinions imbibed from rumor, from the press, from the repeated charges made against him here? How many, I say, are qualified to act as judge or juror? Let gentlemen place themselves at that bar, in the position of the accused, and say if they would not challenge the right of every other man to enter upon trial. He may waive the right to plead to your jurisdiction, but gentlemen themselves should apply the right of challenge, not permitted the accused at this bar, but granted to every felon arraigned before our courts of justice. Sir, I make no appeal to the sympathies of this House. I will not speak of the injury that may have already done to one who is possibly innocent; of the loss of public confidence, and the pressure of public confidence, and the pressure of public scorn; of fortune blighted, and future life made wretched; nor yet of those, the heart-stricken and the innocent, who must drain with him the dregs of this bitter cup. But I must ask you to look calmly at the case. On the one hand, a tribunal, composed of the representatives of a great people, claiming to live under a Government of equal laws; and on the other, an obscure citizen, denounced, as they think justly, by gentlemen of great distinction, ferreted by the press, snarled at by the terriers of society, "Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart," at every corner of the street. In this view of the case, I ask justice for the accused—justice for yourselves. If crime he has been guilty of, there is no law defining that crime. If he is to be put on his trial, there are no settled rules prescribing the mode of trial. If judgment be pronounced against him, there is no other court to which he may appeal this side the grave! Sir, in the great volume of English history you will find many prosecutions of this character. But they were in times long gone by; and now, when the feelings that prompted them, and the judges, and their victims, are buried in the same oblivion, we view them as the relics of feudalism, and instructive, but revolting examples of human injustice and infirmity. In more modern times, these prosecutions have been rare, and, before being brought to a conclusion, have been generally swept away by the currents of public disapprobation. "In vain," says an able writer, "have courts of justice and juries of our fellow-citizens been exclusively intrusted with the high and delicate discretion of interpreting the laws and the facts, on which depend the rights, the property, and the reputation of every citizen." In vain has the Constitution provided ample securities for all these. In vain have the laws explained and reinforced these provisions. In vain is every safeguard of constitution and law, of court and jury, if a naked resolution of Congress can overleap and prostrate them all; coerce the production of private papers; oblige a man to disclose the history of his whole life, and compel him to answer, even though he may criminate himself; and all this without the forms of justice, without judge or jury, and before a tribunal whose jurisdiction is without limit or appeal. If a judge decides erroneously, or corruptly, or from the impulse of passion, he may be impeached, tried, and degraded. His decisions may be set aside, and justice, however tardily, finally administered. But what remedy or resource is left to the citizen, whose feelings have been assailed, whose person threatened, whose reputation crushed under the weight of our displeasure? Whom shall he look to for redress? Can he procure our impeachment? Can he bring his action of damages against the embodied representatives of the people? No, he is left without resource; like the victim of the inquisition, he must bear his tortures as best he may, and thank Heaven that, though his limbs are dislocated, he has escaped with life.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I ask, shall a body, no longer respected for its moderation and dignity, and not respecting itself; which has become, in some measure, an arena for the exhibition of angry passions and furious gladiators; where scenes of violence and disorder have so often been allowed to go unpunished; where your rules are set at defiance with impunity; where, not five years since, the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] refused to vote, and persisted in that refusal, in contempt of the decision and the written rules of the House; and at the very same session, a member [Mr. Stanberry of Ohio,] was suffered to insult the Speaker, and to order him out of the chair, and forty-four members refused to censure him; where, in fact, every thing derogatory to a deliberative assembly has been tolerated; shall such a body, in the exercise of an implied, substantive, and dangerous power, proceed to arraign and punish an American citizen for declining to appear before a committee—not out contempt, as he declares, to it or to this House, but because its chairman had threatened "to take his life, if he moved his arm one inch!" Sir, this is a question which the PEOPLE of this country, without distinction of party, will answer. They will not inquire into the character of Whitney, his acts, past or present. They will recognise him as a citizen of this Republic, entitled to the protection of its laws; and, however the passions or the prejudices, or the convictions of this body, may decide against him, for this alleged contempt, be assured the people will reverse your judgment.

SPEECH OF MR. GHOLSON, OF MISSISSIPPI.

In the House of Representatives, Feb. 10, 1837.—On the motion to arrest Reuben M. Whitney, Esq. for an alleged contempt.

The following resolutions of Mr. LINCOLN, of Massachusetts—

Resolved, That whereas the Select Committee of this House, acting by the authority of this House, under a resolution of the 17th of January last, has reported that R. M. Whitney has peremptorily refused to give evidence to a summons duly issued by said committee, and has addressed to the committee the letter reported by said committee to the House; therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directing the Sergeant-at-arms to take into custody Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of this House to answer for an alleged contempt of the House:

And the amendment of Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, that "R. M. Whitney be allowed counsel on that occasion, should he desire it"—being under consideration—

Mr. GHOLSON addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Speaker: I am aware that there exists a variety of opinions as to the power of this House to punish acts not interrupting the proceedings of the House nor committed in its presence, as contempts. This resolution assumes the facts that a contempt had been committed, and that the House possesses the power to punish it; and it is now proposed that, without further inquiry, we shall deprive a citizen of his liberty, and direct our Sergeant-at-arms to seize and hold him in custody. I do not believe this House possesses any such power.

Mr. Speaker, I am of opinion that the report of the committee, upon which this proceeding is founded, is based upon the letter of Mr. Whitney given to the House by the committee; and, as such, the House must, in coming to a conclusion, take into consideration the letter of Whitney, and the reasons given in that letter for his refusal to appear before the committee. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who deny the power of this House to punish for constructive contempts. I, sir, do not believe there is any power given to this House, by the Constitution, to punish a citizen of this country for a constructive contempt, growing out of his refusal to appear before a committee of this House, standing as the present witness does towards the chairman of that committee. Sir, there is no law giving authority to place an American citizen under duress under such circumstances; and I, sir, for one, never can give my consent to see authority exercised by this House that I do not believe it possesses; but it is said the exercise of this authority is necessary to the preservation of our rights. Sir, I think such a preservation of our rights as this, promises, ere long, to take from us the rights we now have. Gentlemen talk of the rights and dignity of this House, and say they must be respected. I say to them that we, as the representatives of the people, come here with delegated powers, and are bound to keep within the pale of the Constitution, which Constitution is the palladium of our rights and liberties, and gives this House no power to place an American citizen in the custody of our Sergeant-at-arms for a constructive contempt. Sir, after the proceeding of this House in relation to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and his petition from thirty-two slaves, what is this House to consider a contempt?

Sir, it is contemptuously asked by honorable gentlemen on this floor, who is the contemptuous Reuben M. Whitney? I answer, that I know him only as an American citizen; and, as such, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the Constitution. I ask gentlemen, in return, from what source do they derive the power to place him in custody? I tell gentlemen, at the outset, that precedents from the British Parliament cannot be received by me as authority for the arrest of an American citizen. I, sir, have the honor to represent in part the highly honorable, democratic, and patriotic people of Mississippi; a people who, from the democratic character of their institutions, are known to be tenacious of their rights; and I cannot, as their representative, sit idly here and see one known to possess the high and exalted privileges of an American citizen arrested by order of this House, brought as a prisoner to answer at the bar, without attempting to arrest the course of usurpation, and exercise of such usurped power, on the part of this House, over the rights of the people.

Sir, the doctrine contained in the parliamentary annals of Great Britain, and given in the precedents of the House of Commons, is utterly repugnant to the spirit and genius of our republican institutions. The English law of privilege, and the power of the British Parliament to punish for contempts, is undefined, unlimited, and unknown to the subject, except as particular cases occur, in which Parliament, in their omnipotent discretion, choose to exercise it. Thus it is that the infliction of punishment is the first evidence of the existence of the rule under which it is inflicted.

Mr. Speaker, let us inquire for a moment into the circumstances under which it is proposed to bring Mr. Whitney before this House.

Sir, by the very terms of the resolution under which we are to act, it is for an alleged contempt, and that allegation sustained only by construction. Sir, the honorable chairman of the committee before whom Mr. Whitney has refused to appear and for which refusal this proceeding is instituted, has, according to his reported speech, made on this floor, asserted that he would, on a certain occasion, and that, too, whilst he was acting as a member of a committee appointed by the order of this House, and at a time this witness, Whitney, was before that committee as a witness, and whilst this honorable chairman was acting in a judicial capacity, have taken the life of this witness if he had moved his hand. Yes, sir, if he had moved his arm one inch, even in his own defence, the honorable chairman of this committee informs us that he would have taken his life; and that in defence of his friend, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who, he states, was rushing upon Whitney. [Here Mr. Wise explained.]

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman's explanation amounts to the same thing that I had stated; he admits that his friend, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, was advancing upon Whitney, whilst Whitney was before the committee as a witness. Sir, I am not to be deterred by the honorable gentleman's implied threat, nor by his imputation and "insinuation" that I had misquoted him.

[The Speaker stated that he had not understood the honorable gentleman from Virginia to make any threat, or he would have interposed; and that the gentleman from Mississippi must not make personal allusions.] Mr. Speaker, I shall, in arguing this question, pursue the same course that other gentlemen have pursued on this floor. I assure the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that if he expects to intimidate me, he has mistaken his man. I shall pursue my own course, without regard to his implied threat. Then, sir, what is the distinguishing difference in the statement first given, and the one now given by the honorable gentleman who is chairman, and before whom Whitney refuses to appear? In either event, the life of Whitney was to be taken, even if he defended himself against the honorable gentleman from Tennessee; and it is for this that gentlemen say he has been guilty of a contempt of this House. Sir, I am not prepared to force a witness before a committee, when the chairman of that committee stands in such relation towards the witness as the honorable chairman does in this instance. Then I ask, is it a contempt of this House for a witness to refuse to appear before a committee of this House under such circumstances; and has this House the power, and will we be acting in accordance with the authority vested in us by the Constitution, to have the witness brought to the bar of his House to answer for such refusal? I certainly think, upon examination, it will be found that this House possesses no such power.

If the witness be sent before the committee, self-defence is the paramount law of our nature. Self-defence is one of the natural rights that all men in this country possess. Self-defence is one of the inalienable rights, dear to this witness, secured to all American citizens by the very nature of our free institutions; and, if he goes, he must be permitted to go before the committee armed for his own protection; for he is apprized of the feelings of the honorable chairman of the committee towards him, by the expression of the honorable gentleman made on this floor. Sir, if we force the witness before the committee, and he goes there armed, (and I hold that we cannot think of forcing him there without the power to protect himself,) may not the result be such as we would regret, and would we not be responsible for the consequences? Let me ask, will not Whitney commit a greater contempt by going before the committee armed than he has done in refusing to go before the committee under the circumstances of this case? Then, sir, I believe Whitney, under the circumstances, is justified in refusing to appear before the committee. Then, if we order Whitney into custody, and to be brought to the bar of this House to answer, as a criminal, will we not do so in violation of all his rights as a citizen, and will we not establish a dangerous precedent? Has this House the power to try offenders? Has this House the power to fine and imprison? And do gentlemen intend to carry out the doctrine of the British Parliament, which is, that the Parliament is omnipotent? Does not the Constitution secure to all men the right of trial by jury; and, if we bring him to answer at the bar, will we not try him by two hundred and forty judges? The honorable members of this House, who will sit as judges in their own case—for he is to be tried for a contempt to this House—we, the members composing this House, then, surely, are not his proper triers; and if we convict him, what punishment can we inflict? Is it not a solemn mockery to order the Speaker of this House to say to him, Sir, in accordance with the order of this House, I am instructed to reprimand you; you are, therefore, hereby reprimanded? And this, too, will be without the authority of the Constitution, and in direct violation of the rights secured by that sacred instrument. But gentlemen say this is necessary to secure the dignity and enforce the power of this House. What! necessary that we should disregard the rights of our citizens, and say to the people of the United States, that we, the House of Representatives, possess and exercise unlimited control over the persons of our citizens? I understand the Constitution to have been formed for the purposes, amongst others, of protecting our citizens from the aggressions of those in power; and we have no right to protect ourselves, as a body, beyond the rights secured to us by that instrument, which rights are fully defined. Let me ask gentlemen if this is the language of republican democracy? If it is, may Heaven protect the people I have the honor in part to represent on this floor from the action of such democracy. Sir, the powers of this House, as defined, specified, and pointed out by the Constitution, are: First. To choose their own Speaker and other officers. Secondly. To originate all bills for raising revenue. Thirdly. The sole power of impeachment. Fourthly. To determine the rules of its own proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and expel a member with the concurrence of two-thirds. Fifthly. The power to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members.

Mr. Speaker, from the course this House is taking through committees, we are giving to Reuben M. Whitney an importance that I cannot for a moment believe he possesses in relation to this Government. I think, then, there is no doubt it is the object of certain gentlemen on this floor to reach the character of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, by means of the sacrifice that is by this proceeding to be made of Whitney. Gentlemen are mistaken if they think to mislead the public mind in this way: they have made certain charges of corruption against this administration; they have asked of this House undefined power to prove these charges; that power has been granted them, as unlimited as they have asked it: they cannot now shield themselves behind the intended sacrifice of Reuben M. Whitney. Sir, the President has, by his sagacity and firmness, added to a series of patriotic efforts, triumphed, I hope for ever, over the deep-laid schemes of a subtle aristocracy to wrest this Government from its primitive principles, and engraft upon it the worst fruits of ancient and discarded abuses. After having laid his country under obligations which ensure him the lasting gratitude of his fellow-citizens, and veneration of future ages, the President is now on the eve of retiring from all public employment. Gentlemen need not think to destroy his well-earned reputation in this way: freemen are not so easily imposed upon: gentlemen need not think to shield themselves securely behind the sacrifice of an humble citizen.

Mr. Speaker, let me not be misunderstood. I admit, unquestionably, Congress is the great inquest of the nation, and, as such, possesses certain powers necessary to all inquiries into the administration of the Government: but I maintain that these powers are limited both by the constitutional provisions and laws growing out of them, and that they cannot be exercised in violation of either; if they could, the power of Congress would be independent and unlimited, above all responsibility to the Constitution, the laws, or the people who made them.

If every citizen of the United States, from becoming in some way obnoxious to a member of Congress, or a party in Congress, or for political purposes, may be dragged before a committee, and at pleasure ordered to bring his papers, without specifying which or for what purpose; questioned as to his private affairs; threatened, and if he resists with the firmness becoming a freeman, his life placed in jeopardy; and if he refuse to attend on a committee, he can be arrested and brought in custody to answer at the bar of this House; if all this can be done by the mere naked authority of Congress; nay, sir, by the naked authority of this House, I ask, where is there any security whatever for the person, the rights, or the reputation of any citizen of the United States?

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the Senate, Friday, Feb. 24, 1837.—Upon the proposition made by Mr. NILES, of Connecticut, to reduce the duty on the importation of foreign coal.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would not impose upon himself the task of following the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Niles) throughout his argument. If he were to pursue this course, we should not close our contest even at the rising of the stars, which was the time appointed for the termination of the ancient trials by battle. He should, therefore, content himself with some general observations on the subject.

Mr. B. congratulated the Senator from Connecticut upon his rapid advance towards the true doctrine upon this question. Some weeks ago that Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, had reported a bill to repeal altogether the duties upon the importation of foreign coal. After reflection, he now merely proposed to hasten, by a few years, the operation of the compromise act in relation to this article, by reducing the duty to one dollar per ton, after September next, and to sixty cents per ton after September, 1838. Judging from this rapid change in his opinion, Mr. B. had good reason to hope that if the Senator could have a few weeks longer for further reflection, he would acknowledge himself to be wrong, and permit the reduction of this duty to keep pace with the reduction of duties upon other protected articles. It was now, under his proposed amendment, only a question of two or three years, sooner or later; but it was one involving the important principle whether this great staple of Pennsylvania was entitled to the same protection with other articles of domestic production.

Mr. B. said he would undertake to demonstrate that coal was an article as clearly embraced, both by the letter and the spirit of the compromise act of 1833, as the woollen manufactures of Connecticut, or any other domestic fabric. Here, he would take occasion to make some general suggestions in relation to this act. He had stated on a former occasion that when this bill had passed he was in a foreign land. When he received the information of its passage, and that it had caused all the angry elements of political strife to subside, and produced peace and tranquillity at home, he hailed the news with more heartfelt joy than any other political event which he had ever heard. He did not then wait to examine its provisions. He was surrounded by persons who were predicting that our Union was on the point of dissolution. The tone of our public papers, as well as the debates in Congress at that period, had led those to believe, who did not understand the recuperative energies of our Constitution, that we were on the very eve of separation. The passage of the compromise bill dissipated this illusion throughout Europe. Upon subsequent reflection, he could not say whether, balancing the difficulties which surrounded the question, he would or he would not have voted for this measure, had he then been a member of the Senate.

But this bill had received the sanction of all the competent authorities of the country. It was now the law of the land. It was the price which we had paid for domestic peace and tranquillity. It was the act which restored harmony to the Union. Under these circumstances, he could not consider it as a mere ordinary act of legislation. It is true we might repeal it; yet he thought there was a moral obligation imposed upon us to give it a fair trial. From the recent debates and proceedings in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and from his own knowledge of the sentiments of the people of that State, he believed that, in expressing this opinion, he was speaking the voice of a large majority upon that subject, notwithstanding many might suppose that this act would not yield sufficient protection to some branches of our manufactures.

What was the nature of this compromise? He would state it briefly. It provided for a gradual reduction of the then existing duties on protected articles until they should sink to twenty per cent. on the 30th June, 1842; and after that period this amount of protection would be secured to the agricultural, manufacturing, and mining productions of the country. The credits for duties, which were now extended to importers, would then be abolished, and they must be paid in ready money. This would be an important advantage to our domestic industry; as it was notorious that, at the present time, importers of foreign merchandise converted the credits which they received from the Government into so much active capital, to be employed in making further importations. Besides, the compromise law provides that, after June, 1842, the duties shall be assessed on the value of the goods at the port of entry in this country, and not, as at present, on their value at the foreign port from whence they are exported. It also enacts that a number of articles essential to our manufactures, and which cannot come into competition with any of them, shall then be admitted free of duty.

Mr. B. would feel more confidence that this duty of twenty per cent. with the other advantages secured to our domestic industry by this act, would be sufficient to sustain our manufactures after the year 1842, if it were not for one counteracting cause. He referred to the rapidly increasing amount of our paper currency. Should it become much more depreciated than it was at present, our manufactures would be in great danger. It was impossible that the manufactures of any country, where the currency was greatly depreciated, could sustain a competition with those of another country possessing any thing like equal advantages, where the currency was in a sound and healthy condition, without an amount of protection which the American people would never sanction. It was fortunate for us that, at the present moment, the currency of England was not in a better condition than our own. For his own part, he should give no vote at the present time which might tend to disturb this compromise. In this respect he would follow what he believed to be public opinion in the State which he had in part the honor to represent.

Was coal a protected article which had been embraced by the compromise act? The whole argument contained in the Senator's report from the Committee on Manufactures rests upon the principle that it was not. He alleges that the duty collected upon its importation had always been merely for the purpose of revenue; and he assumes the fact that although the tariff of May, 1824, had raised this duty from 5 to 6 cents per heaped bushel, there was no intention, by this increase, to afford protection to the domestic article. For this reason he contends that it is not within the spirit and meaning of the compromise act; that it is not one of the great interests intended to be protected by it, and that the question is left as entirely open as if we were now, for the first time, about to determine whether we should impose a duty on the importation of foreign coal. This was the scope of the argument contained in the report.

Mr. B. must be permitted to say that the Senator had entirely mistaken the fact upon which his whole argument was founded. He believed he personally knew as much concerning the origin and progress of the tariff of 1824 as any man living, the Senator from Kentucky himself (Mr. Clay,) not excepted. "All which he saw, and part of which he was." The gentleman who reported and carried that measure through the House, the late Judge Tod, was his colleague from Pennsylvania, with whom, during the whole progress of the bill, he had been in constant and daily habits of intimacy. That gentleman would have been faithless to his high trust if, in the general protection afforded to all the great interests of the country by that bill, he had neglected an interest which was then attracting great attention in the State of Pennsylvania, and enlisting public feeling strongly in its favor. His memory was not justly liable to any such imputation. Mr. B. knew the fact.

It was true that in 1823, the year previous to the passage of this law, only six thousand tons of coal had been carried to market in Philadelphia; but the coal region had been explored, and it had been ascertained that a large portion of our mountainous territory was filled with this precious mineral. Without protection, there could not have been sufficient capital invested to extract it from the bowels of the earth and transport it to market. A duty of six cents per bushel was therefore inserted in the original draught of the bill; and, according to his best recollection, no voice had been raised against this provision. What, then, had become of the corner-stone of the Senator's argument?

The Senator says this was a mere revenue duty. How had he attempted to prove his position? Only by contending that such ought to have been the case. On the same principle, and by arguments equally conclusive, he might withdraw the protection now afforded by our laws from any other article of domestic production. In the whole range of these articles, there was scarcely one better entitled to the fostering care of the Government, upon the acknowledged principles of the tariff policy, than the article of coal.

In selecting objects supereminently entitled to protection, two questions had always been asked: were they necessities of life? and if so, was there a fair prospect that, by affording protection to them for a limited period, they would afterwards be able to protect themselves without burdening the community? Let us test the article of coal by these principles. It would be vain to waste arguments for the purpose of proving that coal is one of the necessities of life. Our forests are rapidly disappearing with the progress of improvement. This is the only article of fuel with which the eastern cities and the eastern portion of our Union can now be supplied. Without it, our people would be exposed to the greatest suffering, and many of our manufactures must cease to exist. Was it then wise, was it politic, to be dependent upon a foreign nation for such an article? If we were, a war with England would at once cut off our supply. Fuel is of such indispensable necessity to human existence, in our climate, that we must be greatly dependent upon any country from whence it is derived.

But again. Although the bounty of Providence had furnished us with coal in the greatest profusion, yet a certain fixed protection was required to bring the native article into common use. Those who framed the tariff of 1824 believed that, with such a protection for a few years, the supply could be rendered abundant, and that the people would enjoy this article at a moderate price. The rapid progress of the coal trade in Pennsylvania had abundantly justified their prudent foresight.

We then well knew that coal was to be found every where in abundance throughout long and wide ranges of our mountains. But how were we to approach them? How were we to transport it to the commercial frontier of the country, where the chief demand for it existed? Only by penetrating these mountains by canals and railroads. The enterprise and the capital of the State and of our people, under the protection which Congress had afforded, have already, to a great extent, accomplished this purpose. The six thousand tons of 1823 had in 1836 increased to nearly seven hundred thousand tons. Was there any example on record of an interest which had grown so rapidly? He should not undertake to estimate the amount of capital which had been invested in this business. In the memorial which he had presented to the Senate some days since, it was stated to be not less than forty millions of dollars. He believed that this statement did not exceed the truth, and the amount was still rapidly increasing. At the present moment, some of our enterprising citizens were engaged in constructing a difficult and an expensive canal from Columbia, on the Susquehanna, to the tide waters of the Chesapeake, which would open a vast coal region, and furnish an immense additional supply of this necessary article. This canal alone would cost not less than two millions of dollars.

And yet this is the interest, the protection of which the Senator from Connecticut thinks he may consider as a question entirely open. According to him, all the vast amount of capital expended upon it, under the faith of your laws, entitles it to no favorable consideration from Congress. Mr. B. said that with the very same, or perhaps greater propriety, he might propose to violate the compromise, and reduce the duty on woollen or cotton goods, notwithstanding the amount which had been expended in the erection of woollen and cotton manufactories. He should be sorry to make any such proposition. The persons interested in the coal trade had only asked to remain on the same footing with the other great interests of the country. They know that before the year 1842 they will be able to protect themselves. Nay, more; they have expressed their entire willingness to share the same fate with other interests, in case Congress should deem it necessary to reduce the duties on protected articles generally to the standard of twenty per cent. more rapidly than the compromise act requires. Fair play is all they demand; and fair play, so far as he was concerned, they should have.

The Senator says that the coal trade of Pennsylvania is a monopoly in the hands of a few corporations, and, therefore, it is necessary, in order to keep the price within reasonable limit, that there should be foreign competition. But the gentleman had been as much mistaken in this as in other particulars. Mr. B. could not conceive how such an idea had suggested itself to the Senator, unless it might have been from the statement in the memorial to which he had referred, that this coal was brought to the Philadelphia market on three canals which belonged to incorporated companies; and hence, without other information, he should infer that all the coal lands were owned by these companies. It is true this would not be a very logical deduction; but he could conceive of no other reason for the Senator's statement that the coal trade was a monopoly.

What was the true statement of the case. The coal region in Pennsylvania, if not boundless, was sufficiently extensive to be far beyond the reach of monopoly. It had been the subject of immense speculation. It was now held by a very great number of proprietors, all of whom had it in their power to send this article to market. The supply was so bountiful as to place monopoly at defiance. The domestic competition, from the very nature of things, must reduce the price to the lowest point at which the article could be extracted from the bowels of the earth and transported to market, making a reasonable allowance for interest on the capital employed. The Legislature of Pennsylvania had fixed the tolls upon the canals and railroads which penetrate the coal region, at reasonable rates; and the Senator himself might, if he thought proper, purchase coal land to almost any extent he pleased, and embark in this business which he seems to consider so profitable. The value of the coal in the mines most accessible has not been estimated at more than from twenty-five to fifty cents per ton.

The canal between Columbia and the Chesapeake, to which Mr. B. had referred, would be completed in less than two years. This would open a more extensive region of coal lands upon the Susquehanna than all which had yet been brought into use in other parts of the State, and would greatly increase the domestic competition and the consequent supply in the eastern markets.

What, then, had raised the present clamor on the subject of coal? He would state the cause. The spring of 1836 was uncommonly backward. The canals continued to be frozen for several weeks later than usual; whilst the winter of that year commenced two weeks earlier. From four to six weeks' business was thus lost, averaging at the rate of 20,000 tons per week. Hence, although the quantity brought to market during the last year was about 140,000 tons more than that of the preceding year, yet it was less by at least 100,000 tons than what it would have been had not these adverse circumstances occurred. This has been the cause of the scarcity, and the consequent high price of the article. This price had been rendered still more extravagant by the opportunity for speculation which this state of things presented, and which had been eagerly embraced. But would it not be a miserable policy for statesmen to pursue, if they should, on account of this accidental deficiency in a particular year, rashly pass a general law to provide for a case which had never occurred before, and he should venture to predict would not occur again? During all the previous years since this article had been brought into common use, with a single exception, large supplies had remained unsold at the close of the season. In the years 1834 and 1835 the price of coal in Philadelphia ranged between $4.75 and $6 per ton, according to the quality; and if it had now risen greatly beyond that price, the causes have been peculiar and transient. It was confidently expected from the preparations already made, that more than 900,000 tons would be brought to market during the present year; and if the demand should justify it, this would be increased to 1,200,000 tons in the year 1833.

It would seem that this blow had been aimed exclusively at Pennsylvania; and thus it would be understood by her citizens, notwithstanding any disclaimer which might be made to the contrary. Let such an attempt proceed from what quarter it might, he should be unworthy of his seat there, if he did not resist it with all his power. We had frequently been flattered by being told of the patriotism of Pennsylvania, and of her devotion to the Union; but when questions arose affecting her essential interests, we had too often discovered that these compliments were words, more idle words. An attempt was now made to exclude her most important interest from the benefits of the compromise act, whilst all other domestic interests should remain protected; and we would now discover from the vote on this amendment, who were her real and who were her professing friends. And here he would tender his thanks to the committee on Finance, whose bill now before the Senate did not embrace a reduction or repeal of the duties on this article.

Mr. B. deplored the condition of the poor in our large cities at this inclement season of the year. He sympathized with them in their sufferings, and would gladly afford them relief, if it were in his power. But would the amendment accomplish this object? Before it could possibly become a law, and any supply of foreign coal be received, even from Nova Scotia, our canals would be again open, domestic coal would pour in upon them, and the price would be reduced, never again, he trusted, to rise beyond its fair value. If he believed the present high price would continue, he might himself be strongly inclined to vote for a reduction of the duty.

Whilst from his heart he regretted the sufferings of the poor in our commercial cities, it was his duty not to forget the interests of the same class who are engaged in the interior in conducting the coal trade. The coal in the mine was not worth more than from twenty-five to fifty cents per ton. All the additional value of the article arose from the wages of labor, from the price of freight and commissions, and from the tolls upon our canals and railroads. The number of laborers employed in this business was very great, and increasing every year. Their rights ought to be protected, as well as those of other citizens. To throw them out of employment for the benefit of foreign labor, would be both cruel and unjust.

There was another view of this subject well worthy of our consideration. The coasting trade in coal, of which our countrymen enjoyed the monopoly, promised in a few years to become almost as great a nursery of seamen for our navy and commercial marine, as the same trade now was in Great Britain. Already, during the last year, there had sailed from New York and Philadelphia five thousand vessels laden with this article, whose freight amounted to more than a million of dollars. This trade would soon be able to protect itself, unless you arrest its progress by rash and imprudent legislation. All we ask is that you shall let us alone. In that event you will protect your marine, and raise up sailors who will carry your flag in triumph over the world.

DUTY ON FOREIGN COAL.

SPEECH OF MR. NILES, OF CONNECTICUT.

In Senate, Friday, February 24, on the bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, Mr. NILES offered the following amendment:

"That from and after the thirtieth day of September, 1837, the duty on fossil coal, culm coal screenings, and coke, imported into the United States, shall be one dollar per ton of two thousand two hundred and forty pounds, and that after the 30th day of September, 1838, the duty shall be sixty cents per ton."

Mr. NILES addressed the Senate at considerable length in support of his amendment, and upon the principles of the bill. He remarked that it was known to the Senate that the subject of the duty on coal had been brought under the consideration of the Committee on Manufactures, of which he was a member, and that in pursuance of the instruction of said committee, he had reported a bill for the entire repeal of the duty on foreign coal; but as it was not his intention to call up that bill, he had offered this amendment to the bill under consideration, which related to the same general subject of the reduction of duties. The Committee on Manufactures had also made a report, containing somewhat at length their views of the subject, and their reasons for the reduction or repeal of the duty on coal; and did he suppose that Senators had examined that report, he would forbear any remarks in support of the amendment he offered; but from the great pressure on the time and attention of every Senator, and as the subject was not one of general interest, he had reason to believe that few gentlemen had given much attention to the report to which he had referred. He should, therefore, as briefly as he could, submit some general considerations in favor of the amendment. The present law imposes a duty of six cents per heaped bushel on coal in general terms; and from the vague and indefinite nature of the language, several questions have arisen, and prosecutions have been instituted to recover the duty in cases of doubt, under the present law. He believed a suit had been commenced in Pennsylvania in respect to coal screenings; and one had recently been decided in New York against the United States, the object of which was to recover the duty on imported coke. The jury decided that coke was not coal, and therefore not subject to duty by the existing law. Coke bears the same relation to fossil coal that charcoal does to wood. It is fossil coal charred, or burned, and loses fifty or sixty per cent. in weight by the process. The law is defective; and if the duty was to be maintained at its present rate, it ought to be amended. But his object was a reduction of the duty. A majority of the Committee on Manufactures had recommended a repeal, and he had concurred in that opinion; but being satisfied that a repeal of the duty could not be carried at this time, he now only sought to obtain a reduction. A ton of coal contained about twenty-seven or eight bushels; and at the present rate of impost, pays a duty of about one dollar and seventy cents, or now something less, as by the operation of the act of 1833, the duty has been reduced from six cents to five and one-third cents per bushel. The reduction proposed is about forty per cent. on the 30th of September next; and in one year from that period, about seventy per cent. The rate of duty at that time, should the amendment be adopted, would be about the same as what it will be reduced to in 1842, under the provisions of the act of 1833; that is, about twenty per cent. but probably rather above that rate.

The duty on coal was imposed for revenue only, so far as respects all the former acts; and even as to the last act, that of 1824, it can hardly be claimed that the increase of duty was designed for protection. The act of 1789, which was the first imposing duties on imports, subjected coal to a duty of two cents per heaped bushel; the next year it was raised to three cents; in 1792, to four and a half cents; in 1816, when the whole system of revenue was revised at the close of the war, it was increased to five cents per bushel; and in 1824 to six cents. The act of 1824, which increased the duty one cent per bushel, is the only one that can be considered as having had any reference to protection; nor is it by any means clear, that the addition to the duty made by that act had any reference to the protection of the domestic interest, for the country was then oppressed with debt from the war expenditures, and the rates of duty of many articles were increased for the purpose of revenue, and were in no way connected with any domestic interest. But there is another and stronger reason tendered to prove that the object of the increase of duty by the act of 1824, was not protection. The home coal trade then could hardly be said to exist, and it can scarcely be supposed that Congress intended a prospective protection of an interest not then in existence, or not of sufficient importance to demand attention. The preceding season, that of 1823, the whole amount of anthracite coal mined and brought to market, was less than six thousand tons. The first anthracite coal which was introduced as an article of fuel, was in the year 1820, when a few hundred tons only were used. It has been increasing since that time to the present. For some years the increase was very slow, but of late it has been very rapid; and since 1831, the anthracite coal which has brought into the market from Pennsylvania alone, has increased about one hundred thousand tons per annum. During the year 1836, nearly 700,000 tons were mined and brought to market. Fossil coal has now become a common article of fuel in all the cities and towns on the Atlantic border of the Union, and its use is extending into the country; and it is extensively used in factories. The primitive forests have been destroyed, and what remain are wanted for timber. It appears to be the natural order and course of things, that during the early stages of the settlement of every country, the forests are the natural resource for supplying the inhabitants with fuel; but, in the progress of time, this resource must fail; the forests disappear before the industry and enterprise of man, and the lands are brought under cultivation. As every country becomes older and more populous, a greater portion of the lands are required for tillage, to supply the wants of the inhabitants; but when the forests are destroyed, and the lands generally brought into cultivation, some other resource must be discovered to supply fuel, one of the most indispensable articles of life; and a beneficent Providence has provided almost every country with an inexhaustible supply of fuel in its mountains, which are not susceptible of cultivation. This is eminently true in the United States. No country on the globe is more abundantly provided with fossil coal, or with better natural facilities of transporting it to the places where it may be wanted. West of the mountains coal abounds almost every where; east it is not so generally prevalent, yet there are large districts containing a supply for all time to come, most of which are in the State of Pennsylvania.

In the older portions of the United States, we have just arrived at a period when the inhabitants must depend on fossil coal for fuel, instead of the forests which have hitherto supplied their wants. The transition from one description of fuel to the other has been astonishingly rapid within the last five or six years. If the increase in the consumption of coal continues for ten years at the same ratio it has for the last five years, there will, at that time, be one million seven hundred thousand tons consumed yearly from the mines of Pennsylvania alone. This quantity, at four dollars per ton, delivered at tide water, would amount to nearly seven millions of dollars. Pennsylvania had been highly favored; in addition to a fertile soil, she possesses treasures of wealth in her mountains of coal, of which the imagination could not well conceive. Unless fossil coal which may come into competition with her trade shall be discovered elsewhere, the time was not remote when she would receive twenty millions of dollars annually as the proceeds of her coal trade. All the middle and eastern States will be tributary to her for one of the first and most important necessities of life. Mr. N. said that he did not envy Pennsylvania these advantages; he rejoiced that she possessed them; it would always afford him pleasure to witness her advance in that career of wealth and greatness which seemed open to her. All that he desired was, that she should exhibit a just moderation in her prosperity; that she should be satisfied with reasonable profits on her immense coal trade. But he was not willing, that by means of an onerous duty of fifty per cent. on the foreign article, she should be enabled to obtain nearly two dollars per ton for her coal more than the fair minimum price.

From the facts he had stated, it was, he thought, apparent, that the question of the coal duty had now become one of great magnitude and importance, both to those engaged in the domestic coal trade, and to the country generally. When the last act was passed in 1824, the question was of but trifling consequence, and there was no reason to suppose that it had received much consideration. Even if he were to admit, that the increase of the duty by the act of 1824 was designed to favor the domestic coal interest, the question then was of so little importance, it cannot reasonably be believed that the subject was then fully examined or discussed. But the time has now arrived when Congress is called on to decide, whether it is just and proper to continue an onerous duty of nearly fifty per cent. on one of the first necessities of life, which was originally imposed, and has been maintained for revenue only.

Why shall this duty be continued? Is it wanted for revenue? This is not claimed. It is our purpose to reduce the revenue, and the bill before us has been introduced for that object. It reduces the revenue nearly two and a half millions. The duty on coal, in 1835, was nearly one hundred and thirty thousand dollars; and, should this amendment prevail, it would reduce the duty about forty thousand dollars the first year, and something like eighty thousand afterwards. So far as the revenue was concerned the measure was desirable, as our object is to reduce the revenue—to avoid a surplus, which is distracting Congress and the country.

But the Committee on Manufactures had not recommended the repeal of the coal duty as a financial measure. The general subject of the reduction of duties had been entrusted to another committee, no doubt much more competent to so arduous a task. They had proposed the repeal of the coal duty, as a measure of relief to the country from what they believed to be an unnecessary and burdensome tax, which bore particularly hard on the poor; but, so far as the measure would have any effect on the finances, it was favorable; but that was altogether a secondary object.

Is the present high rate of duty on imported coal necessary to protect the home coal trade? This, it must be admitted, is the only ground on which the duty can be justified. He did not, however, believe that so high a rate of duty was necessary for that purpose; nor could he be satisfied, if it was, that it would be reasonable and just to continue it.

Mr. N. said he doubted whether any duty was required to protect the domestic coal interest, and was quite sure that so high a rate of duty could not be demanded. He did not intend to go into a full discussion of this question, but would barely allude to some considerations which had led him to believe that the coal trade was not an interest requiring protection. Fossil coal is a raw material, a mineral existing in the bowels of the earth in a pure state, and fit for use. It did not have to be separated from other and grosser materials; it underwent no process of refining, or any preparation whatever, to fit it for use. It was not the product of human skill, art, or industry of any kind; it was a valuable deposit in nature's storehouse, provided by a kind Providence to supply the wants, and administer to the comforts, of man. All that remained to be done, was for him to put forth his hand and remove it from its bed, where it had been deposited for his use. It was one of those indispensable necessities of life which God had provided in a state fit for use, leaving nothing for man to do. The coal trade was wholly unlike those manufacturing interests that require a high degree of skill and experience, which can only be acquired by a long course of practice, aided by mechanical power and by a knowledge of the construction and use of complicated machinery. The protection to manufactures is defended mainly on the ground that they cannot, in their infancy, stand against foreign competition, and that protection is necessary during the period which is required to enable the home manufacturer to acquire that skill and experience which exist in other countries. This argument, which is the strongest in support of the protection of manufactures, has no application to the coal trade. Another argument, scarcely less weighty in favor of protecting manufactures, is the necessity of guarding them against the depressions and fluctuations of foreign markets; which, were it not for protective duties, would at such periods glut our markets with foreign goods—imported, perhaps, at a sacrifice—and which would be ruinous to our own manufactures. This evil could never be experienced in the coal trade, as the value of foreign coal in our market depends principally on the freight and charges of importation.

There is another cogent reason why the home coal trade cannot require protection against foreign competition, which is, that it is sufficiently protected by the bulk and weight of the article, the almost entire value of which arises from the labor and expense of mining and getting it to market. In a business of this description, it was manifest that the home dealer must possess advantages over the foreign trader, who must be compelled to pay much larger freights, insurance, and charges. Coal is worth, in Liverpool, about thirteen cents per bushel, or between three and four dollars per ton, being nearly as high as the price at which American coal ought to be sold at tide water. Some years since, coal was sold at Philadelphia at $4 75 per ton, and he had no doubt that it could be sold at four dollars, and afford a fair remuneration for the labor and capital. It is valued at fifty cents in the pit, and it costs fifty cents more to mine it, leaving three dollars for transporting it to tide water, and for profits. If the importer has to pay for coal nearly as much in Liverpool as it is worth in Philadelphia, how is it possible that any thing is to be feared from foreign competition? The expenses of importing so heavy and bulky an article as coal, must be an ample protection to the home trade. It is estimated that the expense of the importation of goods, including freight, commissions, insurance, and all charges, together with the difference in exchange, amounts to at least twenty per cent; and the expenses of the importation of iron are said to be thirty per cent. It can hardly be supposed, therefore, that coal can be imported at less than fifty per cent; and he believed that one hundred would probably be found nearer the truth. Without going into other considerations, Mr. N. said he thought it was clear that the domestic coal trade was not exposed to suffer from foreign competition, even if the entire duty were repealed. And if this was the case, then the only effect of the duty was to raise the price of the American coal something like two dollars per ton above its minimum value. This must be the effect of the duty on foreign coal, unless there is sufficient domestic competition to keep down the price without the aid of the foreign trade, which he did not believe was the case.

Mr. N. said that he had thrown out some suggestions intended to show that the coal duty was not required for the protection of the home trade; but, even if he was incorrect in this, he believed that there were objections to this duty, so serious and weighty, that, in any view which can be taken of the subject, a high rate of duty could not be defended as consistent with the principles of justice or humanity. He would barely allude to some of these objections:

The duty on foreign coal is necessarily a partial tax; and, as it operates unequally, and partially, it is unjust. The duty on foreign coal tends to raise the price of the domestic article, so far as they come in competition with each other, and no farther. This competition is wholly confined to the cities and towns on the Atlantic border. Imported coal never has been, and never can be, conveyed west of the mountains, or any considerable distance into the interior. That section of the Union has an inexhaustible supply of native coal, abounding in all directions, so that foreign coal, if there was no duty, could never interfere. It is only the inhabitants on the seaboard who have any interest in this question; and the tax, both on the foreign and domestic article, is paid by them alone. This tax, therefore, is too limited and partial in its operation to be just.

Another and more serious objection to the coal duty is, that it is a tax on one of the prime necessities for upholding life, and is extremely burdensome and oppressive to the poor. In a country where the winters are so long and severe, as in a considerable portion of the United States, fuel is one of the first necessities of life. During the last year, not less than nine months a fire was required for comfort, and at all times is indispensable for cooking and family purposes. Coal is the cheapest kind of fuel, and a tax on it is peculiarly burdensome to the poorer classes, especially in our cities. Next to rent, fuel is one of the most expensive articles; the very poorest families cannot get along with less than three tons of coal yearly. Considering the tax as two dollars per ton, it will amount to six dollars per annum to the poorest families. This would be a heavy tax; but it is not all nor the worst of the case. They are subjected to a still more oppressive tax, by the second-hand holders and regraters, as the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. Benton) called them the other day in speaking against the salt duty. He exposed the foul practices and oppressions of the regraters, in relation to the article of common salt, in the most eloquent and forcible manner.

Mr. N. said that he really wished he could have the benefit of the talents and influence of that Senator on this question. In his speech against the salt tax, it appeared to him, the gentleman was actually inspired; his eloquence was too fervid and sublime to be confined to the sober style of prose; it broke directly into the more elevated and pathetic strains of poetry. He (Mr. N.) concurred in most that the Senator said on that question; yet still he believed that most of his remarks would apply with more force, justice and truth to the onerous tax on fuel. Salt, it is true, is one of the first necessities of life, more universal in its use than coal or fuel of any kind, as it is required for the subsistence of beasts as well as man. But the amount of the tax, especially that paid by the poorer classes, was trifling compared with the tax they pay upon fuel. The class of families to whom he had referred as consuming three tons of coal, would not use probably three bushels of salt a year, so that they would pay a salt tax of thirty cents and a fuel tax of six dollars.

What the honorable Senator had said of the practices of the regraters in the salt trade, would apply with more force to the regraters in the coal trade. And how far these practices were sustained and kept up by the duty, might be a question; but he verily believed that if the duty was repealed and foreign competition let in, the extortionary and oppressive measures of the regraters would be at an end, or their enormity very much diminished. The selfishness and rapacity of second-hand dealers and regraters in the coal business, were greatly favored by the condition of the trade: anthracite coal, which was the kind used in the northern cities, came almost entirely from Philadelphia, an inland port, which was closed nearly three months in the year, and during that period, when the demand for fuel was most pressing, the duty excluded foreign coal, and the ice shut out any additional supply from Philadelphia at the setting in of winter. This gave the holders the control of the market, who have nothing more to do but to combine to enable them to regulate the price at their pleasure. This they have done the last three years, in all the cities north of Philadelphia. During the last long and severe winter, these merciless regraters in New York, as he was credibly informed, held their regular meetings, at which they consulted the thermometer, and the capacity of the citizens to endure freezing. As the cold increased, and the sufferings of the poor became more intense, they raised the price of coal from week to week, and even from day to day. So complete was this system of oppression, that the price of fuel formed a scale to determine the continuance and degree of the cold. The result of this system was that coal which was probably worth seven dollars per ton, when the navigation closed, was raised to sixteen dollars per ton. The sufferings of the poor, under such a state of things, might be conceived but could not be described.

But, (said Mr. N.) he would by no means assert that these regraters in coal were sinners above all other men: the evil, great as it was, ought to be ascribed to the condition of the coal trade. The retail dealers had only done what nearly all men will do; they had only taken advantage of circumstances to obtain the highest price for their commodity. This, however unjust and oppressive in many cases, is what the cupidity of the human heart will lead most men to do. It is the embarrassed state of the trade; the obstruction of the home trade, and the exclusion of foreign competition, which has occasioned these results—which has led to practices so oppressive, cruel, and inhuman to the poor. Who can contemplate evils like these, and sufferings, such as he had feebly attempted to describe, and believing that they are in any degree the result of our legislation, without feeling an emotion of indignation springing up in his heart?

There is (said Mr. N.) another cause that has contributed to the evils in the coal trade, which he had attempted to point out, and which, in his opinion, was a sufficient reason against continuing a high rate of duty on foreign coal, was there no other. He alluded to the fact, that the coal trade was in the hands of a few large companies, and to all intents and purposes was a monopoly in fact. Whether a monopoly is created by legal enactments, or arises from other causes, it is not the less a monopoly, nor the less subject to the evils which attend all monopolies. Is it a well known fact, that the coal business is in the hands of a very few large companies, who manage it in their own way, and, as they believe, for their own interest. One variety of coal, that called Lackawanna, was got to market by one company only. How many companies were concerned in all he could not say, but there were but few. The coal lands had been bought up by these monopolizing companies, who had constructed canals and railroads into the coal region, of which they had an exclusive control, and by these means they had obtained a complete and entire monopoly of the business. They have attempted to regulate the supply according to their estimate of the demand, and with a view to keep up the price. It will be found, by examining the statements in the remonstrance they have sent here, that when an unusual quantity of coal, brought to market, has remained over the year unsold, there has been a corresponding reduction in the supply got to market the following year. This fact alone proves that the coal business is in so few hands, that those who supply the market can regulate the quantity according to their pleasure, and their estimate of the demand. It is also a remarkable fact, and inconsistent with what is found to be true in almost every kind of business, that whilst the demand for coal has been rapidly increasing, the price for several years has been advancing. This shows that there is something wrong; for an increased demand, which is calculated to give stability and activity to business, is usually and naturally attended with a reduction of prices. It has been so in every department of the manufacturing business. The price of coal in Philadelphia, from 1820 to 1828, was from seven to eight dollars a ton; from 1828 to 1832, it was $6 to $6 50 per ton; during the years 1834 and 1835, it was from $4 75 to $5 25 per ton; and during the year 1836, and the present year, coal has sold in Philadelphia at from $6 to $9 50 per ton. For two years, those of 1834 and 1835, the price of coal was reduced; but even then, the regraters managed to raise the price enormously high, during the winter, in the cities north of Philadelphia.

Sir, said Mr. N. it deserves our serious consideration whether there is not something wrong, radically wrong, in our whole revenue system. On what articles and on what portion of our population, are the burden of taxes thrown? Look into your statute book and see the long list of free articles! You will find among them tea, coffee, fruits, silks, linens, worsted stuff goods, and many others, which if not, strictly speaking, luxuries, are articles most of which are consumed by the more wealthy classes. The bill now before us reduces the duty on wine to a mere nominal rate, the highest duty being but twelve and a half cents per gallon, and the lowest only three-fourths of a cent. Is it the policy of this Government to throw the whole burden of taxation on the necessities of life? If it is, and if this is a consequence of the protective principle, it deserves very serious consideration how far that principle in its application requires to be modified and restricted. He could not approve of that policy which throws the whole burden of taxation on the necessities of life. It is unsound in theory, unjust and oppressive in practice. The wisdom and justice of all laws must be determined by their practical operation. Is there not great injustice in the operation of our revenue laws? Let any one during the late severe winter have visited one of our large cities, say New York; let him have entered the mansions of some of the wealthy citizens, the bankers and brokers of Wall street, who amass their thousands and ten thousands in a day, and live in the magnificent style of princes; let him have witnessed their splendid rooms, their superb and costly furniture, perhaps imported from London or Paris, sofas, ottomans, mirrors, carpets, all of the most expensive kind, and if he dined with them, he would have seen the "purple and fine linen" in which their families are arrayed, the plate and rich furniture of their tables, and have tasted of their sherry and champagne. After witnessing all this, let him have inquired what was the amount of taxes which this wealthy citizen paid to his Government for all the princely exhibition of magnificence he had seen, designed to display his wealth, or gratify his pride. He would find that the taxes on all he had seen were nothing, or next to nothing.

But let the same individual, on leaving these scenes of luxury, visit the cellars and garrets of the poor, see their half clothed and half fed families, shivering around an old stove, warmed by a handful of coals, which have been purchased at a price, one hundred per cent. higher than that paid by the wealthy citizen, and on which he has paid a tax of fifty per cent; and whatever else he found in these wretched abodes of the poor, he will learn that it has all been heavily taxed, because it belongs to the necessities of life. Such is the operation of our revenue laws.

Mr. N. said, he was aware, that the proposed reduction of the duty on coal was inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act. It might, therefore, be proper for him to say a few words on that subject, and he was the more inclined to do so, from the remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) who declared, that if gentlemen from the manufacturing States remained silent, after the explanation he had given of his own course in relation to that act, he should consider them as bound to respect it, and to adhere to and carry out its provisions in good faith. Several gentlemen had expressed their opinions of the act of 1833, and he did not exactly concur with any of them; his own opinion was of no importance, except to his own constituents; yet, as representing a manufacturing State, and as a member of the Committee on Manufacturing, it might be proper for him to express his sentiments in relation to that law.

His State was as extensively interested in manufactures as any in the Union, with perhaps, too exceptions, and he was not sure that it was behind Massachusetts or Rhode Island. I had no large manufacturing towns, no Wares or Lowells, for the reason, he supposed, that it had no Boston, no large commercial town, where the great capitals accumulated from commerce had sought employment in manufactures. He would not say that he rejoiced that his State had neither Lowells or Bostons, but he would say, that he preferred the manufacturing interests as they existed in his own State, consisting of small establishments, with moderate capitals, carried on by private companies and individual enterprise, spread all over the State, in almost every town and village, and embracing every department of manufacturing industry, and every description of mechanical employment. He much preferred this state of business to large establishments in the hands of wealthy corporations, which erected and owned entire villages. It was individual interests and personal rights which he regarded as the highest duty of Government to cherish and sustain.

In respect to the act of 1833, the Senator from Kentucky and some others considered it as a compromise of the interests of the tariff and anti-tariff States, and that it possessed the binding force of an actual compact, the national faith being pledged to maintain it. Other Senators considered that law as having no higher character, and as entitled to no more respect, than any ordinary act of legislation.

Mr. N. said he did not concur in either of these opinions. Considering the circumstances under which that act was passed, the pledges upon the face of it, the acquiescence of the nation in it, and the impression which has prevailed very extensively, although by no means universally, that it had adjusted and settled the tariff question for ten years, he did not think it would be just or reasonable to regard that act as entitled to no more respect than an ordinary law of Congress. If the law itself was entitled to no more regard, something at least was due to public opinion, which had assigned to it a higher character. So far as that act has been considered as having settled the tariff question for ten years, to the same extent individual interests may have been influenced and regulated by it, as a supposed compromise which was not to be disturbed.

Mr. N. said that he would respect and maintain the object and the general principles of that act, but he could go no further. He could not regard it in the light of a compact, which was binding on Congress or the country, according to its precise terms, and in the same sense that a contract is binding. Are gentlemen aware of the consequences of assuming the position that the act of 1833 is to have the binding force of a contract? The provisions of the act are not limited in their operation to the year 1842; but some of them are to take effect after that time only, and are unlimited. If they cannot be disturbed or interfered with, then a law of Congress will have all the operation and effect of an amendment of the Constitution, circumscribing within narrow limits the powers of this Government, on one of the most important subjects of legislation; one which, perhaps more than any other, will require the frequent action of the legislative authority.

By the provisions of that act, after 1842, no higher rate of duties than twenty per cent. can be imposed on imports under any circumstances; it also provides that all credits are to be abolished, and all duties to be paid in cash, and the valuation is to be according to the price at the port of entry. The act also specifies a list of articles which are to be imported free of duty, after 1842; and which, according to the terms of the law, can never be subject to a duty. These are important principles, which take away a large share of the power of Congress over the subject of raising a revenue by duties on imports. Some of these principles may be found inconsistent with the interests of the country, or those of his own constituents; and if so, he should not consider himself bound by them. And it would not be consistent with his ideas of justice, to take the advantages of the act, so far as it operates rates to keep on the high rates of duties, and deny its force afterwards. He could not regard the act as a compact above the reach of legislation for ten years, and then deny its binding force afterwards. But he would respect the general object of the law, and the leading principles of it intended to secure that object. What was the great object of that act, and the general principle of the adjustment of the tariff controversy? It was, that the high rate of duties were to be gradually reduced down to a certain point. This was the substance of the adjustment, and the rest is matter of detail and of minor importance. To reduce the high duties at once, or very rapidly, would be a violation of the general principle of that act; but to increase the scale of reduction, or to reduce or repeal the duty on particular articles, which may not need protection, and where the duties operate unjustly or oppressively, would only interfere with its details. This he believed to be the case of the duty on coal and other necessities. His own opinion was, that the better course could have been, to have increased the reduction of all the high duties, upon some general and uniform principle. Under the act of 1833, only one-tenth of the excess above twenty per cent. is to be taken off biennially, which was a very slow reduction, amounting to hardly one million of dollars on the whole revenue every second year, or half a million annually. A much more rapid reduction than this might be made without injury to any interest. He could not believe that there was any manufacturing interest, or any other interest that required the protection of a duty of fifty or sixty per cent. at this time, which could be sustained by a duty of twenty per cent. after the year 1842. The duty was either higher than was required now, or it would be found insufficient then. He was in favor of a reduction now, it being an object to avoid a surplus revenue; and should it be found in 1842, that twenty per cent. duty was not sufficient to sustain the woolen, or any other important manufacturing interest, he should not feel himself restrained by the act of 1833 from advocating a higher rate of duty. He regarded it as one of the highest obligations of the Government, to sustain and protect all the important interests of the country, so far as it could be done by a wise and discreet adjustment of the revenue, and a proper discrimination calculated to favor the interests and industry of our own country.

Mr. N. said that should the amendment be adopted, he felt confident that it would not affect injuriously the coal trade of Pennsylvania; its only tendency would be to reduce the price of coal to something nearer its fair minimum value at tide water, and in some degree, to check and counteract the evil practices of the monopolisers and regraters in our cities.

[Mr. BUCHANAN here made some remarks, which were published in our paper of the 3d instant.]

Mr. NILES said, that he had but a word to say in reply to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, having already detained the Senate longer than he intended. He did not perceive that the Senator had denied his facts or answered his arguments. He was mistaken in the assertion, that the whole argument in the report of the Committee on Manufactures rested on the assumption that the duty on coal had not been imposed for the protection of the domestic coal trade; that point was only incidentally touched upon in the report, and formed no essential part of its argument. The basis of the argument in the report was, that the coal interest had no need of protection; that it was sufficiently protected by the nature of the business, and that it was unjust to impose a high rate of duty on one of the first necessities of life, for the purpose of protection.

Another important argument in the report was, that the coal trade was a monopoly in fact, and that it was unjust and dangerous to take away foreign competition from a business which was in the hands of a few large companies, and protected from all competition at home. The Senator had denied that the coal business is a monopoly, yet he had stated no facts to prove the assertion, unless it was the general one, that the coal region extended over a large district of country, and that it was impossible it could be monopolized by a few companies.

But he (Mr. N.) did not say, that the whole coal region was monopolized by a few companies, but only that the coal business was in the hands of a few wealthy corporations, who managed to control the supply and the price. The Senator had stated that these companies had expended thirty or forty millions of dollars in canals and rail roads, which proved that, however extensive the coal district might be, the business could not be carried on without an outlay which could only be encountered by wealthy companies. Instead of proving that this business was not monopolized and controlled by a few corporations, the facts stated by the honorable Senator tended to show that it was; they were in confirmation of what he (Mr. N.) had maintained.

After some observations from Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. NILES remarked that he was surprised to hear it asserted that the poor had no interest in this question; he thought they had a deep interest. [Here Mr. W. made some explanation, which it seems Mr. N. did not correctly understand.] The gentleman says not much interest; that does not essentially vary the assertion. He thought they had an important interest—more than that of any other class. He, Mr. N. had supposed that it was their true interest to have the price of fuel low, but it would seem that the honorable Senator thought that their interests would be promoted by keeping up the price. Are high prices of the necessities of life to benefit the poor? Mr. N. could not understand this, nor the reasoning by which such a proposition was sustained. It seemed that the poor have not been able to take this enlightened view of their own interests, and he wished to remind the honorable Senator that the attention of the Committee on Manufactures had been called to this subject by a memorial signed by one or two thousand of the Senator's own constituents, comprising, he presumed, a large portion of the laboring class and poor of Boston, who probably do not understand their own interest as well as their representative here, or they would not have petitioned for a repeal of the duty on coal. They doubtless supposed that their interest lay on the side of reduction, but it seems they were mistaken, and that their true interest consists in keeping up the duty. The Senator has informed us that the coal duty was proposed by a gentleman from Virginia, and was at first five cents per bushel. He is entirely mistaken in one of his facts, as he would have learned, had he read the report, or attended to what he, Mr. N. had stated; and whether he was equally accurate in his other fact, Mr. N. could not say. The coal duty, instead of having been at first five cents, was but two cents the bushel; the next year it was raised to three, afterwards to four and a half cents, then to five, and finally to six cents. It might be true, that the duty on coal had been first proposed by a gentleman from Virginia; but from whatever quarter it may have come, it was perfectly clear, it was a duty for revenue only, down to the year 1824. It might be true, but it appeared a strange statement to him, that a duty for protection had originated from Virginia; he had always supposed that State had been decidedly opposed to the tariff principle, at all times and in all its forms.

Mr. N. said that he repudiated the doctrine that taxes on the necessities of life ever were, or ever could be, beneficial to the laboring classes or to the poor. On the contrary, he believed them to be unreasonable, and when high to be unjust and oppressive. This was the case of the present high duty on fuel, which, in its operation upon the poor in our cities, was oppressive, cruel, and inhuman. Taxes on necessities must raise the price of labor; as the laborer is worthy of his hire, and must at least have a living, if he is starved, he cannot work. The true policy of wise legislation, is to lighten the burdens of labor, instead of taking from it the "bread it has earned." In all legislation affecting the great interests of the country, whether in Congress or the State Legislatures, there has been a tendency to favor capital rather than labor; to benefit the few rather than the many. It is not difficult to discover the causes of this. It is the few controlling capital who exercise an influence over both the national and State Legislatures. They have leisure, money, and intelligence, which, combined, enable them to exert an influence that they are not entitled to from their numbers. Capital is, in itself, an active element of political power, which is constantly exerting a potent influence over the legislation of the country, and is ever vigilant to obtain advantages. But labor, although the real source of all wealth, and that which alone gives to capital its value, never seeks aid from legislation. Who ever knew the laboring portion of the community to come before Congress, or the State Legislatures, asking for laws to be passed to benefit them? They are content with protection, and ask only for just and equal laws. In any question between capital and population, (Mr. N. said,) he should go for population. Not that he would injure capital, or impair any of the rights which naturally and properly belonged to it; but he would endeavor to counteract its constant efforts to endow itself with factitious advantages, through the aid of partial and unjust legislation.

Mr. N. said that these were his general views on this subject; yet he presumed that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts knew the interests of his constituents much better than he did, and he was therefore bound to believe that the poor and laboring classes of Boston were interested in keeping up the high rate of duty on coal, notwithstanding a large portion of them had petitioned for its reduction.

[Mr. N. replied to some remarks of Mr. Webster, and repelled the charge he had made against him of having misrepresented him.] Mr. N. said that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had taken the liberty to charge him with having mistated his remarks; and he had made the charge in such a manner as to show that he considered he had been intentionally misrepresented. The gentleman had said that he (Mr. N.) was in the habit of misrepresenting the remarks of others. He would not stop to inquire whether a charge like this was parliamentary or decorous, as it was his intention to repel it as unjust and untrue. He wished that Senator to understand once for all, that he (Mr. N.) was not in the habit of mistating or misrepresenting his remarks, or those of any other member of the body; neither had he been complained of in this respect by any one but the Senator himself. He was as liable to misunderstand what was said by others as any one; but he was incapable of intentionally mistating their remarks. It seemed that he misunderstood the Senator on this occasion, although he had listened very attentively to his remarks, and could not be justly charged even with inattention. He understood the Senator to say, that the poor had no interest in this question; and when he rose to explain, he understood him to say that they had not much interest; but it appears he was mistaken in both instances. He did not perceive, however, that the mistake was of much consequence; for whether the Senator considered that the poor and laboring classes had much interest or no interest in the subject, his remarks went to prove that their interest consisted in maintaining the present high rate of duty. The gentleman and himself were directly opposed on this point, as he believed that the whole community were interested in the reduction of the duty on coal, and especially the laboring classes, who were less able to bear the burdens of the present exorbitant prices of fuel. If the poor have a deep interest in this question, how is their interest to be promoted by a tax of fifty per cent on fuel? Is that calculated to bring down the price? or does their interest consist in keeping up the price? He did not understand this matter, and could not learn from the Senator's remarks how he proposes to advance the interests of the poor.

If, as the Senator asserts, all our tariff laws have had a direct tendency to benefit labor, he rejoiced at it; but if such was the case, it did not prove that those laws had been passed for that purpose, and we all know that it was not those interested in labor who had petitioned for them; it was not from their influence, or a regard to their rights, that the tariff system had been adopted. No, sir, it was the interests of capitalists and capital which had originated and sustained the tariff system, and if labor had been benefitted, it was only an incidental consequence. Who is it (said Mr. N.) that hang around the halls of legislation, seeking its aid, asking for special and partial laws? Who is it that apply for acts of incorporation, conferring special privileges, to favor particular interests—privileges calculated to give to capital artificial and factitious advantages? Is it not those who control capital?

By whose influence was it, that a law was forced through Congress, soon after the close of the last war, refunding to importers the double duties which had been imposed to carry on the war, when it was well known that those duties had been charged upon the goods, and the whole amount, with large profits besides, had been received in their sales? Was it not the capitalists, the wealthy importers? This partial and unjust law of Congress legislated fortunes into the pockets of hundreds; he knew of some who had been made independent by it. Sir, (said Mr. N.) it is in vain to deny that all the legislation of Congress, from the foundation of the Government to this day, which has affected the interests of the country, whether commercial or manufacturing, has been influenced by those who control the capital of the country.

Mr. N. said he did not claim to be the special advocate of the interests of the poor and the laboring class; he claimed no more sympathy with the poor than any other Senator felt or ought to feel, not excepting the Senator from Massachusetts. He had no motive, no design, in connecting himself with their interests. He had not dragged them into this debate; he had spoke of them no further than they were directly involved in the question. He had referred to facts, because they belonged to the subject. It was a truth which had not, and could not, be controverted, that the coal duty, so far as it operated to keep up the price of fuel, bore with double severity upon the poor, who were compelled for three winters past to purchase fuel at a price one hundred per cent. higher than the wealthy citizens, who were able to lay in a supply in the summer, when the price was down.

Mr. N. said that being up, he had a word to say to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston.) That Senator, whose own situation in relation to the bill before the Senate appeared to be not a little embarrassing or perplexed, had assumed upon himself the task of assigning to several of the friends of the administration, including himself, their positions in relation to the tariff and the Executive; and having given each of us such a position as suited himself, he affects to discover something wonderfully strange and marvelous in the matter. The Senator said that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, (Mr. Buchanan,) was an open, ultra, uncompromising tariff man, and believed in the binding force of the compromise of 1833; that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, (Mr. Rives,) was an avowed, irreclaimable anti-tariff man, willing to disregard the compromise; that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, (Mr. Wright,) who had reported the present bill, although representing a manufacturing State, and the one which contributed to fix on the country that act of abominations, the tariff of 1828, seemed willing to violate the compromise, and to open the tariff question, for the purpose, as he believed, to use it for political purposes; whilst the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, (Mr. N.) whom the Senator declared to be an ardent supporter of the dominant party, was the friend of a moderate and judicious tariff, although prepared to vote for the present bill, which violated the compromise. The Senator professed not to understand how those who differed so much on the subject of the tariff, could act in harmony and concert in support of the administration. He appeared to think that there was a great mystery in the matter, and that there must have been some understanding, and that the friends of the administration were permitted to disagree on that question, and each one to pursue a course the best calculated to aid the common cause. Mr. N. said that he thought the honorable Senator might have spared the expression of surprise at the want of harmony in the sentiments of the friends of the administration regarding the tariff, for if he would look to his own stile of the house, he would there find the disagreement greater and more inexplicable: he would discover not only ultra tariff men, and ultra anti-tariff men belonging to the same party, but he would find them standing side by side in opposition to this bill, and speaking and voting against it; the ultra tariff men opposing the bill as being hostile to the manufacturing interests, and the ultra anti-tariff men—those who brought the Union into jeopardy by their violent opposition to that system—opposing the bill on the ground, that in its consequences it would be hostile to the anti-tariff States. In the eyes of the honorable Senator, it appeared to be very consistent for tariff and anti-tariff men to unite in opposing the administration, but very inconsistent for those who differ regarding the tariff to unite in its support.

The Senator says that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is for adhering to the compromise; and, therefore, he (Mr. Buchanan,) is an ultra tariff man; but the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) is himself for adhering to the compromise; and, therefore, according to his own reasoning, he must also be an ultra tariff man. Or, are we to understand that an adherence to the compromise proves one member to be an ultra tariff man, and another an ultra anti-tariff man? It was a strange kind of logic which, from the same premises, should lead to opposite conclusions. There must be a cabalistical potency in the compromise act, which can convert nullifying anti-tariffers into ultra tariff men.

Mr. N. said, in regard to what the Senator had said of himself and several of his friends, one of the gentlemen (Mr. Buchanan) had already put himself right, and the other two (Mr. Rives and Mr. Wright) were abundantly able to defend themselves, and had no occasion for his assistance; and, in relation to himself, he had no particular reason to complain of the position which the Senator had assigned to him. He was a moderate tariff man, decidedly opposed to a high tariff, yet a firm friend of the policy of protecting all the important interests of the country, so far as it could be done by a wise and discreet discrimination in the adjustment of the duties which were required for the purposes of revenue. But what he did object to, and what had surprised him much, was, that he and his friends should have their positions assigned to them in regard to the tariff, by a gentleman who himself occupied so equivocal a position, and who evidently did not know what his own position was.

Mr. N. said he had listened with attention to the eloquent speech which the Senator had made on this bill the other day, and had anxiously sought to discover on which side of the question he was, and to what conclusion, after all his wandering, he would finally come; but he had been unable to satisfy himself. The Senator reminded him much of a blind man, who was feeling his way in the dark, and who, notwithstanding all his efforts, was unable to advance in any direction, but remained in a state of "progressive retrograde, or standing still." The Senator had labored hard to give a party character to this bill, and, in his eloquent appeals, appeared to be attempting to arouse the spirit of some dead party, the life of which had long since departed, leaving only the dead carcass and the name. In a speech on another subject, the Senator had informed us that he considered the Constitution as long since dead, but remarked that he would endeavor to call up its ghost, with which he hoped to frighten the Senators into a respect for its principles. Mr. N. said that on the present occasion the Senator, by his eloquent incantations, appeared to him to be endeavoring to call forth the ghost of nullification to aid him in his perplexity; and, if he had succeeded, perhaps that frightful apparition might have scared him from the position he had taken—side by side with the ultra friends of the tariff. During this debate, (said Mr. N.) the honorable Senator, embarrassed and perplexed, and groping his way in the dark, has shifted, twisted, and turned, and wandered about from point to point, and from position to position. He had been at all points in the compass, and now seemed to be at a point not in the compass; and there he would leave him.

SPEECH OF MR. HAMER, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, March 2, 1837—On the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837; the question pending before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was on the amendment of Mr. PEYTON of Tennessee, proposing to create a new office, the incumbent of which should be called the Superintendent of the Public Deposits, and who should have the management of the correspondence and business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department.

Mr. HAMER said: No one regrets more deeply than myself, the necessity to which I have been driven of addressing the committee at this late period of the session, and at such an unseasonable hour of the night.* I know the anxiety which is felt by every gentleman to vote upon the question under discussion, and to act upon the bill itself; and were this an ordinary case, I should yield to this feeling, and forego any remarks upon the present occasion. But it is not. The attacks made upon the majority of the investigating committee by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) are of such a character as to demand a reply. It is due to myself, as one of that majority, and to the gentlemen with whom I acted, that we should be heard in our defence. I must entreat the indulgence of gentlemen, therefore, whilst I briefly notice some of the charges which he has presented against us.

I promise to be as brief as the circumstances of the case will admit. I shall not detain the House by reading large masses of irrelevant matter, having no connection with the proposition before us. Neither will I interweave subjects which bear no analogy to the question in debate, and which would answer as well for a speech upon one subject as another. If I desired to make a discourse for electioneering purposes, to affect my own constituents, or the public at large, I would run rapidly over the different heads of it, and afterwards write out and print the details, without troubling the House to listen to what is not only very uninteresting, but is pernicious in its consequences, by wasting the time that is now so valuable to the country.

Sir, I had hoped that when the reports of the committee had been laid upon our table, and were ordered to be printed, the members would all have been willing to see the views of the majority and of the minority, as well as those of the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. Johnson,) who has made a separate report, not being able to agree fully with either the majority or the minority, published to the world. I had supposed that each member would content himself with allowing these several reports, accompanied by the journal of our proceedings, to be printed and laid before Congress and the American people, and let them judge between us. They will decide who is right and who is wrong. By their decision I am willing to abide.

But, sir, the gentlemen from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) has thought proper to pursue a different course. He has come forward, and, by two successive motions, has afforded himself an opportunity to make a very violent onset upon the majority, in which he has done them great injustice. His speech is to be published, I presume, and will go out in advance of the reports and the journals, giving a direction to public opinion before the official proceedings have reached the people. The effect of this movement upon his part must necessarily be to prejudice the public mind against the majority of the committee; and to disqualify the country, in some measure, to give an impartial verdict when the facts shall have been laid before them. These consequences can only be averted by a full and fair exposition of the case; by a statement which shall exhibit the gross misconceptions and palpable errors of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to this whole affair.

In whatever point of view we consider the appointment and proceedings of this committee we shall find its history to be of a most extraordinary character. The resolution was passed merely to gratify a few individuals in this House, and a very small party in the country. A large majority of the members here, and an overwhelming majority of the American people, were satisfied that no improper connection existed between the Treasury Department and R. M. Whitney. The violent declamation to the contrary, both in this House and in the community, had produced very little effect. The explanations published by the friends of the administration had convinced impartial men—all men whose judgments were not warped by party feelings and prejudices, that Mr. Whitney was merely a corresponding agent of the deposit banks, employed and paid by them; having no official station; no power to bind the banks by any contract he could make; and no control whatever over the public money. Still there were gentlemen who asserted the contrary; and I dare say they believed their charges to be true. They insisted, that if we would give them a committee, they would prove this connection to exist, and that it was a most dangerous and corrupt union, jeopardizing the safety of all the public treasure, and constituting this agent a great "Money King" who could wield the entire revenues of the country to overturn the public liberties, or to accomplish any designs of personal or political ambition. We knew this to be otherwise. The great body of the American people knew it was not so. Still we gave them a committee, to satisfy them; and now, after having been in session for five or six weeks, and procuring an immense mass of testimony, what do we hear? The gentleman from Tennessee comes in, and proclaims that they have proven a great deal more than he and his friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) ever charged, more than they ever imagined; but they would have proven more still, if the committee had not been "packed" by the Speaker; so as to vote down the interrogatories which they desired to ask the witnesses, and thus suppress the truth. I shall not attempt to compare the charges made by these gentlemen, with the proof they have adduced. The country will do that. When the facts are laid before the people they will speak in a voice that will be understood by us all. But I shall presently notice what has been proven, so that each side of the question may be fairly considered, and a comparison can then be made by any one who chooses to undertake the task for his own satisfaction. Before I do this, however, I must advert to the charge which has been made against the Speaker of this House.

The gentleman complains that there were six friends of the administration placed upon the committee, and but three of the opposition. Why, sir, this is very nearly in the proportion which the parties bear to each other in the House. The friends of the administration are nearly double in number to those of the opposition. It was fair then to appoint the committee in reference to this state of things. But does the gentleman mean to imply, by this complaint, that in these high party times any other Speaker would have acted differently? What could be expected but that, in the appointment of a committee, demanded, in part, for political effect, and designed to have some political influence in the community, the Speaker would give a preponderance to his own party? The minority have no right to complain. They can always make out a separate report, as they have done in this instance, and present their own views to the people. If the majority vote down their questions, and refuse to make inquiries, which have been authorized by the House, the minority can show these votes to their constituents, and thus appeal from the decisions of the majority. Indeed, they can make more, in this manner, out of what is not proven, than out of what is; for they can imagine a thousand tales of secret corruption that would have been disclosed, provided they had been permitted to ask the questions, which were suppressed by the votes of the dominant party; whereas the truth may be, that if the interrogatories had been propounded, the witnesses would have been unable to give any information on the subject.

But I assert, that under similar circumstances, no Speaker has ever been known to act otherwise than to give his own political friends a preponderance. And I go further: I assert that there is not now an opposition member in this House, who, if he had been Speaker, would not have given his friends a majority upon the committee. If there be such a one, I should like to see him, and know who he is. The truth is, that in times of political and party excitement, we all feel and act very much alike upon such questions, and each one prefers his own party to that of his opponents. It is idle to raise this cry of "party" upon every occasion, when those who raise it, would do the same things of which they complain, if they had the power.

The gentleman from Tennessee informs us that any Speaker who will "crawl to the chair," will remain there, and that, to do so, he must sacrifice independence, patriotism, and honor, and become a mere partisan. What does the gentleman mean by crawling? Does every man who stands by his party become a crawler? Why, sir, I have heard that the gentleman himself once had a friend who was a candidate for Speaker, and that the gentleman then thought it was somewhat important to his friend's success that he should be known to be a good party man. I have heard that he took some pains to convince those who doubted his friend's orthodoxy, that he was a firm supporter of the administration, and, therefore, ought to receive the votes of the democratic party in the House. Perhaps he has changed his opinions since then. If so, no one has a right to complain, as every gentleman's opinions are his own, and he has a right to dispose of them as he thinks proper.

[Here Mr. PEYTON rose to explain. He said, in substance, that when Messrs. Bell and Polk were first candidates for Speaker, he went to the President, and disabused his mind with regard to Mr. B. who was not electioneering for the office, and told him that Mr. P. had been seeking the support of some of the nullifiers.]

Mr. HAMER preceded. I have no wish to discuss matters so long gone by, nor to enter into a comparison of the principles and merits of the two gentlemen who were then candidates for the Speaker's chair; but my object was to remind the gentleman, that three years ago he himself thought it no crime for a Speaker to be a decided party man!

How was the present Speaker elevated to that high station? Sir, he was placed there on account of his eminent abilities, his long and well-tryed services in the cause of his country, his fidelity to the democratic principles of our Government, and because his party preferred him to any other man who was a candidate. Whilst he remains there, I have no doubt he will discharge his duties faithfully and fearlessly, without regard to the murmurs or complaints of his political opponents. If the gentleman calls this crawling, so be it. In my opinion, it is a high and honorable career, which any man might be proud to follow.

Soon after the appointment of our committee we met and organized. From the moment that we commenced our examinations, it was apparent that a radical difference of opinion existed between the majority and the minority, with respect to the powers of the committee. The majority thought that they had no authority to look into the affairs of the deposit banks, except what the Government derived from the contracts made with those banks for the safe keeping of the public money. Obtaining their charters, not from Congress, like the late Bank of the United States, but from the State Governments, we could only control them in their operations so far as they had agreed to be subject to our direction. The Federal Government derives no more right to investigate their operations from the fact of having public money in the vaults as a deposit, than a private citizen does from having a similar amount of money there on general deposit. In either case the deposit can be withdrawn whenever the depositor is dissatisfied, or thinks the money unsafe; but in no case can the books and transactions of the corporation be examined, unless the bank voluntarily permits it; either by contract, or by concession when the request is made. So thought the majority. They looked to the contracts with the banks and to the resolution of the House for the extent of their power, and refused to go beyond them.

The minority seemed to think that we had some further control over the banks, on account of our money being there. They could see some analogy between these banks and the old Bank of the United States. The latter being subject to an examination, they supposed the former should be too; and that the right which the Government had to look after the public treasure, drew after it the right, to some extent, of scrutinizing the operations of the deposit banks.

In the case of the Bank of the United States, we expressly reserved, in the charter, the authority to examine its books and concerns. We never pretended to derive the right from any other source. To insist that a right to search out all the hidden dealings of a bank necessarily results from its being a public depository, would establish a most dangerous principle. Let us carry it out into practical operation, and see to what it would lead. The State Governments are now depositories of public money. They have our treasure in their keeping, and are accountable to us for it, by the law of last session, in the same way that the banks are. According to this doctrine, having the right to look after our money, we could appoint a committee, and arm them with authority to examine all the proceedings of the State Governments. We could summon the Treasurer, the Auditor or Comptroller, the Secretary of State, the Judiciary, and even the Governor and the Legislature, before us, to give an account of their conduct, and to disclose to us the whole of their State policy! Who would submit to this? Is there a State in the Union, that would degrade itself, by submitting to be thus catechised? Not one. Yet this state of things results from an extension of the principle to which I have adverted.

Again, there was a difference of opinion among us as to the object of the House in appointing the committee. The minority seemed to entertain the opinion that the principal object was to ascertain the business and character of Reuben M. Whitney. They appeared to think that the resolution was a mere wolf-trap to catch a single individual; that the House had set us to watch him whilst he was filling his sack out of the public crib, and to seize him the moment his leg was in the trap, and bring him forthwith to justice. These gentlemen had so often denounced Mr. Whitney within the last year, that he was apparently uppermost in their thoughts upon all occasions. Their antipathy to him has become a sort of monomania. Indeed, I have sometimes fancied that, if they were in the last agonies of death—if the soul were about to separate from the body, and leave its frail tenement for another world, and some one should walk up, and gently whisper in the ear of the expiring man the words "Reuben M. Whitney!" this name would not only "stay the pulse of ebbing life," but, making a superhuman effort, he would instantly spring to his feet, and with a wild shriek, cry, "Traitor!" "Robber!" "Thief!" "Deposit banks!" "Public money!"

The majority of the committee did not suppose that the House passed the resolution for the single purpose of running down any one individual. We knew that if there was really a corrupt connection between the Treasury and Mr. Whitney, or any one else, the House desired us to ascertain it, and to report the facts to them. We looked to the language of the resolution to see what was intended to be the scope of our inquiries. We endeavored to give a fair and liberal construction to that language, without imagining what latent intention might have been lurking in the mind of each member who voted for its adoption. This was our rule; and I am perfectly willing that the House and the people shall decide between us and the minority, who adopted a different one, as their course in the committee-room will show when the proceedings are published.

Our committee is an extraordinary one in some other respects. One of the first things we did was to adopt a resolution, by which we admitted all the members of the House to be present at our deliberations. I opposed this, because it was both unprecedented and impolitic. From that day forth libels were issued from the public presses against our committee. The proceedings were garbled and misrepresented in the most shameful manner. How the anonymous writers, who made these publications, obtained the knowledge of our votes and speeches, I do not know; but the object they had in view was very manifest. It was to prejudice the community against the majority of the committee, and thereby break the force of our report when it should appear.

Well, sir, we proceeded with our investigations for nearly two months; meeting, during a great part of that time, at ten in the morning and remaining until ten and sometimes till eleven at night, with an interval of an hour for dinner. We neglected almost all the business of the House, and much of what belonged to our immediate constituents; we have cost the country some fifty or a hundred thousand dollars; and what have we found? Literally nothing. It is the old case of the mountain in labor, which brought forth a mouse. It was a game where the play was not worth the candle. The gentleman from Tennessee declares that they have proven more than they ever charged; and I am sure he thinks so, or he would not make the declaration; but I pronounce the investigation to be a complete failure. Every charge which has been made, from any quarter, implying that any agent of the deposit banks, or of the Treasury Department, had the control of all, or of any portion, of the public money, is not only unsustained, but is positively proven to be false. The oaths of the Secretary of the Treasury; of the subordinate officers of the Department; of the presidents and cashiers of the deposit banks, and of Reuben M. Whitney himself, all concur in the establishment of this fact beyond all doubt or controversy. If the gentleman from Tennessee had not stated that he took an entirely different view of the testimony, I should have believed that, considering himself defeated, he had come forward with a speech to make a diversion in favor of himself and his friends. That gentleman, as well as every other one here, well knows the effect of a shout of victory. To proclaim, in a loud and confident tone of voice, that we have gained a triumph, often produces an impression upon those who hear us, that aids us, materially, in obtaining the very victory which is thus proclaimed in advance. The proclamation of the gentlemen, where the journal and reports are never seen, will induce many a man to believe that he and his friends have been completely successful in this investigation; but those who read and think for themselves will come to a very different conclusion.

If the minority have fully sustained all their charges, and gone even beyond them, it is remarkable that such loud complaints are made of the illiberal and rigid construction given to our resolution by the majority of the committee! Yet the greater part of the gentleman's long speech was made up

* The following is the resolution of the House:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether such agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of the Treasury Department, whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through the said agent; and whether, in the transactions of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

MR. GARLAND of Virginia,
MR. PIERCE of New Hampshire,
MR. FAIRFIELD of Maine,
MR. WISE of Virginia,
MR. GILLET of New York,
MR. JOHNSON of Louisiana,
MR. HAMER of Ohio,
MR. MARTIN of Alabama,
MR. PEYTON of Tennessee, were appointed the said committee.

of these complaints? What did the resolution require of us?

1st. To ascertain "whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department."

2d. "What is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact?"

3d. "What compensation he receives."

4th. "Whether such agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of the Treasury Department."

5th. "Whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through the said agent."

6th. "And whether said agent receives any compensation from the Treasury Department."

These are the points submitted to us by the House for our investigation. We examined them thoroughly; and, notwithstanding all the intimations to the contrary, I now defy the gentleman from Tennessee to show a single instance in which the majority of the committee voted to suppress any inquiry or interrogatory, which was authorized by a fair construction of the resolution of the House. Give me a jury of twelve honest, sensible men of any party, and I will debate the point with him till doomsday, if we live so long, without the slightest apprehension of even partial defeat. So far were we from curtailing the inquiry, that if I have any thing to reproach myself with, it is that I sometimes voted in favor of interrogatories which, strictly speaking, did not come within the scope of the resolution. But we were so anxious to give the minority no cause of complaint, that in doubtful cases we leaned to their side, and voted for the freedom of investigation. Such was my own feeling; and I believe it was the rule that guided the other members who voted with me.

In the course of our investigation, indeed almost at the threshold, we ascertained, distinctly, that there was no connection whatever between the Treasury Department and Mr. Whitney, or any other agent of the deposit banks. The statements of the Secretary of the Treasury will be found on the pages of our printed journal. Speaking of the compensation paid to the agent, he says, (page 14th,) "no request has ever been made to me for any such compensation, and no idea was ever entertained by me of acceding to it, if made; the agent being appointed by and for the banks, and not by or for the Department." In regard to Mr. Whitney's authority and business, he says, (page 11,) that the Department never found it necessary to call for the agent's authority, as it has never been necessary for him to execute any written official document, binding the banks; and the contracts on file are all signed by the officers of the banks themselves.

On page 28th of the journal, we have Mr. Whitney's testimony in regard to himself. He swears, that he holds "no office or agency whatever under the Government of the United States, or any department thereof; nor has he the control of any money or property whatever of the said Government, or any department; nor has he any agency whatever, which relates to the public money, beyond acting as corresponding agent of some of the deposit banks."

Upon pages 32 and 33 will be found Mr. Woodbury's statement in regard to any influence of the Department in procuring the appointment of Mr. Whitney. He declares that no agent has been appointed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department. By reference to pages 63 and 64, the following question and answer will be found. "Has the Treasury Department any use whatever for such an agency as that of Reuben M. Whitney?" Answer by Mr. Woodbury. "I am not aware that the Department has any use for such an agent."

Much has been said in the opposition newspapers, and in speeches here, of the circulars issued by Mr. Whitney to the Receivers of land offices, directing them what kind of bank paper to receive in payment of the public lands. This subject was also examined. In answer to a question, Mr.

Woodbury says, (page 41,) "I have never given to Mr. Whitney, or conferred on him, any authority to instruct the land receivers, in behalf of the Department, on any subject whatever." Mr. Whitney swears, (page 87,) that the circular, sent to the land receivers, about which so much complaint has been made, was "a printed letter, and forwarded to the public land receivers by him, as a mere matter of information," but not of "instructions." It was dated 29th of August, 1835. All the beautiful figures, and eloquent declamation, upon this subject seem to have been lost. The agent printed a letter, and sent copies of it to the Receivers, as any other citizen might have done who took an interest in the state of the currency, and who had held a conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury; and upon this slender foundation a most magnificent fabric has been erected. Mr. Whitney is a "money king," an "adjunct Secretary," "a minion of Executive power," who holds the purse strings of the nation in his own hand.

Several other important disclosures have been made in the course of this examination. For the last three years, ever since the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank, the opposition have been endeavoring to make the people believe that the administration directed all the operations of the deposit banks, so as to produce political results favorable to the party in power. They have asked, in an indignant tone, "who can stand up against this tremendous money power, wielded by the Executive to sustain himself, and to elect his successor?" Now, sir, so far from there being any truth in these charges, it turns out that the party politics of the stockholders, directors, and officers of the banks have had no influence whatever in their selection by the Secretary; and that, so far as any thing is known of their politics, a majority of them are against the administration. These facts are solemnly sworn to by Mr. Woodbury. His statements may be seen on pages 51 and 53 of the printed journal. Who, after this disclosure, will have the hardihood to stand up before the American people, and talk about the Executive wielding the purse of the nation to corrupt the votes, and destroy the freedom of elections? What opposition man will muster the impudence to renew this stale falsehood, and give currency to what is now known to be utterly untrue? He who does so, must assume the responsibility of proving the Secretary of the Treasury to be unworthy of belief; or he must ask the public to take his word, unsupported by a single fact, in preference to the statements of Governor Woodbury, made under the solemn sanctions of an oath. In either event, he will find that he has undertaken a task as difficult and hopeless as that of Sisyphus; and I shall be greatly mistaken, if his burden does not drag him to the bottom of the hill, and crush him to atoms, also, when he shall have arrived there.

Another charge has been boldly made in regard to the influence of Mr. Whitney, in obtaining a removal of public deposits from one bank to another, and in the selection of deposit banks in the first instance. We have been told that if a bank desired to be selected as a depository for the public money, it must go down upon its knees to Reuben M. Whitney. If a deposit bank wanted to retain its funds, or to get more from the Treasury, it must raise Mr. Whitney's salary, or make him a present. Now, there is not one word of truth in this charge. I speak from the book, fully conscious of the strength of my expressions. Here is the testimony on page 53 of the journal:

Question.—"Has said Whitney ever solicited you to remove the public deposits from any bank or banks, or cease to make the public deposits in them; and, if so, what was the character of the reasons assigned by him?"

Answer by Mr. WOODBURY.—"In no case whatever, that I recollect."

Question.—"Has said Whitney ever recommended any bank or banks, as banks of deposit, and used his influence with you, or any officer of the Government, to procure their selection?"

Answer by Mr. WOODBURY.—"I have no remembrance of a single case where Mr. Whitney first applied to the Department to have any bank selected; but while the question of some of them, afterwards appointed, has been pending, I have no doubt Mr. Whitney has spoken on the subject of the character or standing of one or two of the number selected, which were located in Pennsylvania, where he had resided, and was acquainted with their standing and business. But I remember no other case; and in those he used no recommendation or influence in their favor beyond the statement of facts on the point above named."

Here are the incontrovertible facts, standing in opposition to declaration and anonymous slander. Which is to be believed? Can any man hesitate upon that question? Are we to reverse all the established rules adopted in the administration of justice, and prefer mere hearsay and conjecture, to unimpeachable testimony? He who does this, is not only wilfully blind, but obstinately wicked; and it would be about as wise to enter into an argument with such a man, as to reason with a tempest, and expect to stay its fury by an appeal to its sympathies, or an address to its understanding.

Finally, sir, all the inquiries couched in the resolution of the House, were fully negated by the proofs adduced before the committee. We found—

1st. That the banks had no agent at the seat of Government, "to transact their business with the Treasury Department."

2d. Therefore, such an agent had no business of any character whatsoever.

3. And such agent had no compensation.

4. No agent of any kind had been employed at the request, or by the procurement, of the Treasury Department.

5. No business of the Treasury Department is transacted through said agent.

6. The department pays no compensation whatever to any agent of the banks, and none has ever been asked for.

Here the committee might very properly have suspended all further examination, and reported their proceedings to the House. But as we found that there was a corresponding agent of some of the deposit banks residing here, and as it was possible that something might leak out, to show an improper connection between this agent and the Government, we allowed the minority to proceed in their inquiries. They did proceed; and such another string of interrogatories as they have recorded upon the journal of our committee, cannot, in my opinion, be found upon the pages of any public document now in existence. The book will be a literary and legislative curiosity, which ought to be preserved for the benefit of committees who may meet in after times to engage in similar undertakings.

The gentleman from Tennessee has complained that Mr. Whitney gives large parties, and that the members of Congress attend them—drinking his wine, and partaking of his hospitality. I am not of the number who are thus indulged. I have never attended his parties, drank his wine, nor enjoyed his cheer. I have known him for two or three years; have met him in the streets and elsewhere, and have interchanged the usual civilities that pass between acquaintances. I know nothing of his private history, or his former character and employments. If he is a bad man, I am not disposed, either as an individual or as a party man, to become responsible for his misconduct; if he be a good one, I am willing he should enjoy all the benefits that result from the possession of a fair moral character. To me he is like every other citizen. If he were connected with the Government, I should feel bound to examine his standing and conduct; but as he is not, I shall not trouble myself about him, further than to apply the rule to him that the community has made applicable to all other men, "to consider him honest, until the contrary is proven."

But to the interrogatories which were offered by the minority, and were voted down by the majority, not allowing them to be put to the witnesses. Upon page 61 of the journal will be found the following question, offered by the minority:

Extract from the Journal.

"Do you know Reuben M. Whitney's general character for truth and veracity? and would you believe him on oath, when strongly tempted to swear falsely?"

Mr. Hamer objected to this question; and it was decided in the negative by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Wise and Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Johnson, and Hamer."

So this question was voted down. We of the majority sought in vain, in the resolution of the House, for authority to inquire into the general character of R. M. Whitney. We could not find it there. We knew of no other source from which we derived power, and of course we voted down the question as improper. This, I suppose, is one of the cases of illiberality of which the gentleman from Tennessee complains. This is a specimen of what he calls a rigid construction of the resolution of the House!

What was the next inquiry made, or attempted to be made, by these gentlemen? Here it is: "Is Reuben M. Whitney or not, according to the best of your knowledge, information, or belief, concerned in speculation in the public lands, or in stocks, or in the money market, in any way?" This, also, was voted down. We discovered no authority in the resolution to hunt after the speculations of private citizens. We could not perceive what right we had to inquire whether Mr. Whitney had, or had not, purchased a piece of land, a town lot, a horse, or a cow, and sold it for more than he gave. Congress, and the committees of Congress, ought to have something else to do, than to meddle with all the private affairs of individuals, to examine the state of their transactions, the profits they have made in trade during the last year, or the sums they have lost by bad bargains. Not conceiving this to be any part of our duty, we voted against the question, and thereby gave another evidence of our "illiberality."

Another question voted down by the majority may be found in page 64. It proposed to ask the witness (Mr. Woodbury) whether he had any personal objections to Mr. Whitney as an agent, in other words, whether he liked or disliked the man! In the affirmative on this question we find Messrs. Wise and Peyton. In the negative, Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Gillet, Johnson and Hamer.

On the same page is this interesting question, offered to Mr. Woodbury: "have you ever authorized the editor or editors of the Globe, a newspaper in this city, during the month of April, 1836, or at any time, to deny any supposed relation or connection of Reuben M. Whitney with the Treasury Department?" This interrogatory was refused by the same vote as the other. We are totally unable to perceive what the Secretary's opinion of Mr. Whitney, as a man, had to do with our inquiries; or what Congress could do with the information if they had it. We were equally at a loss to discover what we had to do with the editorial articles of the Globe in April, 1836; or at any other time. I have not examined the files of the Globe; but I presume that about the time named in the question, the editors made some such denial as that mentioned; and the object of the interrogatory seemed to be, to ascertain whether they told the truth; whether, in other words, the witness had given them authority, such as they stated he had, in that number of their newspaper. If the House had directed us to enquire into the character of the Globe for truth and veracity, we should have done so; but, until they clothed us with such powers, we did not feel at liberty to arraign the editors before our committee for that purpose. This, I suppose, was another evidence of our "rigid construction."

We have been denounced by the gentleman from Tennessee as a "packed committee," appointed by the Chair for party purposes. Upon page 99 may be found the strongest evidence, as I think, which the gentleman can produce in support of this charge. The gentleman himself propounded the question to Gen. Van Ness, the President of the Bank of the Metropolis in this city. "Did or did not some one or more of the officers of the bank oppose very strongly his employment" (as agent,) "on personal grounds? Did any one of them go so far as to say, if he" (Whitney) "came to that board in that capacity, he would kick him out of the bank?" Would you believe it, Mr.

Chairman? the committee voted down this question, and would not allow the gentleman from Tennessee to ask it! Could stronger evidence be given of their being a "packed committee?" What! not allow the gentleman to prove what some officer of a bank, for which Mr. Whitney has never been the agent, had said about Whitney, in a conversation held some time and some where, with somebody about some things, and this agency among the rest! Why, sir, it was a most outrageous procedure on the part of the committee. No wonder the gentleman thinks they were "packed." How could a reasonable man come to any other conclusion?

Well, sir, on page 104, we have another specimen of the illiberality of this "packed majority," who have been engaged in suppressing the truth by their votes. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) offered to ask a witness (Mr. Coxe) whether he, as attorney for Mr. Whitney's creditors, had not instituted suits against Whitney? What amount Whitney owed; who was his bail; whether execution had been issued against him; whether Whitney had not offered to compromise; whether he had not threatened to put his property out of his hands; and, finally, to whom the carriages, furniture, &c. in his possession belonged? All of which interrogatories were voted down by the majority. The "packed majority" could not understand what the House wanted with such information. They were simple enough to suppose that the amount of Mr. Whitney's debts was a matter between him and his creditors; that his giving bail, and threatening to put his property out of his hands, (if he ever did so) were occurrences between private citizens, which not unfrequently happen, and with which the Legislative and Executive departments of our Government have nothing to do.

The Judiciary settles all these questions; and we proposed to have the lawyers and judges to dispose of this case as they do of all others which come before them. But least of all did we suppose, that either the Congress or people of the United States cared, whether Mr. Whitney rode in a carriage or went on foot; or if he did ride, whether the carriage belonged to himself or to somebody else. Not less surprising, however, was the the proposition to ascertain how much furniture he had in his house, and to whom that belonged. Yes sir, we were about to take an inventory of his household goods; to learn how many plates, how many knives and forks he had, and what number of spoons he had in his possession; and whether he had paid for them all, or not! What a dignified and statesmanlike business this would have been for members of Congress. Sir, we did not believe that we had any authority to make such examinations; nay, we were satisfied that the House could not, under our Constitution, have conferred such a power if it had tried; and we never dreamed that this body would condescend so low, as to attempt to investigate such a trivial and despicable subject as the kitchen furniture of a private citizen! Yet for entertaining these opinions, and acting upon them, we are denounced as a "packed committee!"

Progressing with this subject, we find, on page 116 of the journal, the minority inquired whether Mr. Whitney did not write part of the President's last annual message! In pages 118 and 123, we find them asking the important question, "For whom did R. M. Whitney electioneer during the last Presidential campaign?" Was he for Mr. Van Buren, for Gen. Harrison, Judge White, or Mr. Webster? Upon page 120 the minority, it appears, inquired whether this agent did not sometimes write editorials for the Globe. They were determined to make an important man of him in spite of all he could do to the contrary. Whilst he was watching the interests of his employers, and corresponding with them upon subjects connected with their banking operations, the minority were determined to show that he was the great necromancer, who, unknown and unseen, was controlling all the moneyed operations of the Government by secret movements of his supernatural skill. But, in addition to all his other employments, he undertook to give direction to public opinion; and, for that purpose, sometimes took command of "the great Globe itself." These interrogatories were also voted down by the majority of the committee.

In the course of my reading and observation, I have had occasion to notice a number of most remarkable falls; but none has ever occurred, which appeared more extraordinary than the one I am about to mention. After these interrogatories which I have just mentioned, can you imagine, sir, what followed? Why the minority inquired, where Reuben got his stationery! Oh! what a falling off was there, my countrymen! From making a Chief Magistrate, writing the President's message, and conducting the official organ, down to a few quills and a quire of paper! But they were not satisfied to stop here. They next inquired who paid the postage on his letters; and whether he received many "free" letters? To ascertain these important facts, we had the messenger of the Treasury Department, and the penny post of the city, called before us. The former swore, that when Mr. Whitney came into the Treasury Department on business, he sometimes used the pen, ink, and paper, on the table, in the ante-room, for the purpose of writing a note or memorandum, as did any other person who chose to do so, and as we constantly see done in all our public offices. The latter stated, that Mr. Whitney got a good many letters, and paid the postage on them, like a man! He could not tell us how many "free" letters were received by the agent in the course of the year. The testimony of these two witnesses will be read with deep attention by the American people! They disclose important facts, which every man ought to understand. It is a pity the penny post could not tell us how many "free" letters Mr. W. receives. The public would then have been satisfied. This is a point, upon which which they must feel very great anxiety!!!

To fatigue the committee no longer with details which are perfectly familiar to you, Mr. Chairman,* I will close, by referring gentlemen to pages 223 and 254, where they will find the minority inquiring whether Mr. Whitney was not a traitor and smuggler during the late war with Great Britain; whether he was not a gambler, and whether he had not at some former period kept a faro bank for the accommodation of gamblers! Of course these inquiries were voted down, as unauthorized by the resolution of the House; and to use the language of the witness—"inquisitorial" in their character. Occasionally, some members of the majority voted with the minority in favor of questions which were not clearly authorized by the resolution of the House. They were inclined, in whatever, could be deemed a doubtful case, to lean in favor of investigation. The chairman, (Mr. Garland,) more frequently than any other member, voted with the minority. Being the author of the resolution, he found himself in a delicate position; and desiring to leave no ground of complaint on their part, he voted with them much oftener than any other member of the majority. He is now reaping the reward of his liberality. The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) compliments him for the honesty and candor displayed in his votes; but is utterly astonished at the report which he has presented to the House. In other words, he praises his good intentions, but laments his want of capacity to see the force and bearing of the testimony which has been taken.

I have thus run rapidly over a number of cases, to show the character of the interrogatories which the minority wished to submit to the witnesses. For voting down these and similar questions, we are now charged with ILLIBERALITY! Sir, I repel the insinuation, as entirely unwarranted by any vote we have given, and as wholly unfounded in fact.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) sometimes quotes poetry; and on the present occasion has drawn an allusion from Shakspeare. I am sure the gentleman owes the bard no malice; and yet he has egregiously misrepresented him. When an orator is driven from facts to poetry, to obtain weapons for his cause, the prospect must be gloomy; but if he should fall into errors, even with his poetry, it makes the case assume a still more unpromising aspect. He who innocently misrepresents poetry, may, with the same good intentions, misrepresent facts.

The gentleman told us of the tall precipice upon which King Lear stood, and viewed men walking on the beach below, who looked no larger than mice! Now, sir, I have read this play of Shakspeare, and have found no such incident. I remember that the Earl of Gloster, after losing both his eyes, accidentally met his own son, without knowing him, and obtained the young man's consent to conduct him to the cliffs near Dover; from which he intended to throw himself and put an end to his life. The son, aware of his intention and determined to save him, persuaded his father, whilst they were upon a perfect level, that they were climbing a hill; and at a certain point convinced him that they were upon the brink of an awful precipice, at the bottom of which men appeared no larger than mice. The father threw himself headlong from what he supposed to be this tall cliff, but which was in reality a level plain; and the son, changing his voice, congratulated him, in a new character, at the bottom of the supposed cliff, upon the miraculous preservation of his life.

Now I can easily imagine how a man who has lost both his eyes can be thus imposed upon; but how a gentleman of ordinary intelligence, in the full possession of all his faculties, can mistake a level plain for a towering mountain, or a fall of six feet for one of several thousand, is to me wholly inexplicable. Still it may be so; for a careful examination of our proceedings will show that the gentleman from Tennessee has fallen into errors quite as gross as those attributed by the poet to the blind Earl of Gloster.

I will close my observations by expressing the hope, that the evils which the gentleman so clearly foresees may never appear to any eye but his own, or, if they do, that the hand of a kind Providence may avert them from our country, and allow us to remain a free, a happy, and a united people.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH, OF MAINE.

In the House of Representatives, Feb. 28, 1837.—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the motion of Mr. McKAY of North Carolina, to strike from the bill of appropriations for West Point Academy the item of $30,000 proposed in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated for the erection of a building for recitation and exercise.

Mr. SMITH said he could not, in justice to the committee, nor to the country, consent to have the remarks of the honorable gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania (Messrs. Cambreleng and Ingersoll,) go forth without a few words of reply, even though it were late in the evening, and all of the committee are anxious to avoid discussion upon this and all other subjects. I will be brief as practicable, and confine myself to such suggestions only as the remarks of the two gentlemen, to whom I have adverted, have rendered absolutely proper to be now made.

And first, sir, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph of this bill proposed to be stricken out. It is an appropriation of THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS, in addition to the amount already appropriated, for the erection of a building within which to exercise and drill the cadets at West Point. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ingersoll) who reported this bill, and who never engages himself in any subject without making himself entire master of all its parts, will do the committee the justice, I trust, to inform them when he shall next take the floor, what the amount heretofore appropriated for this same building, in which to exercise the cadets, actually has been; that, if we decide on the propriety of having such a building, we may also know how much we have heretofore taken from the public Treasury for its erection, and to what sum the $30,000 now proposed will be an addition.

The honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. Cambreleng) says this proposed building is to protect the cadets during the inclemency of the winter season, when the snow is from two to six feet deep, and has urged upon the committee the extreme hardship of requiring the cadets to perform their exercises in the open air in such an inclement and cold region as that where West Point is situated. Sir, if the gentleman would extend his inquiries somewhat further north or east, he would find that at points where the winters are still more inclement than at West Point, and where the snow lies for months in succession from two to eight feet deep, a very large and useful and respectable portion of the citizens not only incur the snows and storms of winter by day without workshops or buildings to protect them, but actually pursue the business of months amid such snows and storms, without a roof, or board, or so much as a shingle, to cover and protect them by either day or night, and do not dream of murmuring. But, forsooth, the young cadet at West Point, who goes there to acquire an education for himself; who is clothed and fed, and even paid for his time, by the Government while acquiring his education, cannot endure the atmosphere of West Point, without a magnificent building to shield him during the few hours in the week, while in the act of being drilled, as part of his education! The Government is called upon to appropriate $30,000 in addition to what has already been appropriated for the purpose, to protect the young cadet, who is preparing to be a soldier, against this temporary, and yet most salutary, exposure as I esteem it. Sir, is Congress prepared thus to pamper the effeminacy of these young gentlemen, at such an expense, too, upon the public Treasury? Is it not enough to educate them for nothing, and to pay them for their time, while you are educating them, and that you provide for their comfortable subsistence, comfortable lodgings, and all the ordinary comforts, not say numerous luxuries of life, without attempting to keep them for ever within doors, to be raised like children? I am opposed to it; and I think, whenever the people of this nation shall be made acquainted with the fact, they, too, will be opposed to it.

The gentleman from New York says, the exposure of the cadets is very great, and that, among other duties, they are required to perform camp duties for three months in the year. It is true, sir, that the law of Congress imposes three months' camp duty upon the cadet. But the same tender spirit of guardianship which has suggested the expediency of housing the cadets from the atmosphere while performing their drill duties and exercises, has in some way construed away one-third of the law of Congress upon this subject, and, instead of three months' camp duty, as the law requires, the cadets are required, by the rules and regulations of the institution, to camp out only two months of the year; and for this purpose, sir, every species of camp utensils and camp furniture that Government money can purchase, are provided for them; and this same duty, thus pictured forth here by the gentleman from New York as a severe hardship, is in fact so tempered to the cadets as to become a mere luxury—a matter of absolute preference among the cadets. The gentleman from New York will find by the rules and regulations of the academy, the months of July and August, or of August and September,* are selected for this camp duty: seasons of the year, sir, when it is absolutely a luxury and privilege for the cadets to leave their close quarters, and confined rooms, to perform duty out door, and to spend the nights in their well-furnished camps. Sir, the hardships and exposure of the cadets are nothing compared with those of the generality of our fellow-citizens in the north,

*The note adverted to is as follows:

"38. During the months of July and August the cadets will be encamped, and the instruction will be exclusively military. During the remaining months of the academic year, instruction will be given in all the courses."—p. 14 of Regulations of the Academy.

†The same bill proposed $10,000 to purchase forty horses for the use of the institution.

* Mr. Pierce of New Hampshire, a member of the select committee, was in the chair during this debate.

in their ordinary pursuits; and yet we are called upon to add to their luxuries—two hundred and fifty dollar horses to ride, splendid camp equipage to protect them from the dews and damp air of summer, and magnificent buildings to shield them in their winter exercises. I think it is high time for Congress, and for the people of this nation, to reflect seriously upon these matters, and to inquire with somewhat of particularity into the character of this institution.

But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ingersoll) has volunteered to put the reputation of the West Point Academy for morality in issue at this time, and sets it out in eloquent description, as pre-eminently pure and irreproachable in this respect.

Sir, does not the honorable gentleman know that the history of this institution, within a few years back only, bears quite different testimony upon this subject? Does not the gentleman know the fact—a fact well substantiated by the Register of Debates in your library—that only a few years since the Government was forced into the necessity of purchasing up, at an expense of ten thousand dollars, a neighboring tavern stand, as the only means of saving the institution from being overwhelmed and ruined by the gross immoralities of the cadets? Is not the gentleman aware that the whole argument urged to force and justify the Government into this purchase was, that the moral power of the academy was unequal to the counter influences of the neighboring tavern? And are we to be told, sir, that this institution stands forth in its history pre-eminently pure, and above comparison with the institutions that exist upon the private enterprise and munificence, and thirst for knowledge, that characterize our countrymen? I make these suggestions, and allude to these facts, not voluntarily and from a wish to create a discussion upon either the merits or demerits of the academy. When I made the proposition to strike from this bill the ten thousand dollars proposed to be appropriated for the purchase of horses, I neither intended nor desired to enter into a discussion of the institution. I have not now spoken, except upon the impulse given by the remarks of the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania; and now, instead of going into the facts that do exist in relation to the academy, I can assure gentlemen that I have but scarcely approached them. I have been willing, and am now willing, to have these facts brought to light at another time, and upon a proper occasion that will occur hereafter, and leave the people of this nation to judge of them dispassionately. A report upon the subject of this institution will be made shortly, as the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Hawes) has assured the House. From that report, all will be able to form an opinion as to the policy of the institution in its present shape and under its present discipline. That some grave objections exist to both its shape and discipline, I think all will agree. But I wish not to discuss either at this time. Let us know, however, and let the country know, something about the expensive buildings now in progress at West Point, before we conclude to add this further appropriation of thirty thousand dollars to the expenses of the institution; and, while I am up, I will call the attention of the honorable gentleman who reported this bill to another item in it, which embraces forage for horses among other matters, and I wish him to specify to the committee what proportion of the sum of over thirteen thousand dollars, contained in this item, is based upon the proposed supply of forage. We have stricken out the appropriation for purchasing horses, and another part of the bill provides forage for the officers' horses; hence a portion of the item now adverted to should probably be stricken out.*

reverence he entertained for this body, always rendered it exceedingly painful to him to address it; and this reason alone had often restrained him from rising in his place, and disclaiming sentiments and opinions uttered by the Senator from South Carolina, in the name of the whole South, in which he differed with him toto calo. But on the present occasion he was compelled, both by duty and inclination, earnestly to protest against the practice into which that Senator had fallen—of assuming to speak for the whole South; in which general term the State he had the honor to represent was, of course, included. He was unwilling to see North Carolina tacked as a tail to any kite, or brought to act under any dictation. He was perfectly contented that South Carolina should be represented by the Senators she had herself chosen. They were signally able to represent her, and doubtless they fairly expressed her views upon this and all other subjects; but they had no right to speak in the name of the whole South, and, so far as North Carolina was concerned, he claimed for himself and his colleague the sole right of speaking for her upon that floor, as long as she herself thought proper to entrust them with that honor. He was not for making invidious comparisons, but he hazarded nothing in saying that in all of which man has reason to be proud, North Carolina was behind no State in the Union. She would act in all matters according to her own sense of right, and would, on no occasion, be either led or bullied. Among the characteristics of her people were prudence and good sense, but it had been his lot to witness on this floor language of much rashness and indiscretion, as he conceived, uttered in the name of the South. He would instance particularly some remarks of the Senator, uttered the other day, upon the subject of abolition, which he disapproved at the time, but refrained from objecting to, for the reason before stated. He did not believe it either politic or proper, on every occasion of difference between us and our northern brethren, to be throwing down the gauntlet of defiance, as had been done then. We assemble here from different portions of the Union, to confer together for the good of the whole. Far be it from him to advance the dangerous doctrine of the consolidationist, that each member of this body is the representative of the whole Union. No, no: each one is the peculiar representative of those who elect him; but in his representative capacity is governed, or rather should be, by the same laws of propriety, mutual concession, and common honesty, which govern individuals in their intercourse with each other. He was not so credulous as to believe that any mind can be altogether freed from the shackles of interest; but with the high intellectual powers which in general characterize the members of the National Legislature, we may reasonably expect that sound and liberal views of public policy will control their deliberations. Instead, then, of arousing their passions by threatening denunciations, our appeals should be addressed to their reason, and to that sense of common interest which recognises the real good of the whole in the welfare of each and every part. These appeals would seldom be disregarded, while threats and defiance, if productive of no other evil, must tend to weaken the bonds of our Union.

But to come to the matter more immediately under consideration: the Senator from South Carolina had made most extraordinary appeals to those representing southern States, and assumed over them a sort of dictatorial power to which he, for one, was not disposed to submit. In one particular he and the Senator from South Carolina agreed; and that was, in holding a tariff for protection to be unconstitutional. For the maintenance of this position, it was, if he rightly understood the matter, that South Carolina had placed herself in hostile attitude to the rest of the Union; and had nearly involved the country in the horrors of civil war. On one of the very few occasions on which he had heretofore addressed the Senate, he had remarked upon the great diversity of operation of human minds; by what various processes they arrive at the same conclusions, or wander into different results from the same premises; and of this the Senator from South Carolina and himself now presented an example. They agreed in the existence of an evil, but differed widely, very widely, as to the remedy. They were both opposed to a tariff for protection; but the Senator from South Carolina believed that the vote on the part of the southern Senators to repeal the duty on salt would rivet the tariff upon them; while he, on his part, believed the object of removing the tariff most attainable by direct blows at each feature of the odious system.

He did not understand the Senator from South Carolina as objecting to present action upon any other ground than that of an act of Congress, which has been called in debate the compromise act; but in relation to this he solemnly warns the southern Senators not to forfeit the vast advantages held under it by the South for any benefit they may hope to derive from an immediate reduction of the tariff. But at the very moment the Senator speaks of a compact from which the South is deriving advantages, he disclaims being himself bound by it. If he is not bound by it, who is? By adhering to the terms of the act of 1833, he urges we will secure certain benefits to the South, while by disturbing it the manufacturing interests will be released from the pledges under which it places them. What pledges? If any pledge exists on their part, where is the evidence of it? Do any of the northern gentlemen acknowledge themselves under any pledge? I have heard none; but I have listened with surprise to the Senator from South Carolina, insisting upon a compact binding on them, while on his own part he disavows any obligation. How can there be a compromise without parties? or how shall an obligation be effectual on one side, and have no correspondent force on the other? The concession of the Senator seems to me utterly to destroy the character of the act of 1833, as a compact or compromise. It does not upon its face profess to have any such character, but stands upon the statute book like any other act of Congress, subject to modification or repeal at the pleasure of the law-making power. If from any circumstance not appearing upon its face, it is entitled to more sacred regard than other laws passed at the same, or any other session of Congress, let the circumstance be pointed out, let us have the proof of its existence. He could easily perceive, from the delicate position in which South Carolina stood immediately preceding the passage of this act, it might be viewed by her with peculiar interest, and demand from her the most profound respect, and exercise over her actions a sort of magic control; but no reason had yet been shown why to any other State of the Union it should be held as any thing more than an ordinary act of Congress. Its binding efficacy as a compact or compromise, was disavowed on one side of the House, and not avowed on the other. But independent of any obligation to respect this act, the Senator from South Carolina seems to think that in 1842 we of the South will stand in a much better situation by leaving the act of 1833 unaltered, than we shall do by any present modifications we can possibly make. This position is plausible enough, admitting the act of 1833 is in truth a compromise; but in denying that one party is bound by it, while he insists that the other is not, the Senator abandons every legal idea of a compromise; and that being done, he was altogether at a loss to perceive any other ground of advantage to be claimed from it.

But the Senator warns us against an insidious attempt to induce the unwary southern Senators to abandon the strong ground they now occupy, by holding out to them fallacious hopes of an alteration of the tariff advantageous to the South, with a view to open the whole subject, and ultimately to fix upon us a tariff more burdensome than that of 1828. He has given us a recital, in which he seeks to fix upon those who bring forward this measure, flagrant falsehood and perfidy on a former occasion, and from thence very rationally argues that they are not to be trusted now. But we must be permitted to doubt the correctness of the representation he had made. He did not mean to say that the Senator had not represented things as they impressed themselves upon his mind; but we all know when the passions and feelings are excited, we see each other, and each other's conduct in false lights, and draw conclusions the most erroneous and unjust.

REMARKS OF MR. STRANGE, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, February 24, 1837—On Mr. BENTON'S resolution to abolish the duty on salt.

Mr. STRANGE observed that the very deep

* This was subsequently done by the committee.

The Senator was much excited at the period of which he speaks, and his fervid imagination led him to believe that a deception had been practised upon him, because matters had not resulted according to his wishes and expectations. The Senator's impressions, it seemed to him, were met by the most conclusive proof to the contrary. Among the parties to the fraud of which he speaks, the Senator has placed one now standing very high in the public confidence; one who, among those who are least disposed to do him justice, has had full credit for a remarkably keen sense of his own interests. To the honor of our country, it may be said, that honesty, or at least the appearance of it, is essential to a man's long holding a place in public favor. Allowing, then, the distinguished individual alluded to as destitute of moral principle as his worst enemies affect to believe him, would he have been so shortsighted, so recklessly indifferent to his own interest, as to enmesh himself in promises there was no necessity for making, for the mere purpose of breaking them in a few hours in the face of the whole world? Can greater fatuity than such a course would indicate be imagined? and can it for a moment be supposed of one whom his enemies have entitled the Magician?

But let us suppose all this possible; would not the fact have been long since brought home to the personal knowledge of every individual in this wide spread community? Those with whom the knowledge of the fact exists, if it exists at all, have not been wanting in motives to give it publicity and authenticity, if the thing were possible. Mr. S. said he was glad he had not yet been long enough in political life to have lost his own honesty, or his confidence in that of others. He was the representative of a people with whom nothing but truth and plain dealing could ever be practiced, or held in estimation; and he would far rather be the "deceived" than the "deceiver." The time might come when longer experience would convince him, that in this body, as well as elsewhere, men are not always what they seem; but, for the present, he had just grounds for confiding in the sincerity of those who brought forward this measure. He believed it to be their honest purpose to carry it out in all its apparent fairness. He saw no compromise standing in the way of a vote to suppress the duty on salt. He perceived no advantages to be gained in futuro by declining to do so; he was satisfied that the present interests of those whom he represented would be promoted by its suppression; and he was certain they would not receive, as an apology from him, that the Senator from South Carolina had assured him their interests would be more certainly promoted by postponing a present and certain good, to one uncertain in itself in the distant future.

REMARKS OF MR. TIPTON, OF INDIANA.

In Senate, Feb. 24, 1837.—On the proposition to recommit the bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports

Mr. TIPTON said, that as he expected to separate, on the vote about to be taken, from most of the political friends with whom he generally acted, and intended to act, whenever he could do so without injury to his immediate constituents or his country, he must claim the attention of the Senate while he would briefly state some of the reasons that would govern his vote on the motion to recommit the bill under consideration. He considered it wise in an American statesman, when legislating to regulate the duties on foreign goods imported into this country, to look with an eye as well to the protection of American industry as to revenue. That opinion had governed his vote on the famous compromise bill of 1833, and on all other laws which had passed the Senate regulating duties on foreign imports, since he had had the honor of a seat here. He was opposed to agitating the tariff question at this short session of Congress. It was not called for by an expression from the people, but it had been forced upon us; and Senators had given us a history of the passage of the tariff bill of 1828, as connected with President-making of that day, and some gentlemen, it seemed to him, not looking to the future. He was not concerned in the tariff of 1828, and was unwilling to disturb the tariff, or commence President-making at this time. There was not time to give the tariff that mature consideration that its importance demands; but five days now remained to close all our business. He thought that it would be much better to postpone this subject to the next session of Congress; but, if the bill was to pass, it should be amended for that purpose. He would vote for its recommitment, in order that it might be so amended as to strike out that part which abolishes the duty on China, porcelain, earthen and stoneware; and also all that relates to a reduction of the duty on foreign spirits and wines of every description, and on blankets and woollen goods.

Should the bill become a law in its present shape, it will affect most injuriously a portion of my constituents, and I feel that it is my duty to make an effort to amend it. An opinion has prevailed, from the settlement of this country, that clay or earth, used in the manufacture of china, porcelain, earthenware and stoneware, was not to be found in North America; but recent examination had convinced those acquainted with the business, that clay was found in the State of Indiana, from which ware could be manufactured equal to that imported from England, and a gentleman from England had made a large investment in Indiana, and was about to commence manufacturing this description of ware in that State. He believed there was but one other establishment of the kind in the United States, that in Jersey City. At these two establishments our countrymen are investing capital, and making exertions to compete, in this branch of business, with British skill and British capital, and it surely was wise in us to protect and encourage them. The cost of the foreign article imported into this country last year was $1,697,632, paying a duty of $339,536 40. This duty, if continued, would operate as protection to the producers of the article in our own country, and, in his opinion, it could not now be abandoned without serious inconvenience, and perhaps ruin, to the establishments I have referred to in New Jersey and Indiana.

The same may be said of the reduction of the duty on blankets used in the Indian trade. The Senator from Missouri, (Mr. B.) who advocates the reduction, does so on information furnished to him by John J. Astor, of the American Fur Company. It is true that blankets suited to the trade with the northwestern Indians have never been manufactured in the United States. The blankets described in Mr. Astor's letter which was read to the Senate, are manufactured in England especially for that trade. Many years ago an English company, the Northwest or Hudson bay company, chartered by the Government of Great Britain, to trade with the Northwestern Indians, among other articles, introduced that description of blankets commonly called Mackinac blankets, through their trading post on Hudson bay, or by way of Montreal and Mackinac, and distributed as presents from the British Government, or sold by the fur traders to the Indians, and from that circumstance are best known to them as Mackinac blankets. Every trader who goes into the Indian country, finds it his interest to satisfy the Indians that his are Mackinac blankets. These blankets are superior to any goods of that description manufactured on this or the other side of the water, owing perhaps in some degree to the superior quality of the wool from which they are manufactured, under the fostering care and wise policy of Great Britain to her manufacturers. We see ourselves unable to compete with them, and we should learn wisdom by experience, and protect and encourage our own manufacturers of blankets and other woollen goods.

A few years ago an effort was made by a woollen manufacturer in Indiana to manufacture blankets for the northwestern Indians. A sample was sent to one of our outposts for presentation; the nap was fine and substantial as that description of blankets are generally made, but the wool was not long and fine as the wool on the Mackinac blankets, owing, perhaps, as much to the inferior quality of the wool used as to the mechanical part of their fabrication; and he was convinced that it would be wise in this Government to afford sufficient protection to enable our own farmers and manufacturers to improve the breed of sheep and grow wool, from which goods could be manufactured equal to those now imported from Birmingham and Liverpool. The question presented to us now was one between the American Fur company, at the head of which is that wealthy and most enterprising citizen, John J. Astor, and the British Hudson Bay company. It was true, that the American fur trader could not buy British blankets, and pay the duty, and sell at the same price, and make as large a profit as the British trader; but it would be a rare thing to see a blanket sold low to an Indian, no matter at what price they were bought. The price paid by the Indians in most cases amounts to the full value of his winter's hunt, and he is commonly indebted to the traders when his hunt is over. Mr. Astor informs us, in his letter, that the Fur company wields a capital of a million of dollars. The company can, with this immense capital, much better compete with the British Fur company than our infant manufacturers can compete with the English manufacturers.

We should not forget the lesson taught us by the late war with Great Britain. Previous to that war, but little attention had been paid to the manufacture of woollen goods in the United States; and every one acquainted with the history of that time would recollect that the soldiers of the left wing of the Northwestern army, who operated on the Maumee river in the winter of 1812-13, had not blankets nor woollen clothes to shield them from the severity of the northern winter. And he would ask, are we now better provided? Were war declared against Great Britain to-day, and the supply of British blankets cut off from us, could our factories supply our Indians and our army with blankets for the first winter's campaign? And does not the statement read to us in the letter of Mr. Stewart, a highly respectable member of the American Fur Company, prove that an Indian will travel many hundreds of miles to procure a good blanket? It is (said Mr. T.) British blankets and British talks which have heretofore wielded the unfortunate Indians against us, and always will, unless we change our policy. The question presented to his mind was this—should we keep up, for the present, the high rate of duties on blankets, to enable our own citizens who wield a capital of but a few hundred dollars, to grow wool and manufacture that description of goods to supply our demand? or abolish the duty, to enable the American Fur company, with its millions, to compete more successfully with the British Fur company; and thereby prostrate our own infant manufactures at the feet of British skill and British capital? To such a fatal policy he could not give his sanction.

He also objected to that provision in the bill that contemplated the reduction of duty on foreign distilled spirits and wines, and regretted that the motion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Crittenden,) to strike it out, did not prevail. These articles compete with domestic liquor, and they are not necessities of life; they were luxuries used by the rich who were able to pay a high price; and if the wealthy, determined to use them, do so, he, for one, would not consent to reduce the duty now paid on these articles. He also objected to abolishing the duty on materials of all kinds of embroidery, precious stones, perfumes, fancy, and perfumed soaps; these were luxuries used only by the wealthy, and some of them competed with our own manufactures.

The high rates of duty established to pay the debts contracted by the revolutionary and the late war had left us with an overflowing Treasury, and we are compelled to reduce these duties, or divide a surplus; he would favor a reduction of duties next session, when we would have more time to mature so important a measure; but in reduction, we must not lose sight of sufficient protection to our infant manufactures, and he was in favor of first abolishing the duties on such articles as were of prime necessity with the poorer class of our population; salt he considered one of those articles used by every one in community, and he had voted with great pleasure to abolish the duty on salt. So far, the bill was acceptable to him; he should vote for its recommitment, with a view to the amendments he had briefly glanced at; if he failed in the amendments, he would vote against its passage, hoping that it would not become a law, and that at the next session, we could do ourselves and constituents more ample justice than to pass this important measure hastily.

PAPERS OF MR. MADISON. DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1837.

The joint resolution for making an appropriation for the purchase of the manuscript papers of the late President Madison, relative to the proceedings of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, being under consideration:

Mr. CALHOUN said this resolution from the Committee on the Library proposed to appropriate $30,000 to accomplish the object proposed. The facts, he said, were these: Mr. Madison, under the impression that these papers would be favorably received by the public, and by publishers, had bequeathed several legacies upon them, one of some thousands of dollars to the Colonization society, and some smaller ones to other public charities, in addition to some private bequests. But, so far from his anticipations having been realized, it seemed that Mrs. Madison was unprepared to run the risk of publishing them at all, and on this account had applied to the President in relation to them. He had recommended to Congress to purchase them; and the Committee on the Library had consequently made this report.

Every one (Mr. C. said) was ready to render to the memory of Mr. Madison all possible respect. But the questions involved in this case were of a constitutional character, and it was therefore impossible for Mr. C. to vote for the proposition. The question was, have Congress the right to make this appropriation? The Constitution gives Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts of the Government, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare. It was under this provision of the Constitution that Mr. C. understood this appropriation was to be made.

In reference to this clause of the Constitution there had long been a diversity of opinion. From the very commencement of the Government, the two great parties in the country were divided upon it. One of these parties conceived that, by these words in the Constitution, Congress had the right, in promoting the general welfare, to appropriate money to any and every object which they believed would be conducive to the promotion of the general welfare. The other party, at the head of which was Mr. Madison himself, believed this power was limited by the Constitution, and that Congress have no right to make an appropriation, unless authorized to do so by a specific provision of the Constitution. These two schools had existed from an early stage of the Government to the present time. Mr. Madison, in his celebrated report of 1799, had given his views on the subject, in the most clear and conclusive language, which required not one word from Mr. C. He would ask the Secretary to read the passage on the 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th pages of the report.

[The Secretary then read the passage indicated by Mr. CALHOUN.]

Here, Mr. C. said, Mr. Madison, by a very able argument, had proved, beyond all controversy, that Congress has the power only to make specific grants, and that no more than specific powers are vested in them by that clause of the Constitution. The opposite doctrine involved unlimited power in the possession of Congress. Mr. C. would not repeat the argument. Mr. Madison had also predicted what Mr. C. feared he should see fulfilled, that the opposite argument would lead to consolidation, or was consolidation itself, and that the consequent effect would be a monarchy. What was predicted in 1799, was already, Mr. C. said, in part realized. We had not yet arrived at the stage of monarchy, but the Executive Department was in a fair way of absorbing the whole powers of the system.

Mr. C. held it to be due to the memory of Mr.

Madison, and to the powerful argument just read in his report, that questions of this kind should be considered with all possible caution. He had given his views of this portion of the Constitution in the prime of his life and vigor of his manhood; and such views elevated Mr. Jefferson to the Chief Magistracy in the political revolution of 1800, and afterward elevated Mr. Madison himself. The fame of this illustrious man, and the debt which we owed him for all he did for our institutions, demanded that we should do nothing on the present occasion to show a want of respect for him or his sentiments.

The question now before the Senate, Mr. C. said, was whether Congress had the power to purchase the copy-right to Mr. Madison's papers, which, in the present state of political feelings, were regarded of little or no value in the money market. Mr. C. regarded it as truly deplorable, that these invaluable papers, which threw a light upon the Constitution which had never been shed upon it before, should be deemed of no value by the public, absorbed with party politics and the low love of gain, so that such a work could not be published. But where, Mr. C. asked, was the special power in the Constitution for Congress to publish such a work? This was a solemn question, the answer to which should be shown not by precedent, but by the Constitution. The practice of Congress, Mr. C. said, had been most loose on this and all other points. But the real question was, whether there was such a power in the Constitution. The chairman of the committee had not rested his argument on this, but on the broad general principle that these papers would throw a new and brilliant light upon our institutions, and constitute a new era in their history, and in the progress of the human mind, thus promoting the general welfare by the diffusion of intelligence, for which Congress had no authority in the Constitution. Mr. C. felt that his position in opposition to this resolution was a painful one; but the opinions of Mr. Madison, which were the text book of Mr. C. and of those with whom he acted, demanded that he should not abandon it. He had spoken as briefly as possible, and wished chiefly for the opportunity of recording his vote against the proposition.

Mr. PRESTON said he concurred fully with his colleague in all the principles laid down in the celebrated report of Mr. Madison, as an argument upon the Constitution; and he considered his refutation of the opposite doctrines, under the Constitution, to have been unanswered, and were wholly unanswerable. But, acquiescing fully in the views both of his colleague and of Mr. Madison, Mr. P. said he could still conscientiously vote for this resolution. On the grounds to which his colleague had alluded, this resolution ought not to pass. But Mr. P. believed they had no application whatever to the case in hand. In the examination of these papers, the committee came to this general result: that these papers were part and parcel of the Constitution and of the monuments of our Government, being not only connected, but in a manner identified with them, as much so as were the journals of the convention. These journals (he said) had been published by authority of an act of Congress in 1819, under the administration of Mr. Monroe, a man eminently devoted to the principles which his colleague had commended; a strict republican, as to his political character; and this, Mr. P. believed, was done without the dissent of any party or any individual, and without the slightest objection.

Seeing that this was a proceeding of a republican Congress and a republican President, it was a subject of consideration with the committee on what principle this whole country had yielded to the propriety of such a publication; and they concluded that it was a necessary portion, not only of our constitutional history, but of our constitutional existence. Now, (asked Mr. P.) are these papers of the same character? They comprised the speeches of those who took an active part in the formation of the Government, and exhibited their views of that Government, taken down with the greatest possible accuracy and fullness; and the most remarkable speeches, after having been written out by Mr. Madison, were revised and corrected by the hand of Hamilton; so that the whole was a complete history of these transactions.

It was objected to these reports that they were not in fact official. But what right have Congress to publish the official proceedings of that body more than the unofficial? The publication of both proceeds on the same ground, that they are part and parcel of our frame of government, being an exposition of the views of those who formed the Constitution, and, therefore, best showing its true meaning.

In the same way (Mr. P. said) Congress found it convenient to publish the journals of the old Congress under the Confederation, and no one hesitated on any side. And yet these papers had no more than a historical connection with our present form of Government, and were by no means so free from objections founded on the principles of Mr. Madison's report, as were the papers of Mr. Madison now in question.

There were still other precedents which might be relied on, and among them was the purchase by Congress of the papers of General Washington, at $25,000, without any serious objection. And there was another still more remarkable example in regard to our revolutionary history. Mr. P. also adduced some other precedents of less importance. He said the Library Committee would, in his view, have been entirely justified in purchasing, on their own authority, the papers of Mr. Madison, to deposit in the library, if there had been no ulterior view to their publication.

Mrs. Madison had stated that the offers made her for the papers in question were not satisfactory. It was to be supposed they were not very great. But the committee did not feel themselves authorized to inquire what Mrs. Madison intended to do with the money which she might derive from the work. The proposition on her part was to sell thus much of her property to the Congress of the United States; and whether there were legacies on that fund or not, was not for Congress to inquire. They might just as well ask whether the printer whom they employed would give away his money for this or that object, or whether he would spend it in gambling, drunkenness, or debauchery. For these things Congress were not responsible.

Mr. P. said he deemed the history of the Government as of very great value, and he felt extremely desirous that the greatest possible light should be thrown upon it; so strong was this feeling as to cause in him some self-distrust as to his estimate of the very great value of the work now in question. But he was by no means disposed to construe the Constitution merely by the words it contained, but he thought it exceedingly desirable to know the views and intentions of its framers, which must be regarded as the only true spirit of the instrument. Mr. P. made various other remarks still further illustrating and enforcing his views.

Mr. WEBSTER said he supposed that there was no member of the Senate who regarded the sum proposed to be given for these manuscripts as too large, if the appropriation was within the just field of their constitutional powers. Now what was the object of this appropriation? The Senate sat under a Constitution which had now endured more than fifty years, and had been formed under very peculiar circumstances, under a great exigency, and in a manner that no Constitution had ever been formed in any other country, on principles of united and yet divided legislation, altogether unexampled in the history of free States. Mr. W. agreed fully in the sentiment that the constant rule of interpretation to be applied to this instrument was, that its restrictions were contained in itself, and that it was to be made, as far as possible, its own interpreter. He also agreed that the practice under the Government, for a long course of years, and the opinions of those who both formed the instrument, and afterward aided in carrying it into effect by laws passed under its authority, was to be the next ground of interpretation; and it seemed to him that the measure now proposed was of great importance, both in connection with the Constitution itself, and with the history of its interpretation. He should not now speak of the political opinions of Mr. Madison. He looked only to the general facts of the case. It was well known that the convention of great men who formed our Constitution sat with closed doors; that no report of their proceedings was published at that time; and that their debates were listened to by none but themselves and the officers in attendance. We had, indeed, the official journal kept by their order. It was an important document, but it informed us only of their official acts. We get from it nothing whatever of the debates in that illustrious body. Besides this, there were only a few published sketches, more or less valuable. But the connection of Mr. Madison with the Constitution and the Government, and his profound knowledge of all that related to both, would necessarily give to any reports which he should have taken a superior claim to accuracy. It was his purpose, when he entered the body, to report its whole proceedings. He chose a position which best enabled him to do so; nor had he been absent a single day during the whole period of its sittings. It was further understood that his report of the leading speeches had been submitted to the members for correction. The fact was well known to them all that he was thus collecting materials for a detailed report of their proceedings. Without, therefore, having seen a page of these manuscripts, it was reasonable to conclude that they must contain matter not only highly interesting, but very useful; and it was his impression that, among this class of cases, the Senate could not better consult the wishes and interests of the American people than to let them see a document of this character, from the pen of such a man as Madison. That gentleman had been more connected with the Constitution than almost any other individual. He had been present in that little assemblage that met at Annapolis in '86, with whom the idea of the convention originated. He was afterwards a member of the convention of Virginia, which ratified the Constitution. He had then been a member of the first Congress, and had taken an important lead in the great duties of its legislation, under that Constitution, in the formation of which he had acted so conspicuous a part. He had afterwards filled the important station of Secretary of State, and had subsequently been for eight years President of the United States. Thus, his whole life had been intimately connected, first with the formation, and then with the administration of the Constitution.

Mr. W. said that he saw no constitutional objection to the purchase of these manuscripts. Why did Congress purchase every year works on History, Geography, Botany, Metaphysics, and Morals? How was it that they had purchased a collection of works of the most miscellaneous character from Mr. Jefferson? The manuscripts in question stood in a different relation. They related immediately and intimately to the nation's own affairs, and especially to the construction of that great instrument under which the houses of Congress were now sitting. If the doctrine advanced by the Senator from South Carolina was to prevail, Congress ought forthwith to clear its library of every thing but the State papers. Mr. W.'s views on the Constitution were well known; whether an inspection of these papers would confirm and strengthen the views he entertained respecting that instrument, he could not say; but certainly, if they were now within his reach, he should be very eager to read them; and their examination would be one of the very first things that he should engage in. A report of such debates, from such a pen, could not but be of the highest importance, and its perusal was well calculated to gratify a rational curiosity. It might throw much light on the early interpretation of the Constitution, and on the nature and structure of our Government. But, while it produced this effect, it could do more than all other things to show to the people of the United States through what conciliation, through what a temper of compromise, through what a just yielding of the judgment of one individual to that of another, through what a spirit of manly and brotherly love, that assembly of illustrious men had been enabled finally to agree upon the form of a Constitution for their country, and had succeeded in conferring so great a good upon the American people.

Mr. NILES said he regretted that the committee had presented this subject for the action of the Senate in the precise form they had, as he feared that he should not be able to give the resolution his support, which he should have been happy to have done had the resolution been in a different shape. He concurred in all that had been said as to the merits of the work, and the high character of its illustrious author. He would yield to no man in the estimation in which he held the character, services, and political opinions of Mr. Madison. But the universally acknowledged merit of the work should induce us to be the more cautious not to act on unsound principle, and unnecessarily set a bad example. He was sorry that the committee had not gone farther, and let us know what is their ultimate purpose in the purchase of these manuscripts. Are they to be purchased for publication, or to be deposited in the library for the use of Congress? If the latter was the object, he saw no constitutional difficulty in the way; but there were other serious objections to that course. Thirty thousand dollars was an enormous sum to pay for the manuscripts, in case they were to be used only as an addition to the library of Congress; besides, if this is the only object, the purchase of the manuscripts will be the means of withholding the work from the press, instead of aiding in diffusing the sentiments of the author among the people of the United States, which he supposed was the principal object. It was unnecessary to dwell on this aspect of the question, because he was satisfied that such was not the object in view. There could be no doubt that the real purpose is the publication of the work; and what is to be the nature and extent of the publication? Are we to publish a few hundred copies only, for the use of Congress and the public offices, or is Congress to publish a large edition for general distribution? There might be less objection, on the ground of principle, to the former course, but it would certainly be a very expensive way of supplying Congress with the work. He thought the proper course would be for Congress to purchase a certain number of copies of the work after it should be published; or, if it was deemed necessary to encourage the publication, and to add to the present value of the copy-right, he should have no objection, and feel no difficulty, in the adoption of a resolution authorizing the subscription to five hundred or one thousand copies of the work, at a fair price, to be paid for when it might be published.

There can be no constitutional difficulty in purchasing the manuscript for the library, nor in purchasing a certain number of copies of the published work, nor in authorizing a subscription for a number of copies of the work when it may be published; but to purchase the manuscript, not for the library, but for the purpose of publication, is a very different thing. He doubted the power of Congress to do this, and he could see no necessity whatever for it. Why is it necessary for Congress to interfere? The work will be published without our aid. This manuscript is valuable, for we have just been informed that five thousand dollars have been offered for it. The aid of Congress, therefore, is not necessary to secure the publication of the work, and to enable the people of the United States to have the benefit of the sentiments of the illustrious author. What reason, then, can be assigned why Congress should purchase the copy-right, and become the publisher of the work? Why has this application been made to us? He apprehended that there could be no other reason than that assigned by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) that the aid of Congress was necessary to pay the legacies charged upon this manuscript. Under the form of purchasing the manuscript, we are to pay the legacies in the testament of Mr. Madison, charged upon a fund which is insufficient to satisfy them. Is not this the whole of the case? The high merit of the work is of no consequence in this view of the question, because the country will have the benefit of it without our interference. It is not on this ground that the purchase could be justified, and he could see no other object but to secure the execution of the will and the payment of the legacies.

But, said Mr. N. is there not a great principle involved in this question; one much more important than that as to the propriety of the appropriation? Is Congress to become the publisher of books for general distribution, and with the view to enlighten the people? Where are we to find our authority for such a proceeding? We are told that these manuscripts, containing the only authentic account of the proceedings of the convention, ought justly to be considered as a part of the Constitution itself; that they belong to, and are part of, the muniments of the Government. This is a strong claim to be set up for the private manuscripts of an individual, however distinguished or connected with the institutions of the country. But, admitting it to be true, has Congress the power to publish the Constitution itself for general distribution and for the purpose of affording political intelligence to the people? We may publish our journal or public records, for the use of Congress or the officers of the Government. But can Congress take upon itself to decide what political information is proper to be distributed among the people, and then become the publisher and distributor of the works containing the same, at the expense of the national treasury? This would not be only be a very extraordinary but a very dangerous power. It would not only be a new source of expenditure, but the assumption of a power which might be wielded with tremendous effect, in operating upon public opinion. If this work is to be published at the public expense and by the authority of Congress, on the ground that it is calculated to explain and illustrate the theory and principles of the Government, the same claim may be set up for works of a very different description. Who is to decide what is the true theory and exposition of the Constitution? This has been a subject of controversy from the formation of the Constitution. The different opinions which have existed in relation to this matter, have formed the basis and foundation of parties. One work will contain the true exposition of the Constitution, according to the views of one party, and a very different work according to the opinions of another party. When one party is in the ascendancy, they may publish and distribute among the people such works as may be calculated to explain and illustrate what they regard as the true theory of the Government; and another party, when in power, may authorize the publication of political works of an opposite character, to explain and unfold the true theory of the Constitution, as they understand it. This is a power which would unavoidably lead to abuses of the most dangerous tendency; as nothing could be more mischievous, than for Congress, by its direct action, and by the expenditure of the public funds, to attempt to influence public sentiment on political questions. The works of Mr. Madison would no doubt exert a highly beneficial influence on public opinion; but if a precedent is established, Congress may exercise the power, by publishing and distributing political works of a very different character. He believed that Congress had no authority to publish any work for general circulation, or for any other purpose than the use of the Government, and he could conceive of no assumption of power more dangerous, or of which the people ought to be more jealous. He regretted that the committee had presented this subject in the manner they had, and was sorry they had not gone further, and informed the Senate what was their ultimate purpose in purchasing these manuscripts. But as they had not done this, he felt it his duty to look beyond the resolution, and to decide for himself what was intended by the purchase. He believed that the object was to publish the work, under the authority, and at the expense, of the United States; and believing that such a proceeding would be wholly unauthorized, and a very dangerous exercise of power, he felt constrained to vote against the resolution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN advocated the resolution in a speech which, from his relative position, was but imperfectly heard by the reporter. After pronouncing a merited eulogy on the character of Mr. Madison, he observed that we might, with great reason, anticipate the character of this work from that of its author; and such was the estimation in which he individually held a report compiled under such circumstances, by such a man, that he believed its value could scarce be overrated. There was no gentleman, he believed, who had expressed any hesitation as to the price proposed to be given; but the Senator from South Carolina was very apprehensive that, in purchasing this work, Congress would be exercising an unconstitutional power, and one which had a dangerous tendency toward the consolidation of the Government. Now, one great reason why Mr. C. was desirous of obtaining this, and all other productions of Mr. Madison, was the conviction that we could nowhere find more light as to the just interpretation of the powers in the Constitution. As to the authority to make this purchase, if there was any value in precedents, there were enough of these to place it beyond question. The Senator demanded a specific power. A sufficient reply to that question, would be to ask another. Under what specific power in the Constitution had Congress erected this costly and magnificent palace for its legislation? Surely, a building less expensive would have met and satisfied the necessities of the case. Who would say that these noble ranges of pillars, and the splendid dome they sustained, were indispensable to the deliberations of the Senate? Nay, where was the specific power for the erection of the Capitol at all? He would further demand of the Senator under what specific power he voted for the purchase of books for the Library? The truth was, that all these acts pertained to that subordinate class of powers which regulated what might be called the domestic economy of the Government, and which were necessary to the exercise of the primary and higher powers specifically enumerated in the Constitution. And surely if Congress could purchase any work constitutionally, was there any which it might more legitimately buy than the manuscript now in question? Could any work be more desirable to an American statesman? any more useful to an American legislator? Such a report formed an integral and most important part of the national history. It was a part of the archives of the Government itself. The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. NILES) was willing to purchase 500 or 1000 copies of the work when printed. That would be quite legitimate; but the honorable Senator was startled at the idea of purchasing a manuscript for publication. On what subtle ground of constitutional construction the gentleman came to such a conclusion, Mr. C. was unable to comprehend. If the manuscript were purchased, would it not afterwards be printed? If it was printed, then all difficulty would be out of the way; but to purchase as a preparatory step to printing, would be a daring violation of the Constitution!

Mr. C. was really unable to appreciate the force of this argument. Congress designed to purchase this work for its own use; and did it constitute an objection that thereby the community would be enabled to get it also, and to possess it in a more authentic form? Congress had a right to erect a chamber for its own deliberations. Did the act become unconstitutional if the dimensions of that chamber should be so enlarged as to admit the erection of a gallery for spectators? No more did it become unconstitutional for Congress to purchase a work for themselves, because the public could incidentally get the advantage of it. Mr. C. was desirous that Congress, by such an act, should commend this work to the American people, should put its imprimatur upon it, and send it forth with all the additional weight which such an act could give. That which was not strictly necessary might nevertheless be highly useful and becoming, in the exercise of powers confessedly constitutional. Was it necessary to place in this Hall that venerable countenance of Washington, which seemed, as it were, to preside in silent dignity over their legislation? Was there any specific power which authorized them to adorn the Capitol with historic paintings and emblematic statuary? He believed that in purchasing this work the Senate would fulfil a duty near and dear to the hearts of the American people. If the remains of Mr. Madison were known to exist in the remotest corner of the world, Mr. C. would vote for an expedition that would cost far more than these manuscripts, to bring back dust so sacred to this country for a grave. Would not Congress have power to do that? Where was the specific power for the exploring expedition now fitting out? an expedition that would cover the nation with imperishable renown. Should the gentleman's interpretation prevail, the nation would be shorn of the brightest beams which now encircle its name; and though

Mr. C. differed from that gentleman as to constitutional views, he could not but believe that he was influenced at heart by all those feelings which would induce Mr. C. to support this measure. For himself he had never given a vote with a more entire conviction of its perfect propriety.

Mr. CALHOUN rejoined, and farther insisted upon the ground he had before taken. There was no diversity of opinion as to the value of these manuscripts, nor with regard to the great character of Mr. Madison, nor as to its being a very desirable object that this work should be published; but whether it should be published by the agency of Congress was a different question. The work, however, would be published at all events. Mrs. Madison had been offered $5,000 for it. That was sufficient to secure the publication. If Congress wished any copies for the library, they could furnish themselves with as many as might be necessary. Why must they purchase the copy-right? Would this application ever have come here if Mrs. Madison had been offered by the booksellers enough money to cover the legacies in her husband's will?

Mr. CRITTENDEN interposed, and said he presumed it would. The reverence in which that distinguished woman held her husband's memory would naturally induce her to desire to dispose of this manuscript rather to the Government of his country than to booksellers. As to purchasing the copy-right, so precious did he hold the manuscript itself that did he possess it he would not take the $30,000 for it.

Mr. CALHOUN resumed, and insisted that let gentlemen twist and turn the question as they pleased, it amounted to neither more nor less than this: an appropriation by Congress to pay the legacies in Mr. Madison's will. Mr. C. profoundly regretted that those legacies had ever been charged upon the avails of this manuscript. Mr. Madison had died childless, and had left his wife in easy circumstances. How much better would it have been had he left this work free of all cost as a legacy to the American people? And he no less regretted that Mrs. Madison had ever made the present application to Congress, and his regret was yet heightened, because a compliance with her request involved a plain and palpable violation of that rule in the interpretation of the Constitution which Mr. Madison himself had laid down. The rule was full of the profoundest political wisdom and foresight, and evinced in the mind of that great man a just foreboding as to the fate of this Government. It would honor the memory of Madison far more to regard this rule than to purchase this manuscript. And if the manuscript itself was esteemed so valuable, there was no doubt that the printer, after the edition was worked off, would very gladly give the original to Congress. He then went on in a course of argument to show that the appropriation involved a violation of the principles laid down by Mr. Madison with respect to limited powers, and would, if carried out, leave it in the power of the Government to perform any act whatever which it might deem conducive to the general welfare. In reply to the inquiry of Mr. Crittenden as to the erection and decoration of the Capitol, he observed that the case was very plain. They were a legislative body, and must have a house in which to assemble; and whether the building were small or large, more or less expensive, did not vary the constitutional question. As to its profuse decoration, there had been many politicians of the old school who doubted its expediency, and thought that much plainer buildings would have been more consistent with our republican simplicity. As to the exploring expedition, Mr. C. greatly doubted the right of Congress to sanction any such measure. But thus we proceeded step by step; one departure was made to sanction another, until at length they came down to the great question which had originally separated the two parties in this Government. Mr. C. admitted that when a young man, and at his entrance upon political life, he had inclined to that interpretation of the Constitution which favored a latitude of powers, but experienced observation and reflection had wrought a great change in his views; and, above all, the transcendent argument of Mr. Madison himself, in his celebrated resolutions of 1798, had done more than all other things to convince him of his error. The opposite course tended to a Government of unlimited powers, and in such a Government the Executive Department must inevitably swallow up all the rest. The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Crittenden) had warred nobly against Executive encroachments, but that warfare would be all in vain unless the money power of the Government should be closely watched. He had been struck with the sagacity and foresight of Mr. Jefferson in a remark of that great statesman, that legislative usurpation would always precede executive, but that executive would always succeed it. Yet there would be a thousand cases which so strongly appealed to the hearts and sympathies of legislators, that these salutary restraints and warnings were all in danger of being swept away; and he who should oppose appeals of that nature would come to feel little in his own eyes, and to accuse himself of a want of the noblest feelings of the heart. He concluded by once more asserting that the naked question before the Senate was, whether they would vote an appropriation to pay the legacies in Mr. Madison's will. As he could not in conscience vote in the affirmative, he desired that the question should be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. RIVES said he little expected, after the numerous appropriations for objects very questionable in their nature, and involving far more dubious constitutional questions, which pass here from session to session and from day to day without objection or observation, that we should have been occupied in a grave constitutional discussion on such a resolution as this. He most thoroughly concurred with the Senator from South Carolina in every fundamental principle he has now laid down. He subscribed most heartily to the doctrine that Senator has quoted from the celebrated report of Mr. Madison in 1793. But what is that doctrine? What was the occasion of its being advanced; and what is its just application? The Senate will all recollect that at an early stage of the history of this Government an attempt was made to pervert a clause in the first article of the Constitution which empowers Congress to "lay and collect duties, &c. to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The first construction attempted to be put upon these words was, that Congress has power to do whatever it may deem necessary and proper for the common defence and general welfare: a construction which goes at once to prostrate all notion of specific powers, and which renders the subsequent grant of those powers in the Constitution itself perfectly nugatory. But this interpretation was so gross and so entirely at war with the whole spirit and genius of our Government that it enjoyed but a brief reign. It was followed, however, by a construction much more plausible, and which was strenuously advocated by the justly celebrated Alexander Hamilton. He contended that although the Constitution did not possess a general and unlimited power to do any thing they pleased, provided they thought it for the general welfare; yet, that they might do any thing whatever which could be accomplished through the appropriation of money. It was in answer to that doctrine that Mr. Madison, in the able report, from which extracts have been read, undertook to show that the money power of Congress was itself subject to all the limitations of the Constitution; that it was entrusted with Congress only as a means of carrying into effect the specific powers enumerated in that instrument; and this has ever since been held to be the true, orthodox, republican doctrine. To that doctrine I give my full and unreserved assent.

But, while I do this, I say that it has no application here; and I admit that, if this appropriation cannot be sustained by showing that it has a proper relation to the delegated power of Congress, it cannot be justified. None can justly defend it on the ground that the money power is wider in extent than the other powers. No. We must be held, in every case, to the specific trusts of the Constitution; but then it is not necessary that there shall in every case be a verbal grant of the power. I think the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Crittenden) fairly answered the Senator from South Carolina. He inquired, if we are to look for a specific power granted in words for each particular application of money, where was the authority for the erection of these gorgeous and magnificent columns, and for decorating the walls of this Chamber with that image of the Father of his Country? The argument was, in my opinion, appropriate and conclusive. But it might be carried still farther. I think the Senator from South Carolina, whilst he goes for a strict construction of the Constitution, is in this case overstrict. If his notion of limited powers be correct, where is our authority, not for constructing so magnificent a building as this, but for erecting any building at all, even in the plainest style of Doric simplicity? Where is our grant of power to erect a mansion for the Executive, or public buildings to contain the national archives? There is evidently none. We must resort in all these cases to another clause, which declares that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department, or officer thereof." Our power to appropriate money for the erection of this Capitol, or of the President's house, does not lie in the fact that such an appropriation is absolutely necessary, for it is not absolutely necessary. The President might reside, as many of the Chief Magistrates of the States do reside, in a private mansion, provided at his own expense; and Congress might hire some apartment, without expending money in the erection of a house for its own exclusive occupancy; and, according to the doctrine of the Senator from South Carolina, as there is no specific grant here, there can be no constitutional authority for such an application of the public money. But, though not indispensably necessary, it may, nevertheless, be fit and proper, and may be covered by the limited discretionary power to make laws to carry into effect those powers which are specifically enumerated. A construction so strict as that pleaded for by the Senator from South Carolina, on the present occasion, would strip the Congress of its salutary powers, would disarm it, and render it utterly useless for all practical purposes. There must be a just discretion.

But let me call the attention of that Senator to the report of Mr. Madison. I have not looked over it for two or three years, but my mind was so early and so deeply imbued with its principles,—I looked to it with much pride and confidence, as containing the political creed of my State,—that I do not think I can err in saying that the test of any appropriation, as laid down by that great man, is, not that it shall be absolutely indispensable, but that it must bear "a direct and appropriate relation" to some of the powers specifically granted. By that test I am willing to abide; and I will vote for this appropriation, not on the broad principle that it promotes the general welfare, but on the ground that, on a fair common-sense and practical interpretation of the Constitution, it has a direct and appropriate relation to powers specifically granted. Now, to apply this principle: I ask, is there any Government which has not power to preserve, and, if it pleases, to publish the acts and records of its own official history? The other Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) put this matter, as I think, upon the true ground—on ground solid and impregnable. These debates of the convention are in the nature of public archives. They are the records and muniments of our national history, and it is only in that view that I am in favor of purchasing them; and I contend that this appropriation stands on far narrower grounds than those we are continually passing for the increase of our miscellaneous library, or than that by which we erected this Capitol, or the mansion of the Chief Magistrate. It is directed to the preservation of the muniments of our creation and organized existence as a nation and a Government, and to their publication in order to that preservation. Let me call the attention of the honorable Senator to what has been repeatedly done, and has never been objected to. When it was deemed proper to republish the journals of the old confederation, was that measure opposed on constitutional grounds? But why were those journals published? They were not the acts of an existing Congress, but of a pre-existing and different body. But still they were most precious and important, as constituting an integral part of our national history and existence. The same remarks will apply to the secret journals of the convention, and to the diplomatic correspondence of the confederation. Where was our specific constitutional authority for that publication? Yet we authorized all these things, by the necessary appropriation of money for the purpose. And I now ask, on what ground the publication of the journal of the proceedings of the convention can be practically distinguished from the debates of that same convention? May we publish the mere naked detail of the acts of the convention, and shall we be debarred from purchasing and publishing a full and authentic report of its debates, taken by a member so distinguished, who devoted himself with soul and body to the object, and who, in order to accomplish it, imposed upon himself self-denial, the regimen of an anchorite, while he was engaged in the labor?

The journal is important, I admit, but the debates are more important. The journal is a mere skeleton, a record of yeas and nays, and of resolutions agreed upon or rejected; a maze without a plan. It is this report of debates which gives us a clue to the labyrinth—which clothes the skeleton with flesh and life and substance. It is this which sheds light upon the acts themselves, and informs us of the grounds and principles on which they were adopted. Then there is another point in which this report has more nearly the character of the journal itself. It is well known that the official journal of the convention was a very imperfect record, and that there were in it chasms which had to be filled up by a resort to this very work, parts of which are actually incorporated into it, and have been printed with it. Let me prove this by reading to the Senate a short passage from the introduction to that journal, written by Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, under whose superintendence the journal of the Convention was prepared for publication.

In whatever aspect, then, we regard these manuscripts, whether as general muniments of our official and governmental history, or as a detailed account of the deliberations of that illustrious body which formed our Constitution, they are of far higher importance than the mere naked journal itself, as showing in a most interesting manner the successive phases which the Constitution assumed, and as affording us important light towards its practical construction at the present time.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Rives) appears to me to have misconceived the nature and scope of this resolution. With that astuteness which he well knows how to exhibit when there is occasion for it, he has brought forward a constitutional objection on this occasion which is not quite in harmony with that vigorous common sense which distinguishes him in so peculiar and eminent a degree. He argues that, though it might be very constitutional to purchase this work, if it were printed, it would be a violation of the Constitution to purchase the manuscript with a view to publication. But my honorable friend is running ahead of the resolution in point of fact. It says nothing about publication: that is altogether a distinct and subsequent question, in regard to which there may be a diversity of opinion. If he thinks that this purchase will be made constitutional by depositing the manuscript in one of the vaults of the Capitol, or by placing it in some of the recesses of the Library, where it shall be viewed only by those who enjoy a particular privilege to examine it, why, it can so be done; but the resolution itself does not contain a single word beyond the naked purchase of the manuscript. I have indeed no doubt that a majority of the body would be in favor of the publication. But there is nothing of that in the resolution. There may be important reasons why Congress should wish to possess the original veritable record of these proceedings in the autograph of one so intimately acquainted with them, and so closely connected with all that relates to the Constitution as was Mr. Madison.

It is often important not only that we have the words but the punctuation even of some of these resolutions, for the Senator from Connecticut knows very well that grave constitutional questions have turned upon the punctuation of some of the articles of that instrument. A change in a word may change the whole character of a work, and hence it is important that the original manuscript should be deposited in our archives. That is the object of the resolution. It was drawn up with care, and with express reference to this point. The object is that we may have these manuscripts to appeal to as a genuine and authentic record, and an authority verified by the highest sanctions.

In addition to the appropriations which I have already mentioned, there was, a year or two ago, an appropriation made without objection, so far as I am informed, of $25,000 for the purchase of the Washington manuscripts, papers without any particular official utility, since the most important of them were already in the hands of an eminent literary gentleman, and in a course of publication. If that application of the public money could be justified, surely this cannot be objected to.

The Senator from South Carolina thought it fit to express his profound regret that Mr. Madison had not made a different disposition of these manuscripts; that he had not bequeathed them to the nation. That is delicate ground, and one on which I shall not presume to tread. It does not in my apprehension belong to this forum. It is one of those questions which every man must settle for himself in the tribunal of his own bosom. The Senator, I am very sure, does not and cannot doubt that Mr. Madison was actuated by motives alone of the purest patriotism and benevolence. He could not doubt that these debates would eventually be given to the people of the United States. There is that in his will which contains the proof that when he was recording the deeds and sayings of that assembly of demi-gods (I had almost called them,) he looked to the benefit of his country, and of mankind.

As to the bequests charged by Mr. Madison on the proceeds of these manuscripts, they were of a character to consecrate them to the interests of patriotism and benevolence. There were among them legacies to important literary institutions: one to the University of Virginia, of which he was the rector; another to the College of New Jersey, of which he was an alumnus; and another to a college in Pennsylvania; as well as some for the education of individuals nearly connected with him by the ties of blood and affection. These provisions of a warm and practical benevolence are an honor to his heart, and more indelible to his memory, in my humble judgment, than would have been an ostentatious gift of his debates to the people of the United States, as though they were objects of his charity. The nation, as the matter stands, are, in fact his legataries. He has bequeathed to them the Constitution, of which he was the chief founder and framer, and the enduring fruits of all his public toils and patriotic labors. Modest as was his great mind, and devoted to the last to the good of his country, he could not feel as if he were under obligation to give to his countrymen further proofs of his desire for their welfare.

I regret that there should on this occasion have been any comment here upon the private actions of the dead. Surely the testamentary arrangements of a man are, if any thing can be, matters which pertain exclusively, and in a sacred manner, to his own bosom. The personal bequests of such a man as Mr. Madison are not subjects for the jurisdiction or revision of the Senate. The Senator from South Carolina has also said that this proposition would never have been here had the offer made to Mrs. Madison by the booksellers been sufficient to cover the legacies charged upon these manuscripts by her husband. Sir, I have been honored by some personal relations with Mrs. Madison; and I happen to know, that while that lady was prosecuting her arrangements for the publication of these papers, the suggestion was made to her, from sources entitled to her highest respect, that the most proper disposition that could be made of them, the destination most becoming her, as well as the character of her venerated husband, would be to place them under the control of Congress. And could any thing be more proper? These precious manuscripts, more precious far than the books of the Syllabi, are the authentic depository, and the only one in existence, of the deliberations of those glorious minds which gave birth to our Constitution. Surely there is an obvious and peculiar propriety in offering them to the Congress of the United States.

And then, as to their utility to the country. Should the publication be made as a private concern by the book trade, there would be a less perfect guaranty that they were presented in a full, correct, and authentic form. But place the manuscript itself in the archives of the Government, and all will have been done which could be done to insure the preservation of the original and the accuracy and fidelity of the copies.

Let me in conclusion say, and I regret that the remark is called for by the allusions of the Senator from South Carolina, that the amiable and distinguished lady who is the proprietor of this manuscript is here as no petitioner for charity. She has done what it became her to do as the relic of that great man whose papers were bequeathed to her to enshrine and embody among the treasures of our country an authentic record of those solemn debates which issued in the formation of our happy and glorious form of Government.

Mr. CALHOUN explained. He had cast no censure on the legacies of Mr. Madison. On the contrary, he considered them as all very proper, and he must be allowed to say that he was not a little surprised at the nature and tone of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia. That which had called forth the expression of his regret had been simply this: that the legacies charged on the avails of these manuscripts should have had the effect of bringing this application before Congress. What he had said was, that if an arrangement could have been made with the booksellers that would have covered those legacies, this application never would have been made; and there was nothing in the language of the will to show the contrary. Mr. C. after a brief recapitulation of the ground he had taken, concluded by observing that not one of the cases quoted by the Senator from Virginia availed in the least against the constitutional objection he had advanced, nor had he said any thing which any friend of Mrs. Madison had the least right to take any exception to.

Mr. CLAY said that it had been his intention to offer some remarks on this resolution, but so much time had already been occupied, and that remaining to the Senate was so precious, that he should content himself with merely saying that he should vote for the resolution with the greatest readiness and pleasure; that it involved no violation whatever of the constitutional authority of Congress, while it fulfilled at the same time a sacred duty to the country, to the Congress itself, and to the memory of a man the most distinguished, with a single exception, of the patriots of the revolution.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as heretofore stated: Yeas 32, nays 14.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN INTO THE UNION.

SPEECH OF MR. JENIFER, OF MARYLAND.

In the House of Representatives, January 25, 1837—
On the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union.

Mr. JENIFER addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question being on the final passage of the bill, the previous question having been carried on the third reading, precludes the motion which I had intended to make to strike out the preamble. I cannot see the propriety of having a reason assigned which does not exist in point of fact. The preamble in reference to the act of Congress of the 15th June, 1836, providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union, declares "that a convention of delegates elected by the people of the State of Michigan, &c. did, on the 15th of December, 1836, assent to the provisions of said act," when it is so notoriously the reverse, that the advocates of the bill have themselves admitted that not one-third of the legally qualified voters elected that convention; still an impression is attempted to be made, that it was by the assent of the people of Michigan that that convention was held. I do not desire to be considered as opposed to the admission of Michigan, but I am unwilling she should be admitted illegally or unconstitutionally.

During the last session of Congress, I opposed the bill for the admission; because, after confirming her Constitution, it prescribed terms different from the provisions of that Constitution; and because it did not accomplish that which it professed to do, the settlement of the boundary line between the States of Ohio and Michigan, but left still open that controversy; and because I believed it was then pressed from other considerations than the desire to benefit the State of Michigan. I have now other and additional reasons. My objections are to the manner in which she is proposed to be admitted; because the people of Michigan have not given their assent to the act of Congress of the 15th June, 1836, admitting her into the Union; and because her admission is predicated upon revolutionary principles.

By the act of last session it is made a "fundamental condition" that the boundaries of the State of Michigan, as defined in that act, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required; and, as soon as the assent herein required shall be given, the President of the United States shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereupon, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, shall be considered as complete. Let us examine how far these conditions have been complied with. The President of the United States, in his message to Congress of 27th December last, in relation to Michigan, says: "In November last, I received a communication enclosing the official proceedings of a convention assembled at Ann Arbor, in Michigan, on the 26th September, 1836, and which (marked A) are herewith laid before you. It will be seen by these papers that the convention therein referred to was elected by the people of Michigan, pursuant to an act of the State Legislature, passed on the 25th July last, in consequence of the above mentioned act of Congress, and that it declined giving its assent to the fundamental condition prescribed by Congress, and rejected the same." Thus it appears that the President of the United States recognised this first convention as legal and constitutional, as elected by the people, pursuant to an act of the State Legislature, in consequence of the act of Congress; and that they declined acceding to the terms therein prescribed, and passed the following resolution: "Resolved, That this convention cannot give their assent to the proposition contained in said proviso, but the same is hereby rejected;" and further protest against the "condition contained in the act of Congress of June 15, 1836, as being contrary to the articles of compact contained in the ordinance of 1787, and the Constitution of the State Government."

Thus a convention, regularly organized under the law of the State, and according to the act of Congress, reject the conditions upon which Michigan is proposed to be admitted into the Union, and communicated the facts to the President of the United States.

This was then the determination of the people of Michigan, expressed by her delegates, regularly elected under the law of the State, and in pursuance of the act of Congress. This determination has not been authoritatively revoked, as far as the facts are presented to Congress. Still it is pretended that this second convention—or, more properly speaking, caucus—expresses the opinion and wishes of the people of Michigan. Let us examine how far the facts in the case support these pretensions. This second convention, without authority, was held on the 5th and 6th of December last. It will be recollected that the refusal of Michigan to accept the terms proposed by the act of Congress rendered the election of the Vice President, if not the President, uncertain. This second convention was urged to relieve that doubt. A meeting called together without authority, (two whole counties unrepresented,) undertake to reverse the authorized act of the former convention, and after declaring "that the Congress of the United States have no constitutional right to require the assent aforesaid, as a condition preliminary to the admission of Michigan into the Union," they "resolve that the assent required in the foregoing recited act of the Congress of the United States is hereby given;" thus assenting to that which they themselves pronounce to be unconstitutional. Can any gentleman believe that these proceedings were gotten up for other than political purposes? The proceedings of this meeting were also communicated to Congress by the President, but he does not recognise it as a convention of the people of the State of Michigan, so as to justify her admission into the Union. But he says, in his message, "this latter convention was not held or elected by virtue of any act of the Territorial or State Legislature." But "had these latter proceedings come to me during the recess of Congress, I should therefore have felt it my duty, on being satisfied that they emanated from a convention of delegates elected, in point of fact, by the people of the State, for the purpose required, to have issued my proclamation thereon, as provided by law."

I have quoted the President's language to show that he did not believe that this latter convention was elected, in point of fact, by the people of the State, as required by the act of Congress; because, had he so believed, he would have issued his proclamation, as required, without referring the matter to Congress. His proclamation was alone necessary to admit Michigan into the Union; and, although it has been urged that his respect for Congress induced him to submit it to their decision, no man, who knows the President, will believe that consideration to have influenced him in any degree whatever. When has he ever shrunk from responsibility, or evinced such a respect for Congress as to part with one iota of power, when once within his grasp? Where was his respect for Congress when he removed the deposits, to prevent his recommendation of the measure being almost unanimously rejected? When has he ever evinced any regard for their opinions? Has he not, on all occasions, exercised whatever power may have been placed in his hands, without regard to any tribunal? And had he believed that the latter convention was held by authority, he would not have hesitated to issue his proclamation, according to the act of Congress, and declare Michigan one of the United States. But, sir, the Presidential question was then settled; the vote of Michigan was not necessary to ensure the succession, and President Jackson was unwilling to take the responsibility without a benefit.

The error into which gentlemen have fallen, if error it be, is the denominating this second convention a convention of the people of Michigan. Whenever illegal and unjustifiable measures are adopted, an effort is made to induce a belief that it is the will of the people. But, in this particular case, they have not the benefit of that argument, because it is admitted that not more than nine thousand votes, less than one-third, were given, with a population, in 1835, of upwards of eighty-seven thousand, and now claimed to exceed two hundred thousand; and this without any act of the Territorial or State Legislature. Thus, then, we have the proceedings of a regularly-called convention, held in pursuance of the act of the Legislature, rejecting the condition contained in the act of Congress of the 15th of June, 1836; and of a subsequent convention, in the language of the President, "not held or elected by virtue of any act of the Territorial or State Legislature," accepting those conditions.

It is not contended that Michigan is proposed to be admitted in the usual manner of admitting States. But her admission, from the proceedings, is justified upon revolutionary principles. If any doubt existed here upon this subject, it will be only necessary to refer to the opening speech of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, (Mr. Thomas, of Maryland,) to satisfy them on that point. The honorable chairman who reported this bill did not attempt to conceal the fact that those proceedings were revolutionary; and his whole argument was a justification of their principles, in support of which he has referred to the manner in which Arkansas, Tennessee, and other States, have been admitted into the Union; to the opinions of distinguished citizens of Virginia; in fine, to all the authorities which he could bring to bear on this subject, since the formation of our Government. Sir, the honorable chairman finds no analogy between the cases cited and the present. Those States were admitted after the authorized and expressed will of the people was ascertained, by their consent, legally and constitutionally expressed. How is it with Michigan? Her legally, constitutionally authorized convention rejected the terms proposed by the act of Congress, and the President of the United States recognised it as such. She now proposes to be admitted, by application of a convention got up without authority of law of either Territorial or State Legislature, and which the President has not recognised as being the expression of the will of the people; yet my colleague finds in those proceedings sufficient to justify his doctrines. He does not consider law, constitution, or any authorized government, a barrier to his principles. He sets out with taking certain positions, the correctness of some of which had never been denied, and of others, which it is only necessary to state to show their absurdity. He tells us that "all power emanates from the people;" that "the people have a right to throw off their Government whenever it becomes tyrannical and oppressive;" that "a majority of the people have a right to make a Constitution, and when oppressed, to abolish the old or set up a new one."

Sir, these may be considered as the fundamental principles of all republican Governments. But when he assumes that no Government, no Constitution, is necessary, because all power emanates from the people; that meetings called by unknown, irresponsible persons, collected together upon the spur of the occasion, by inflammatory addresses or insidious publications, undertake to constitute a convention to uproot the foundations of government; then his doctrines become those of anarchy and revolution. It will be recollected that the honorable chairman commenced the debate, and, before any objection was made to the admission of Michigan, he developed his views, and the grounds upon which he supported her admission. No gentleman who has succeeded him has had the temerity to sanction them. It is true, the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Vanderpoel,) in reference to his friend's remarks, says "he cannot endorse, nor can he repudiate them." This, in the spirit of the present times, is truly non-committal. But all who listened to my colleague, who had not heard him before upon this subject, must have been astonished at the latitude of his opinions. He does not recognise any sort of law which may not, at a moment, be abrogated and annulled; and, in the language of the anarchists, bases his position upon the rights of the people. None could doubt the object of his remarks. They were intended to cover and to justify past transactions, the effect of which would be to delude the country as to the position he and his friends held in relation to recent revolutionary movements; and, although he thought proper to refer to Virginia and other States for examples to justify the measure, he might have found ample materials nearer home. The honorable chairman need not have gone to Virginia for the support of such doctrines. And here permit me to say that he has done great injustice by calling to his aid the names of some of her distinguished sons who took a prominent part in her convention, both before and at the time of its organization. They held no such doctrines as those advanced by my colleague; they would have repudiated them as inconsistent with all good government.

They have not been sanctioned to any considerable extent except in my colleague's own State. He need not have travelled elsewhere for examples of disorder and attempts at revolution. I say it with deep humiliation, that Maryland has been the theatre of revolution and anarchy.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the subject under consideration is the bill to admit Michigan into the Union. I am also aware that this bill did not take the usual course of being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because it was decided that the discussion should be confined to the question immediately before the Chair. And, sir, in following the honorable chairman who opened this debate by promulgating the principles upon which Michigan is to be admitted, I show that the practical results of such measures, if carried into effect, will be the prostration of constitutional government, and the substitution of revolution and anarchy, if not despotism, I trust I shall not be viewed as transgressing beyond the limits of parliamentary rules.

This is not the first occasion upon which my colleague has advanced those or similar opinions; this is not the first time he has denounced constitutional Government; nor is it the first time that he has raised his voice in favor of revolution! During the last session of Congress, not satisfied with expressing his opinion in favor of republican Government, he thought proper to denounce, on this floor, the Constitution and Legislature of his own State, and then to predict that the ensuing election would purge her of her tyrannical oppressors; "that the republicans, the democratic republicans of Maryland were in motion, roused by the recollection of many wrongs; that State will heave, from the Atlantic to the Alleghenies, to throw off that incubus which has long weighed upon her heart!" Sir, the means by which this was to be accomplished, and which were resorted to, within the last six or eight months, in Maryland, should admonish this House and the country of the danger of sanctioning such measures. In exposing the conduct of those who, forgetful of the high obligations they owed to their Government, and reckless of the consequences to their fellow-citizens, for political purposes, were willing to sacrifice the best interests of the State, I do not desire to do injustice to my colleague, and therefore shall confine myself to that which has become matter of history, or fairly deducible from facts as they existed.

I feel that the character of Maryland has been at stake. I know that a misapprehension has prevailed, to some extent, throughout the country, with regard to her Government and her people; this misapprehension was for a time entertained within her borders, and it has been the policy of those who produced it to continue it. It is too true that a dark cloud for a while hung upon her horizon; that she had within her limits men whose want of principle would have led them to the perpetration of any act, for personal or political preferment; whose every nerve was strained to bring her constitution and laws into disrepute, to render her citizens dissatisfied with their Government, and to plunge the State into anarchy and revolution.

But Maryland stands redeemed—redeemed by the virtue of her people, and the energy of her Government!

I hope I may be indulged on this occasion (although it might have been more proper elsewhere) in defending my native State from the obloquy which has been attempted to be heaped on her constitution, her Legislature, and her people. I know that an impression has been attempted to be made, that such was the aristocracy of her constitution, and the tyranny of her Executive and Legislature in the administration of the Government, that the people were oppressed and their wishes disregarded; and this coming, too, from some of her own native citizens. The people have never desired an alteration in her constitution, which has not been made. The constitution and laws of Maryland, like all other fallible instruments, require changes according to time and circumstances. The former is altered or amended by an act of the Legislature, (submitted to the people, who annually elect their delegates to the popular branch,) and confirmed by the subsequent Legislature. And no case can be cited where the people have expressed a desire at the polls, or otherwise made known their wishes for a change, which has not been made. But the Legislature is too enlightened, too regardful of the rights of the people, to permit themselves to be influenced by self-constituted conventions or caucuses, without authority of law, to subvert the views of political demagogues, although they may call themselves the proper exponents of the popular will. Sir, the people know and feel that anarchy is not liberty, that revolution is not reform, and without law there can be no security. It is by professing that the people desire those changes that these disorganizers endeavor to render their own acts acceptable to popular feeling.

Before we can properly appreciate the motives of the originators of the intended revolution in Maryland, it will be necessary to understand the origin, the progress, and the result of those movements.

A reform in the constitution was the ostensible object; the real one, a political ascendancy in the State. It was intended to give the vote of Maryland to Mr. Van Buren and Mr. R. M. Johnson, and thereby ensure for themselves places of high preferment. The means by which this was to be accomplished will show their total disregard of honorable engagements, and a treacherous abandonment of their own friends.

A reform in the constitution of Maryland had been, at repeated sessions of her Legislature, a subject of consideration; and, in fact, during the last session, a bill had passed making some changes approximating more nearly to the wishes of the larger counties, and a spirit was evinced to carry it much further. Various propositions had heretofore been made to give a more numerous representation to the more populous counties; but no digested plan had ever been agreed on by themselves, much less to have a representation according to population. The peculiar situation of Maryland, having a large commercial city, so disproportioned in her population to the other parts of the State, that but few intelligent men, from any section of it, would advocate a representation according to population. Many of her voters are transient residents; hundreds vote at the election without any residence whatever. I speak from a knowledge of the fact, that many of the most respectable citizens of the smaller counties are, and always have been, willing and anxious to increase the representation, in either branch of the Legislature, from the city of Baltimore and the larger counties. But those alterations were not before attempted to be made by revolution. It was reserved for the patriots of the present day, to signalize themselves by so inglorious an achievement.

In 1836 the Jackson party proposed a union with their political adversaries, to further the object, of reform. This was acceded to by the whigs, and both parties in several of the counties sent delegates to a convention which assembled in the city of Baltimore on the 6th of June, 1836. In that convention the counties of Cecil, Harford, Baltimore, Frederick, Montgomery, and Washington, and Baltimore city, were represented. The following resolutions were adopted:

1st. Resolved, That it be recommended by this convention, to the people of the counties and cities friendly to a reform of the Constitution of the State, to elect, at the next October election, delegates faithfully pledged to the people to introduce and support a bill to provide for taking the sense of the people on the question of reforming the Constitution of the State, on the first Monday in May, 1837, and in the event of a majority of the people declaring themselves in favor of such reform, providing in the same bill for the calling of a convention for that object.

2d. Resolved, That in the bill providing for the call of a convention, the members of the convention ought to be distributed equally among the several congressional districts of this State, with the exception of the fourth, which being a double congressional district, ought to have twice the number of representatives of any other district, that the members of the convention should be elected on the first Monday in June, 1837, to assemble in the city of Annapolis on the 4th day of July thereafter, to prepare and present a constitution for the ratification of the people of Maryland at the following October election.

Amongst honorable men of all parties this would have been considered binding, and the period to which they had referred would have been awaited, so as to have ascertained the wishes of the people, and to have adopted measures accordingly.

But instead of waiting until the October election, to see whether delegates were chosen to the Legislature favorable to a reform, as desired, the moment the September elections for electors of the Senate had taken place, and it was ascertained that twenty-one Whigs and nineteen in favor of Mr. Van Buren had been elected, the arch-intriguer put in operation his insidious plans; not to reform her constitution, but to revolutionize Maryland.

By the Constitution of the State, the duties of electors of the Senate are defined and limited. They are pointed out in the 15th article of that instrument, which ordains:

"That the said electors of the Senate meet at the city of Annapolis, or such other place as shall be appointed for convening the Legislature, on the third Monday in September, 1781, and on the same day in every fifth year for ever thereafter; and they, or any twenty-four of them, so met, shall proceed to elect, by ballot, either out of their own body, or the people at large, fifteen Senators, (nine of whom to be residents of the Western, and six to be residents of the Eastern Shore,) men of the most wisdom, experience, and virtue, above twenty-five years of age, residents of the State above three whole years next preceding the election."

This very article (which shows the spirit of compromise which formed the Constitution) gives to the Eastern Shore six senators out of the fifteen, was to represent and protect the minority of the State; and without such compromise the Constitution could not have been formed. With their duties thus defined; most of them under the solemn obligation of an oath to support the Constitution; all of them pledged to the people for a faithful discharge of the duties which they had solicited to be entrusted with, these nineteen violators of pledged faith, usurping powers not given them, have the unparalleled effrontery to refuse to go into the electoral college and perform their duties, unless the twenty-one electors will pledge themselves to violate their honor and their oaths, by bargaining away the rights of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to reflect on those electors, who are not here to protect and answer for themselves; nor do I consider them responsible for the iniquity of their acts. With but few exceptions, they knew not what they did. They were not capable of originating or carrying out those revolutionary objects. No, sir; they were not men for such a crisis. The honor or the renown of originating and enacting the traitorous deed is justly due to others in another sphere. Who those men are, who should be held responsible for this attempt at treason against their native State, and who "with the will to do, and not the heart to dare," after the facts which I shall develop, I leave to this House and the country to determine.

Sir, the first meeting which took place after the September elections, to instruct the electors to violate their solemn duty, was held in the county of Frederick, the county and district which my colleague, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee (Mr. Thomas) represents upon this floor. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not about to give vague or doubtful rumors, but a recital of facts as they occurred; in doing which, if I err I desire that my colleague may correct me. I intend not to do injustice; but I feel that it is due to the State of Maryland and her people, that they should be disabused from the odium attempted to be cast upon them, and that no language can be too strong (confined within parliamentary limits) in reprobation of such conduct.

At this meeting in Frederick county, a committee of five, Mr. Francis Thomas one of the number, reported sundry resolutions, amongst which were the following:

"WHEREAS, the fifteenth section of the constitution declares that NO SENATE CAN BE FORMED, UNLESS TWENTY-FOUR ELECTORS agree to meet for the appointment of the members of which it is to consist:

"Therefore, Resolved, That the Senatorial Electors of this county be instructed to require of the twenty-one Whig Electors a pledge that no member of the former Senate, and no member of the House of Delegates who opposed the bill calling a convention of the people, shall be elected to the next Senate of the State. That at least eight of the members of the Senate, to be chosen by the Electoral College, shall be selected from among persons known to entertain opinions and sentiments coinciding with the principles and opinions held by, and governing, a majority of the people (295,922) who have elected nineteen Van Buren Electors, and that, in the formation of the Senate, there shall be a majority of members known to be favorable to such a thorough and radical reform of the Constitution of the State as will ensure to all citizens living under it, equal political rights and privileges.

"Resolved, That unless the pledges required by the preceding resolution are solemnly given, in true faith, the two Electors from this county be requested to refuse to enter into an election of Senators: Provided, That the Electors from other counties and cities, having a majority of the white population of the State therein, will co-operate with them to defeat the election of a Senate, hostile to a reform in the Constitution, to the extent required in the first resolution.

"Resolved, That our friends in the counties and cities that have elected Van Buren Reform Electors, are earnestly invited and recommended to join us in these measures, as the only means by which we can avoid the fate of being again compelled to submit, for five years at least, to the tyranny of a Government, wielded and controlled by a small and aristocratic minority of the people of the State."

From the foregoing it will be seen that those patriotic reformers, who had pledged themselves to wait until after the October elections, and until the Legislature then to be elected should refuse to call a convention for a reform, still under a voluntary agreement with the whig reformers to wait that result, wrest from the people and the Legislature the powers of both, and constitute themselves a tribunal to revolutionize the State, by electing a Van Buren Senate. This was the measure of their reform; this was the great political manoeuvre which opened the eyes of the whig reformers to the intrigues by which they had been deceived. Responsive to this meeting was one held in Cecil county. They have since paid the forfeit due to their treachery. Next was one called in the city of Baltimore. This was held on the Saturday night previous to the Monday when, under the constitution, the electors were to meet at the city of Annapolis, to elect a Senate to serve for five years.

At that meeting were present nearly all the electors then on their way to the seat of Government to discharge their duty. My colleague (Mr. Thomas) was there, and was expected to address the meeting; it was one of the largest which had assembled for several years, called together to instruct their Electors to betray the trust reposed in them. My colleague was long and loudly called for to address the meeting. His fame for revolutionary discussion had spread far and near, and the most intense anxiety was evinced to hear him; but the deed had already been done; it was understood that seventeen of the nineteen had already pledged themselves not to go into the college unless the twenty-one would accede to their terms. Doubts were expressed whether they would adhere to their pledges; the meeting was addressed by several, and resolutions approving of the Frederick and Cecil proceedings were adopted. I wish I could draw a veil over the proceedings of that night. I was, by accident, in the city; and although my colleague from the upper district did not respond to the reiterated calls made upon him, another of my colleagues did. Then it was I heard, with deep anguish, proclaimed from the hustings, revolution or reform, by one from whom I had least expected it. The words were greeted and re-echoed by the boys, by the mob, and by the conspirators themselves. It was in sight of the monument erected to commemorate the glorious 12th of September, 1814; erected to perpetuate the memory of those gallant heroes who fell in defence of that country which was now threatened to be plunged in civil war. It was in sight of the monument erected to the immortal Washington. It was amidst such recollections as those I heard a descendant of one of the heroes of the Revolution—a son of one whose name and deeds stand recorded upon the page of history, as being identified with the best interests, prosperity, and honor of his country—one whose name cannot be mentioned at the present day without calling forth feelings of admiration and gratitude. It was from a son of him who bore the name of Howard that the doctrine of revolution or reform was proclaimed.

It was then I felt the degeneracy of the times. It was then I felt as if a dark cloud was impending over my native State, as if the spirit of our fathers had departed from amongst us. But, sir, no more of that. The next day the electors proceeded to Annapolis. It was not believed, up to that moment, that the nineteen would prove recreant. Such was the doubt entertained by their aiders and abettors, that my colleague, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, accompanied them to the seat of Government, and took them into his holy keeping. Upon their arrival, they refused to go into the electoral college, unless upon terms dishonorable to the twenty-one, had they acceded to them—not reputable to those who proposed them. Had those terms been acceded to, at the moment the electors were taking the oath "to be faithful, and bear true allegiance to the State of Maryland, and to support the Constitution and laws thereof," they held in reserve a pledge to violate both; and with the 59th article of the Constitution before them, which provides the manner in which alterations shall be made, in the following words:

"This form of Government, and the declaration of rights, and no part thereof, shall be altered, changed, or abolished, unless a bill so to alter, change, or abolish the same, shall pass the General Assembly, and be published at least three months before a new election, and shall be confirmed by the General Assembly after a new election of delegates, in the first session after such new election. Provided that nothing in this form of Government, which relates to the Eastern Shore particularly, shall at any time hereafter be altered, unless for the alteration and confirmation thereof at least two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the General Assembly shall concur."

They persevere in their revolutionary designs, and address a letter, proposing their own terms, to the twenty-one Electors. This was met at the threshold by the twenty-one, as high-minded, honorable, faithful public servants ever should meet insidious, designing, intriguing efforts to corrupt or to intimidate. They refuse to make any terms, much less to bargain away the rights of their constituents, with faithless, irresponsible public agents.

The conspirators then, urged on by their advisers, held a meeting, or rather caucus, denominating themselves "The Democratic republican members of the Electoral College." Resolved, That this meeting do now adjourn." They did adjourn, and quit the posts assigned them without discharging their duty; and, feeling that a deep indignation would follow their faithless proceedings, they issue a paper calculated to deceive the people, they had so egregiously misrepresented, and return to their homes elated with their own treachery.

The twenty-one electors remained at the seat of Government, trusting that better counsels would prevail, and that the nineteen recusants would come back to their duty. They responded to their address in a calm, dignified, and argumentative, though firm, bold, and decisive manner, calling upon the people of Maryland to come to the rescue; and here I quote from this address some few passages, which may be taken as indicative of the whole. They remark that "We could not suppose that we, who were known to be under the most solemn obligation to execute a trust faithfully and conscientiously, could be approached with a proposition to bargain touching the performance of our duty. We never for a moment entertained the idea of trafficking upon such a subject; and a proper self-respect, together with the palpable obligations of duty, precluded all of us from listening to such a proposition, coming from any quarter, however respectful in its language; and still less could we receive it from any other than a member of the college, duly qualified as such. Our duties were most clearly pointed out by the Constitution, and we were not only bound as good citizens to support it, but our very oath of office made it our particular and sacred duty to uphold it in all its integrity. The votes we were to cast for Senators were not to be given as our votes, but as those of the people of Maryland. They had, by their constitution, laid down the rules, and the only rules, which were to govern us; and we should have been false to them, and false to our oaths, if we had permitted any other to be prescribed to us."

And conclude with the following admonition:

"PEOPLE OF MARYLAND, the crisis is an awful one—the times are big with the fate of freedom—if the revolutionary spirit, now stalking abroad among us, is not promptly subdued by the majesty of your power, upon you will rest the fearful responsibility of being the first in the country of Washington to give to liberty a mortal wound. We shall to the last, endeavor faithfully to perform our duty to you and to ourselves; we have remained patiently at the seat of Government, keeping the college open from day to day to the present time, and here are resolved to continue until all hope is lost of the return of the absent electors. We are determined that, if confusion and anarchy and ruin are to come upon us, if all the bright hopes of the people of Maryland are to be for ever blasted, and our once fair and happy land is to become a scene of desolation and terror, we will have the consolation of reflecting, in the mind of our afflictions, that we have faithfully performed our duty.

I pronounce those names with great satisfaction. They should be transmitted down to the latest posterity, as faithful public agents. Those gentlemen had quit their homes and families, under the expectation of returning in a few days; but, by the traitorous conduct of their colleagues, had to remain at the seat of Government for near two months, anxiously and patiently waiting their return to a discharge of their duty.

As soon as it was understood that the nineteen had refused to go into the electoral college, and had quit their posts, and called on the people of Maryland, by an address replete with disorganizing principles, to support them in their unholy purposes, the alarm was felt; the deep indignation of insulted constituents was manifested by meetings called to express their opinions upon the momentous crisis.

In the city of Baltimore, the "supporters of law, order, and constitutional reform," expressed their opinion in town meeting, and "resolved that they were in favor of reform, and against revolution."

This was followed by a presentment of the grand jury of Allegany county, against the conspirators, in which they charge them as follows: "The conduct of those men is without excuse or palliation. They intended to secure the triumph of a party; and, failing in that, to subvert the Government, and endanger the public tranquillity." This was signed by twenty of the grand jurors, a majority of whom were friends of Mr. Van Buren. But to their honor be it said, they loved their more than their party. This was the first step taken in the district represented by my colleague, which struck dismay and terror in the minds of the conspirators. Next were held public meetings in the same county, without distinction of party, at one of which presided a gentleman, a warm friend of the present one administration, a man without reproach, one who at an early day had quit his native Isle to seek an asylum in this land of liberty and law. It was the venerable, the patriotic William McMahon, who, disenthraling himself from his party, stepped forward to save his adopted State from the pollution of her native citizen citizens. His feelings are expressed in the following words:

"Resolved, That we condemn the conduct of the aforesaid recusant electors who, having solicited and obtained the appointment at the hands of the people, betrayed the trust reposed in them, by basely and treacherously refusing to attend the electoral college, (as enjoined by their positive obligations to the Constitution,) with a view to dissolve the Government of the State."

Other meetings were held in different parts of my colleague's district, of similar import, to one of which I now call more particularly the attention of the House, the proceedings of which I read as matter of history; and if the application is made more directly to him, I am not responsible, but his immediate constituents. They were his political friends; they are in favor of reform; but they, too, are against revolution. At a meeting held at Selby's Port, Allegany county, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted, with but three dissenting voices:

"Whereas, FRANCIS THOMAS, Esq. our present representative in Congress, has taken an active part in promoting a change in our State Government, by such means as we believe to be against our best interests, as also the interest of the State of Maryland; and whereas, from his course in this matter, he has given us reason to believe that he has no regard to our interest, but that he is seeking self-aggrandizement at the expense of his constituents; therefore,

"Resolved, That we view him guilty of base ingratitude to the citizens of the State, and especially the people of Allegany county.

"Resolved, That he has no longer any claim to the confidence or respect of the people of Maryland or of this congressional district; and that, in our opinion, he ought forthwith to resign his seat in Congress, that the voters of the district may select another to fill the vacancy, who would pay more respect to their interests."

The result of the September election was 21 to 19 in the electoral college. In October the same mode of election, except that four delegates were elected from each county, instead of two electors. The result was 61 whigs; 19 in favor of Van Buren. Notwithstanding this indication of the popular will against the conduct of the conspirators, still they were advised to persevere in their refusal to unite with their brother electors, and elect a Senate. Some one or two of them began to relent, and did propose to meet the college, but not a sufficient number to elect a Senate. The indignation of the friends of law and order throughout the State was roused. It was too apparent to deceive any one, that they did not, as they professed, respect the will of the people. Their own political purposes were the sole object. An election had been held, and turned upon this question; yet they pertinaciously adhered to revolution. Still the twenty-one faithful, honest, fearless, electors, held to their posts, and determined to await the Presidential election, which was to take place in November. This election was by general ticket in the whole State; thus affording an opportunity of testing the very principle the conspirators professed to advocate, to wit: that a majority of the people had a right to control, and that their expression of opinion was binding upon their agents. The result of the November election was a larger majority in the whole State in favor of the whigs than had ever been given since the present political parties came into existence. Every county in the State of Maryland, except two, gave majorities for the advocates of law and order; and each of the three counties represented by my colleague (Mr. Thomas) gave majorities against his principles.

When this result was known, the Presidential election over, the State, by an unprecedented majority, voting by general ticket, put the stigma of reprobation upon the conduct of the revolutionists; it was to have been expected that the reculant electors would have joined the college to perform their duty, by electing a Senate, and thereby save the State from further anarchy. But they were otherwise advised. They were told that no danger could ensue to the State; that if no Senate were elected, the Government would still go on, and, by perseverance, their objects would be accomplished. And such was the degradation to which they were willing to bring their native State, it was announced, in the official organ of the party in the city of Baltimore, that, if they held out, and no Senate was elected, President Jackson would appoint a Governor and other officers to preside over the destinies of Maryland!!! Yes, Maryland, one of the old thirteen, was to be stricken from the number of stars which adorn the American banner, to return back to a Territorial Government, and the President of the United States to administer to her people. Is there a man within these halls so debased by party subservience? Is there a freeman throughout the country whose cheek is not suffused with a blush, when he hears that this was the remedy for the revolution? Is there any one who now can doubt that the object of these revolutionists was other than self-aggrandizement? In this state of things, the Governor of Maryland, anxiously trusting that the result of the repeated elections, expressing the will of the people, would have influenced the recusants to return to their duty, finding that they were still betraying the delegated trust, and that their aiders and advisers were urging them to adhere to their faithless pledges, issues his proclamation on the 8th November, calling together the Legislature of the State, and admonishes the revolutionists to beware of the consequences. This proclamation does great credit to the mind, as well as energy, of Governor Veazy. He felt as if forbearance was no longer a virtue. Time had been afforded them to retrace their steps: more than two months had elapsed since the election, and they still proved recreant. "The crisis was big with the fate of Maryland." He saw the twenty-one faithful agents, true to the people, clinging to the constitution of their creation, with a determination to save it from desecration. He comes to their support; and, in the parental language of a father, advises, persuades, forewarns, and then concludes with the following notice:

"And I do furthermore declare and proclaim, to all whom it doth or may concern, that, as Chief Magistrate of the State, I shall exert to the utmost all the powers which have been, or may be, vested in me by the constitution and laws, and which it may become necessary to employ, to curb the spirit of anarchy, disorder, and revolution, manifested by the aforesaid conduct and proceedings, and to support the constitution, and enforce the laws upon all offenders against her majesty, who shall proceed, by overt acts, either of resistance to the constituted authorities of the State, or of carrying out or consummating the revolutionary designs and purposes of the aforesaid recusants and their abettors; and I do hereby require and enjoin all civil officers of the State to be vigilant in the performance of their several and respective duties at this important crisis; and upon all military officers and citizens to hold themselves in readiness, in case their services may become necessary in aid of the civil authorities, to maintain the public peace, repress disorder, uphold the constitution, or enforce the laws; and, finally, with humble supplication for, and reliance upon Divine Providence for direction and aid; and, also, with the firmest reliance upon the people of the State, to support, and, if necessary, enforce the declaration, I do solemnly DECLARE AND PROCLAIM that the Constitution of the State MUST BE PRESERVED, and the Government maintained, as they now are, until 'altered, changed, or abolished,' in the manner constitutionally provided for."

Although this proclamation began to alarm, for fear of the consequences, yet they did not abandon their iniquitous designs, but held another meeting, and postponed the contemplated convention until the first Monday of January, to assemble in the city of Annapolis. The object of that postponement is expressed in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the unexpected call on the part of the Executive upon the members elect of the House of Delegates, and of the old Senate, to assemble at Annapolis, on Monday next, has rendered it expedient to postpone the meeting of the Reform Convention to a day when ample opportunity shall have been afforded to understand fully the reasons which have induced the Executive to adopt this extraordinary procedure, and to ascertain the results of their deliberation."

I find by the proceedings of this meeting, which was held in the city of Baltimore on the 19th November last, that my colleague's (Mr. Thomas's) name appears amongst those of the committee which draughted those resolutions also. This convention has not met according to adjournment. My colleague, it is presumed, knows the true reason, and I desire to know why it has not. He does not inform me why it failed to meet. I will endeavor to show what has been surmised to have been the cause. After all efforts had proved unavailing to induce the recusant electors to return to their duty; when all the popular elections were over; when the proclamation of the Governor, which received universal approbation from the lovers of law and order, was promulgated; when it was advised that, if a Senate were not elected by the period of the annual assembling of the Legislature, the constitution would be abrogated and annulled, and that Maryland would become an appendage to the General Government, the spirit which animated the framers of the Constitution burst forth throughout the land, and incited to action the sons of those sires. It was on the soil within sight of this Capitol that the first move was made which struck terror in the minds of the conspirators. A meeting was called in Prince Georges county, composed of the first men of the State, without distinction of party, to organize a corps to tender their services to the Governor of Maryland.

"On motion, it was Resolved unanimously, That we will, with our lives and fortunes, support the existing Government of Maryland against any violence that may be attempted; and we tender to the Executive our services, whenever they may be called for."

Here, Mr. Speaker, I cannot permit the occasion to pass without doing justice to a friend and patriot. Not a revolutionary patriot of the present day, who would sacrifice his own State to purchase preferment from this Government; but one who has met the enemies of his country, and risked his life in her defence; one who has received, by the unanimous vote of his State, a sword, as a reward for his gallant deeds, in one of the most glorious naval victories achieved upon the ocean; who, upon the presentation of that sword by the Governor of the State, returned it to its scabbard with this characteristic declaration, "that it should never be unsheathed until his country was in danger from the assaults of her enemies." It was Major John Contee who called that meeting. It was he who proposed a tender of services, which was unanimously united in by his whole command. It was then he felt that the time had arrived for him to redeem his pledge. But he little thought, when he received that sword, that the period ever could arrive when his duty as a soldier, as a citizen, as a man, would compel him to draw it in defence of his native State against the unhallowed assaults of native citizens. But the crisis had arrived. He was the man for such a crisis. From that day the sun of Maryland was above the horizon; her star held its station amidst the stripes of the Union; the impending clouds were dispersed, and conspiracy overawed.

It is with feelings of no ordinary character that I refer to those proceedings. But, sir, I do feel an honest pride in being the representative of such men. Sixteen of the twenty-one electors who, during these trying, exciting times, patiently, firmly, nobly, stood by the constitution and the laws, were from my Congressional district—a district immediately adjoining the seat of this General Government, yet far enough to remain uncontaminated by the incentives which gave rise to that intended revolution. It is not a little remarkable that those instigators of this resistance to the laws of their State should have been amongst the warmest advocates of the President's proclamation and measures against South Carolina. They were then willing to carry war and desolation throughout that devoted State, to arm the Government with power to march the soldiery within her borders, and to deluge her fair land with civil war. The same spirit which prompted them to those measures has been revived in relation to their own State.

But, sir, order is restored; the citizens repose in peace, and treason is no more. And when the future historian shall make a record of the present times, the names of the twenty-one will be transmitted to posterity as the noble protectors of law and liberty; whilst the same page will present those of the recusants as a beacon to all anarchists. Maryland is regenerated.

Mr. Speaker, I have said much more upon this subject than I had intended; but I know it has not been uninteresting to the House, from the unremitting attention they have bestowed. If, in the discharge of a duty which I considered imperative, I should have used strong language to express the convictions of my mind, I shall feel justified in the extraordinary circumstances which prompted it. When my own honor or that of my native State is at issue, I know no discretion within the limits of parliamentary rules; that I have not transgressed those has been evinced by the fact that my remarks have not been interrupted by you.

The immediate question before the Chair is the bill providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union. I shall vote against the bill. I believe much less injury will be done by a delay, than by sanctioning the principles upon which her admission is advocated. By a delay until the next session of Congress, an opportunity will be afforded of ascertaining the true wishes of the people; of settling the irritating controversy between her and the State of Ohio; of admitting her upon the terms of other States of the Union. But if she comes in now, predicated upon the principles which have been promulgated upon this floor, this House will have countenanced measures which, in future times, may be taken as a precedent for anarchy.

[When Mr. JENIFER had concluded, Mr. THOMAS again addressed the House. After which, Mr. HOWARD of Maryland rose, but gave way at the request of Mr. JENIFER, who said he desired to make an explanation.]

Mr. J. said it had been suggested to him since he resumed his seat, by his friends, that an interpretation had been placed upon his remarks in relation to his colleague from the city of Baltimore, (Mr. Howard,) which he desired to correct. He said they were understood to apply personally and offensively. Mr. J. said the general terms upon which he was with his colleague, and the gentlemanly deportment which had always characterized him, would forbid the application of any remark in an offensive sense; but he could not conceal the fact of his deep mortification at the countenance given to those measures, by his colleague, which had brought Maryland to the verge of a revolution. When he spoke of the degeneracy of the present day, he meant to apply it to the principles now advocated, as contrasted with those which gave birth to our glorious independence. He considered this explanation due to his colleague, for whom he could have no unkind feeling. Mr. J. said, as to his colleague from the upper district, (Mr. Thomas,) he had no explanation to make; but lest a misapprehension might prevail as to an inquiry made by his colleague, which remained unanswered, he would take occasion to notice it. My colleague, in referring to a meeting in one of the counties of his district, where resolutions had been passed reprobating, in strong terms, his conduct as their representative, after denouncing the resolutions passed at that meeting as calumnious, and the members as unworthy of credit, calls upon me to know whether I intend to endorse those proceedings or not. Sir, whatever may have been my opinion of those men or their proceedings, however I may have believed them entitled to credit, I certainly now cannot endorse them. They are my colleague's immediate constituents; they are his political friends; some of whom have been his supporters; he, therefore, ought to know them better than I do; and if, as he says, they have been purchased from their duty, and not entitled to credit, being his constituents, I cannot endorse for them, and thereby make myself liable for irresponsible men. But, sir, I have yet seen nothing, have heard nothing, to change my opinion of the correctness of their position.

SPEECH OF MR. W. B. SHEPARD, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, December 21, 1837—

On presenting a petition for the distribution of the Surplus Revenue.

MR. SHEPARD said the petition was signed by very respectable individuals in the district which he had the honor to represent, and he was desirous of adding his testimony to theirs. The petitioners (said Mr. S.) approve of the deposit bill of the last session, and pray Congress to re-enact a similar measure. They suppose that, until 1842, when the tariff will come before Congress for re-adjustment, there can be no better disposition of the unavoidable surplus in the Treasury than to put it in the custody of the people. Mr. S. said he had been astonished at the manifest attempt to paralyze the deposit bill of the last session, and to make it unpopular with the people. He trusted all such attempts would fail, and that there would be sufficient good sense left with the people not to sacrifice their real, substantial interests to mere party clamor. Individually, believing an annual distribution of the surplus revenue, for several years to come, the only possible mode of checking the downward path of this Government, he would proceed to state to the House his reasons for that belief.

I do not (said Mr. S.) regard the plan of distributing the public funds as merely placing so much money in the possession of the States; if that were the limit of its benefits, it would be a matter of minor importance. I regard it as a policy pregnant with the most lasting and extensive political consequences. It is a fact apparent to every body, and one which all admit, but the most obturate political hacker, that the public mind is now, and has for years been, in a state of dangerous and unhealthy excitement. Through the stimulants which are daily and hourly applied to the people by a most inflammatory public press, through official documents, made with no view of elucidating the truth, but merely to flatter and cajole the community, we are passing from one excitement to another, until the voice of sobriety and truth will be banished from the land as utterly beneath the attention of this chivalrous and high-minded people, who act as if they were privileged by Heaven to commit all sorts of follies without the fear of retribution; hence it is, whilst this nation has advanced with unprecedented rapidity in individual and social improvement, her political condition has become most degraded and corrupt.

That these evils have been brought upon the country by the present administration, has frequently been asserted in the two Houses of Congress; and the sentiment has been so often repeated to be true in political meetings of the people, that it requires some hardihood to doubt its correctness. In attributing to General Jackson exclusively such important results, we degrade the mass of the community, we mistake the effect for the cause; we do not go to the source of our disease; we attribute to one man what has been produced by the folly and indiscretion of thousands. Never having been either the flatterer or the reviler of the present Chief Magistrate, I hope I may be excused when I say that he is but the projecta alga of the present disturbed and agitated pool of politics.

Whence is it that this state of things should exist? Are the people less virtuous than formerly? Are they less capable of protecting their rights? No! It is because the thirst for office is insatiable; and so long as the Presidency of the United States presents a glittering prize to be reached by agitation, and by a gratulation alone, so long will the nation be periodically subverted from its very foundations, and the wished goal attained by the boldest or the meanest. The Presidential election is the curse of the country; it absorbs and perverts every other consideration; it engrosses nearly the exclusive attention of both Houses of Congress, and gives a false coloring to every thing. To its pervading influence is to be attributed nearly every thing that is vicious in our system.

An honorable member from New York (Mr. Cambreleng) who occupied a distinguished party stand on this floor, in excusing the little progress made during the last session by his political friends in reform, asserted that, during the pendency of the Presidential election, no system of reform could be perfected; and yet, sir, when an honorable member from Virginia (Mr. Wise) attempted a few days ago to probe the rottenness of this administration, we heard the most doleful and piteous lamentations upon the horrible cruelty of disturbing the retirement of the greatest and best of men. I would be glad to know when this House expects to be relieved from that degrading incubus which touches every thing, and defiles every thing with its touch. I have been a member of this body for several years; I have seen no question, from the political tariff to the printing of the most paltry tract distributed by this House, which has not been discussed and decided with a view to the Presidential election. So much is this generally the case, that strangers are puzzled to find out the subject from the discussions of the body.

It was for these reasons that I rejoiced to see the deposit bill of the last session. I think it will establish a new era in this country; it will eventually open the eyes of the people to their real and substantial interests; it will allure the mass of the community from idle and abstract political disquisitions, which are of no use, and induce them to regard this Government as a practical thing, intended for some useful purpose, which, when it ceases to fulfil it, should cease to exist.

It is, moreover, the only possible mode in which any thing like reform can be introduced into the Augean stables at Washington. Ever since that stupendous fraud which was so successfully played off before the people in 1823, commonly called the report on reform, we have had repetitions of the same face before the same credulous audiences, only under different names, with the characters re-cast, and the phraseology somewhat changed. Sometimes it has limped over the stage in the modest and harmless garb of a report on Executive patronage; anon it comes creeping by in a Presidential message, with a grandiloquent attempt to amend the Constitution. And yet, amidst all these patriotic aspirations to remedy dangers which all have admitted at some stage or other of their political advancement, the abuses of the Government have increased and are increasing, and it seems they cannot be diminished, whilst the expenses of these abuses have swelled from about $19,000,000 in 1823, to $32,000,000 in 1836. If every branch of the public service were well administered, if there were ability in the design or vigor in the execution of the duties of the several departments, there might be some excuse for this lavish prodigality of the public treasure; the reverse, however, is notoriously the case; Presidential electioneering is the only merit of your officers, and their inefficiency in this department ceases to be remarkable, or to attract public attention.

So long as that divinity which hedges the Chief Magistrate of the country is protected from the rude assaults of his opponents, the delinquency of the subordinates is unnoticed. The Constitution undoubtedly intended the Chief Magistrate for the responsible head of the Government; but it never supposed his name would be a shield behind which every species of ignorance and corruption could be safely entrenched. Such, however, is the operation of this Government, arising from the order with

When I made that inquiry, a member from Georgia (Mr. Haynes) said he could not tell in what manner to meet a proposition of this kind. It might be giving it more importance than it deserved to notice it at all. Well, sir, if it was deserving of no attention, why did not the House vote directly on the proposition of the Speaker, yea or nay, whether that paper came within the resolution of the House? Instead of that, the House has been occupied four days by the attempts of gentlemen to censure me for doing what I did not attempt to do. Now, sir, I did not present that paper to the House. I knew it was a question that demanded deliberation. I knew it would receive deep attention from this House, from this nation, and from the civilized world. I was prepared to submit to any decision the House might make upon it, but I was desirous that the House should take a direct vote upon it, and that that vote should remain a record for all time. But I was aware that it opened the whole question of the condition of slavery in this country, and the whole extent of the rights and privileges of members of this House, in the exercise of the liberty of speech. That freedom of speech is, I trust, to one portion of the House, still dear. Of another portion I cannot say, from what I have seen and heard within these four days, that I entertain that hope. I say I was aware that the answer to my question opened the whole subject of the condition of slaves, and the right of speech of members of this House. Well, sir, has this question been considered? Of all the gentlemen who, for three days, have consumed the time of this House upon the succession of resolutions of censure upon me for asking that question, one gentleman only, (Mr. French of Kentucky,) who has filled a judicial station, gave us what he thought a sound constitutional argument, to show that this House ought not to receive petitions from slaves under any circumstances. The argument of that gentleman was able, but if the rejection of the petition depends on that argument, those who vote with him, must recur to other arguments to sustain their course. What was his argument? It was, that if you abolish slavery in the States of this Union, by taking away a portion of the representation in slave States, you violate the Constitution. Now, I ask for the chain of connection between the premises and the conclusion. Is that the gentleman's logic, that if you abolish slavery you take away a portion of the right of representation, secured by the Constitution, and therefore the slave has no right to petition?

[Mr. FRENCH rose and explained, not materially varying the proposition.]

Mr. ADAMS. Has the gentleman connected his premises and conclusion any better than before? Suppose, for a moment, that slavery were abolished; how would it follow that the slave States would lose any portion of their representation? Would not the consequence be directly the reverse, and increase, instead of diminishing, their representation? If slavery were abolished in the States, those who are now represented as slaves, would form a part of the whole number of free persons, and would be represented as such. But suppose, for argument sake, that the abolition of slavery should reduce the proportional representation of the slave States. What has my question to do with the abolition of slavery in the States? My question was, whether a petition from slaves came within the order of the 18th of January, that all memorials, resolutions, petitions and papers relating, in any manner, to slavery or the slave trade, should, without being printed or referred, be laid on the table, and no further action of the House should be had thereon. The order made no discrimination of persons, from whom the petitions or papers should come. It included all petitions—all papers. The paper that I held was a petition—it was a paper. It came rigidly within the letter of the order—and what was there to exclude it from its spirit? It was to be laid on the table without reading, without printing, without being referred, without further action upon it by the House. Why should it not come under that order? It came from slaves? There was nothing in that order excluding petitions from slaves. There is not a word in the Constitution of the United States excluding petitions from slaves. Suppose the abolition of slavery should reduce the representation of the slave States; does that prove that without the abolition of slavery, the slave shall not be permitted to cry for mercy? to plead for pardon? to utter the shriek of perishing nature for relief? The gentleman argued upon a question entirely different from that put by the Speaker to the House, and which I yet hope the House will answer, whether, under any circumstances, they will receive a petition from slaves?

I beg leave to explain my views of the argument on the right of petition. One of my colleagues (Mr. Cushing) has justly said, that the right of petition is not a right derived from the Constitution, but a pre-existing right of man, secured by a direct prohibition in the Constitution to Congress to pass any law to impair or abridge it. Sir, the framers of the Constitution would have repudiated the idea, that they were giving to the people the right of petition. No, sir. That right God gave to the whole human race, when he made them men—the right of prayer, by asking a favor of another. My doctrine is, that this right belongs to humanity—that the right of petition is the right of prayer, not depending on the condition of the petitioner; and I say, if you attempt to fix any limit to it, you lay the foundation for restriction to any extent that the madness of party spirit may carry it. This is my belief, and if the House decide that the paper I have described comes within the resolution, I will present it, and in so doing, shall feel that I am performing a solemn duty.

What, sir, places the right of petition on the character and condition of the petitioner, or base it upon a mere political privilege? Such a decision would present this country to all the civilized world as more despotic than the worst of barbarian nations. The Sultan of Turkey cannot walk the streets of Constantinople and refuse to receive a petition from the vilest slave, who stands to meet him as he passes by. The right of petition contests no power. It admits the power. It is supplication; it is prayer. It is the cry of distress, asking for relief; and, sir, sad will be the day when it is entered on the Journal of this House, that we will, under no circumstances, receive the petition of slaves. When you begin to limit the right, where shall it stop? The gentleman on my left (Mr. Patton of Va.) objected to another petition, which I did present, from women of Fredericksburg, because it came from free colored people. That was giving color to an idea with a vengeance.* But the gentleman went further, and made the objection that I had presented a petition from women of infamous character, prostitutes I think he called them.

[Mr. PATTON rose to explain. It was not so. When the gentleman presented that petition which I knew came from mulattoes in a slave State, I meant to confine my objections to petitions of mulattoes or free negroes in the southern States. I meant to rescue the ladies of Fredericksburg from the stigma of having signed such a petition. Sir, no lady in Fredericksburg would sign such a petition.]

Mr. ADAMS. With respect to the question what female is entitled to the character of a lady and what not, I should be sorry to enter into a discussion here. I have never made it a condition of my presenting a petition here, from females, that they should all be ladies, though, sir, I have presented petitions for the abolition of slavery in this District, from ladies, as eminently entitled to be called such, as the highest aristocrats in the land. When I have presented these petitions, I have usually said they were from women, and that, to my heart, is a dearer appellation than ladies.

But, sir, I recur to my first position—that when you establish the doctrine that a slave shall not petition because he is a slave, that he shall not be permitted to raise the cry for mercy, you let in a principle subversive of every foundation of liberty, and you cannot tell where it will stop. The next step will be that the character and not the claims of petitions will be the matter to be discussed on this floor, and whenever, as in the case of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) any member finds a name on a petition which belongs to a person whom he says he knows to be of bad character, a motion will be made not to receive the petition, or to return it to the member who offered it. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) says he knows these women, and that they are infamous. How does the gentleman know it? [A laugh.]

[Mr. PATTON. I did not say that I knew the women personally. I knew from others that the character of one of them was notoriously bad.]

Mr. ADAMS. I am glad the gentleman now says he does not know these women, for if he had not disclaimed that knowledge, I might have asked who it was that made these women infamous—whether it was those of their own color or their masters. I have understood that there are those among the colored population of slaveholding States, who bear the image of their masters. [Great sensation.]

Mr. GLASCOCK of Georgia, here went across the hall to the seat of Mr. Adams, and amidst cries of order, held up to him the petition of the women of Fredericksburg, and said, is not that your hand writing endorsed "from ladies of Fredericksburg?"

Mr. ADAMS: Mr. Speaker, I did not designate them as ladies when I presented the petition. That is my hand writing, but when I endorsed it and sent it to the table, I did not know or suspect that the petitioners were colored people.

Here then is another limitation to the right of petition. First it is denied to slaves, then to free persons of color, and then to persons of notorious bad character. Now, sir, if you begin by limiting this right as to slaves, you next limit it as to all persons of color, and then you go into inquiries as to the character of petitioners before you will receive petitions. There is but one step more, and that is to inquire into the political faith of petitioners. Each side will represent their opponents as being infamous, and what becomes of the right of petition? Where and how will the right of petition exist at all, if you put it on these grounds?

A gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Robertson) to whose candor and generosity on this occasion I offer my tribute of thanks, as it contrasts with the treatment I experienced from others, though disapproving in the strongest terms the pertinacity of zeal which I have so often manifested in behalf of this right of petition, is unwilling to pass a vote of formal censure upon me, because he sees how manifestly incompatible that would be with any freedom of speech in this House. He says, and he is a distinguished lawyer, that there can be no right to petition, where there is no power to grant the prayer. This is ingenious and plausible; but that gentleman even, whose disapprobation is more painful to me than would be the formal censure of others, might excuse me, if I cannot assent to the correctness of his argument. The want of power to grant the prayer of a petition is a very sufficient reason for rejecting that prayer, but it cannot impair the right of the petitioner to pray.

The question of power applies to the authority to grant the petition, but not to the right of the petitioner to present his petition. The power to grant it is often one of the most mooted questions in the world. In relation to this very matter of slavery, the power to grant the prayer of those who ask for its abolition in the District of Columbia, is the question that divides this House. Ask the gentlemen from slaveholding States, in this House, whether Congress has that power. Not one of them will say they have.

[Mr. GRAVES of Kentucky, who was sitting near Mr. Adams, and who had declared, in this debate, that he held Congress had that power, reminded him of that fact.]

Mr. ADAMS—Yes, one gentleman from Kentucky has affirmed that Congress has the power to abolish slavery in this District, but very few from slaveholding States will say so, and I do not know what it may cost that gentleman for having uttered such an opinion on this floor. Ask two of the Representatives from Maine, ask the members from Vermont, from Massachusetts, from Rhode Island, from Connecticut, from — no, I will not go to New Hampshire nor New York, until I see how they vote on the question before the House. Ask the Representatives of none but freemen on this floor, and their answer will be that Congress has the power.

The ground of the gentleman from Va. who denies the right of petition without the power to grant, is perfectly consistent with his doctrine that Congress has no power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; but, sir, that is not the opinion of this House, and this House is anti-abolition, by an overwhelming majority. I am so myself, but upon the single question of the power of Congress to abolish slavery within the District, there is a great majority of this House in favor of the power.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Robertson,) believes that Congress has no such power, and here he denies the right of petition for the exercise of a power which Congress does not possess. Well, sir, for the sake of the argument I might grant him his premises, and then deny his conclusion. It would reduce the right of petition to nothing more than the right of the predominant party, for the time being, to petition. It would exclude all petitions from those who held with a minority in Congress, as to the right to exercise any given power, and the right of petition would be hedged in until it would be reduced to a mere nullity as to its essential characteristic, a supplication from one man in distress to another, who, he believes, has the power to relieve him. I wish it was in my power to illustrate this principle further, without taking up more of the time of the House than I intend to do, but I forbear. This, sir, is the ground of my doctrine—that the right of petition cannot be limited, by any act of this House, so as to deny the right to supplicate to the slave.

In the course of the argument on the right of petition, I should say debate, sir, during three days, the real question before the House has been changed to an almost countless series of resolutions, bearing down upon me; all intended, directly or indirectly, to censure me for asking a question of the Speaker, which he referred to the House, and which the House has not yet answered. I will not go through a detail of all these resolutions, with which gentlemen from the South pounced down upon me like so many eagles upon a dove. I make no account of the cries heard all around, when I asked that question, "expel him, expel him!" They are not in the resolutions. The first resolution to censure me, came from the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Haynes.) That was not strong enough and was followed by one more bitter, from the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Waddy Thompson.)—Even that was thought too mild for my offence, and was followed by a modification from the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Lewis,) which the gentleman from South Carolina accepted. I will not enumerate the rest, as they were showered upon me in quick succession, all reminding me of the exclamation of Simeon the Levite:

* One of the resolutions proposed to censure Mr. Adams for having attempted to give color to the idea that slaves had a right to petition!

"O day and night, but there are bitter words!"

But in the midst of the exultation of the gentlemen, for they seemed sure of two-thirds of the House to carry any thing they chose to propose, I was under the necessity of rising, as soon as I could get the floor, and asking the gentlemen, before they brought me as a culprit to the bar to be censured, to amend their resolution, and make it conform to the facts, about which they had not thought it worth while, in their very great zeal to put me down, to inquire at all. Well, instead of admitting their error into which they had run, without a word from me to justify it, the gentlemen took advantage of my explanation of the nature of the paper purporting to come from slaves, and pounced upon me with another resolution, charging me with the high crime and misdemeanor of their own false construction of the contents of the paper, which they assumed to be a petition from slaves for abolition, and that I had permitted the House to believe it was true! So I was to be gravely censured for gentlemen believing what they had no right to believe, nor even to infer, and what I had never said one word to justify them in believing! But it was soon found that this would not do, and another proposition came from the gentleman from Georgia, which answered the purpose no better, and which he was obliged to withdraw. There came another resolution from the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Dromgoole,) charging a new crime of most alarming import; and that was, that I had "given color to an idea." (Laughter.) I will not say a word upon that charge in the indictment against me. The gentleman from Maine (Mr. Evans) has so keenly exposed it to the ridicule it deserves, that those who introduced it cannot desire to hear any thing more said upon that subject.

Sir, there was for once in this House a remarkable unanimity between gentlemen found in opposition to each other on all other questions. A gentleman, whose speeches on this floor have not caused him to be regarded as the most devoted friend of this administration, (Mr. Waddy Thompson of South Carolina,) proposed his resolution of censure. A devoted friend of the administration (Mr. Dromgoole of Virginia) proposed an amendment, which the gentleman from South Carolina accepted at once, and that was to censure me for giving color to an idea! Sir, it was in vain that I rose, and gave the gentlemen the sober advice to attend a little more to their facts. The moment I attempted to explain, and set aside all their assumed facts, whisk! there came another resolution of censure, charging me with trifling with the House. It was not what I did, but what I did not do.

I did not get up soon enough, it seems, to show these gentlemen the best way to censure me, and enable them to correct their resolutions which they had brought forward with such zeal and in such rapid succession, but in which, unfortunately for them, there was not one word of truth.

When I say there was not one word of truth in the resolutions of the gentlemen from South Carolina and Alabama, I do not call in question their veracity. There are no men in whose veracity I would sooner trust my whole life; but I tell them that when they undertake to charge a member of this House, who never gave them the slightest cause of offence, with crimes that should draw down upon him the censure of this body, without first ascertaining the facts, they have stepped beyond the bounds of discretion and propriety; and I will give them one word of advice, that when they draw up resolutions to censure me, they should first be careful to pay a little attention to facts.

[This allusion brought Mr. Lewis and Mr. Thompson both on their feet. Mr. Lewis of Alabama said that he came into the House in the midst of the excitement, and on inquiry was told that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) had attempted to present a petition from slaves. He took it for granted it was a petition for abolition, and it was full two hours before he understood that it was of a different character. Had he known the object of the petition, he should not have offered the resolution.]

Mr. ADAMS. Sir, I very readily admit the explanation of the gentleman. He took for granted what happened not to be true. But I do not intend the slightest disrespect to the gentlemen. I only take the occasion to give them a little advice: the advice of an old man to ardent young men, to govern their future conduct in this House when they undertake to censure their colleagues. But I want another explanation from the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Waddy Thompson,) and I want to know if the language I find here reported in the Intelligencer as his, is really the expression of his deliberate opinion?

[Mr. Thompson rose to explain.]

Mr. ADAMS. I shall want an explanation of another matter from the gentleman, and he may explain both when I have stated it fully. I read from the report of that gentleman's remarks in the National Intelligencer:

"Does the gentleman, even in the latitude which he gives to the right of petition, think that it includes slaves? If he does not, he has wilfully violated the rules of the House, and the feelings of its members."

[Mr. Thompson was on his legs again to explain.]

Mr. ADAMS. I have not done yet. There is more of it to come. He then continued reading:

"Does that gentleman know that there are laws in all the slave States, and here, for the punishment of those who excite insurrection? I can tell him that there are such things as Grand Juries, and if, sir, the juries of this District have, as I doubt not they have, proper intelligence and spirit, he may yet be made amenable to another tribunal, and we may yet see an incendiary brought to condign punishment."

[Mr. Waddy Thompson was now permitted to explain. He said he had thought there was not a human being who believed that slaves had a right to petition, until he heard with astonishment that gentleman avow that he held that slaves had a right to petition. As to the other portion of what the gentleman had read, at the time the remark was made, he (Mr. T.) understood that the paper the gentleman called the attention of the House to, was a petition from slaves for the abolition of slavery. I did characterize it as an incendiary act, the presenting of such a petition; and any person, in my judgment as a lawyer, is amenable to the laws who will present a petition from slaves for the abolition of slavery. Had I known the character of the petition, I certainly should not have made those remarks. I take the responsibility, personally and direct, of every one of those epithets, so far as they apply to a petition from slaves for the abolition of slavery. I do not now apply it to the gentleman from Massachusetts.]

Mr. ADAMS. The House may take the explanation of the gentleman as they please. There, sir,

* The above report is known to have been written by Mr. Thompson himself, but the last clause of the quotation is not correctly reported. The precise language of Mr. Thompson was: "It is a violation of the criminal law of this District. What is the difference between presenting the petitions of slaves to be emancipated, and aiding them to escape? My life on it, if the gentleman has the courage to carry it thus far, and will present that petition—my life on it, we shall yet see him within the walls of a penitentiary."—Reporter.

stands the sentiment; there is the printed language in which the gentleman threatened me with indictment by a grand jury of this District, as a felon and an incendiary, for words spoken in this House! The gentleman has again avowed it, and declares that if the petition had been for abolition, and I had presented it, he would not only have brought me to the bar to be censured by this House, or have voted to expel me, but he would have invoked upon my head the vengeance of the grand jury of this District! Yes, sir, he would make a member of this House, for words spoken in this House, amenable to the grand and petty juries of the District of Columbia! Sir, the only answer I make to such a threat from that gentleman is to invite him, when he returns home to his constituents, to study a little the first principles of civil liberty! That gentleman appears here the representative of slaveholders; and I should like to be informed how many there are of such representatives on this floor who endorse that sentiment? ["I do not," exclaimed Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky. "I do not," was heard from several other voices.] Is it to be tolerated, that for any thing a member says on this floor, though it were blasphemy or treason, he is to be held accountable and punished by a grand and petty jury of this District, and not by this House? If that is the doctrine of the slaveholding representatives on this floor, let it, in God's name, go forth, and let us see what the people of this nation think of such a sentiment, and of those who make such an avowal.

[Mr. WISE, of Virginia, rose. Does any man say he will endorse that sentiment for the South?]

Mr. ADAMS. I only say, let those of the South who will endorse it, avow it. I want the country should know who they are.

[Mr. WISE. I will not endorse it. If I believed that the members of this House were amenable in any way, as such, to the juries of this District, I would not hold a seat here for one moment. Sir, this petty tribunal of the District, to which it is suggested the people of the United States, in the persons of their representatives, are to be held amenable, is notoriously under the dictation of the President, and is selected by an officer of his appointment; and have we not seen the Executive dictating to the Senate and to this House, and calling upon members to purge themselves of contempt?]

[Mr. Waddy Thompson was brought up again. He referred, he said, to the laws of South Carolina, and by those laws, if any member of the Legislature should present a petition from slaves, he would be liable to indictment by a grand jury.]

Mr. ADAMS. That may do for a southern Legislature, to help out the gentleman; and if it is the law of South Carolina that the members of her Legislature are held amenable to petit and grand juries for words spoken in debate; God Almighty receive my thanks that I am not a citizen of South Carolina!

[Great sensation. Mr. PICKENS of South Carolina arose, apparently to explain this subject.]

Mr. ADAMS, (waving his hand.) I cannot yield the floor to that gentleman. Sir, in Great Britain, which we call a monarchy, the legislative body corresponding to this House, the Commons, cannot elect their Speaker without the approbation of the King. Suppose, sir, a member of this House should propose to send a message to the President for his approval of our choice of a Speaker—what would be the opinion of that act by the slaveholding representatives themselves? Then would be the time, if ever, to send the member who should make such a proposition, to the grand jury.

Well, sir, the first act of the Speaker chosen by the British Commons, subject to the approval of the King, is to demand of the King freedom of speech for the Commons, and the King never sends them to the grand juries of Westminster to settle it.

I will not take up the time of the House on this point, but I cannot express the amazement with which such a doctrine, such a threat, will be regarded, when it shall go forth in this debate to all the non-slaveholding States—amazement that the moment it was uttered it was not instantly rebuked by the Speaker from the Chair! Sir, I ever could bring my mind to censure a member of this House for any language uttered here, I can conceive of nothing more deserving it than such a real, gross contempt of the House as this. What, sir! the members of this House, the representatives of this whole nation, answerable to a grand jury of this District for words spoken in this House! The members from New England, from New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the free western States, amenable to grand juries of the District of Columbia for their acts as representatives! Liable to be tried as felons and punished as incendiaries, for presenting, or "giving color to the idea," that they may present, petitions not exactly agreeable to certain gentlemen from the South! Sir, if that is the condition upon which we hold our seats here, and exercise our functions as the representatives of our constituents, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) has anticipated me in what I had to say; and that is, that if grand juries, constituted as they will be here, if they are to be made the avengers of whatever may be said or done in this House, how long will it be before the gentleman from South Carolina himself (Mr. Waddy Thompson) will have to answer before a grand and petit jury of the District, as an incendiary, for words spoken here against the Executive? And I ask him with what firmness or freedom he could resist Executive power, if, for every word he utters, he is to be held amenable to a grand jury selected by the Marshal, an officer appointed by the President? Let that gentleman, let every member of this House, ask his own heart with what confidence, with what boldness, with what freedom, with what firmness, he would give utterance to his opinions on this floor, if, for every word, for a mere question asked of the Speaker, involving a question belonging to human freedom, to the rights of man, he was liable to be tried as a felon or an incendiary, and sent to the penitentiary! And this jury, selected by an officer of the President, are to be the supreme judges of the sovereign American people, in the person of their representatives! Such is the avowed doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina—such are his notions of freedom of speech and of civil liberty!

I have dwelt long on this topic, and will abridge what I had to say of other matters brought into this debate. I might, perhaps, have been willing to have had the yeas and nays taken on this resolution to censure me, without saying one word, but it was impossible for me to remain silent without calling on the House to mark and repel this sentiment avowed by the gentleman from South Carolina. I could not pass over such a sentiment uttered on this floor, and not, as it ought to have been, at once put down by the Speaker.

Sir, I do not know how far the southern gentlemen will endorse that sentiment. Probably I never shall know. What I have said, and more than I have time to say, has been called for by an imperative sense of duty, as I regard it, when such a threat as this has been uttered, though by but a single member of this House.

Did the gentleman think he could frighten me from my purpose by the threat of a Grand Jury? If that was his object, let me tell him he mistook his man. I am not to be frightened from the discharge of a duty by the indignation of the gentleman from South Carolina, nor by all the Grand Juries in the universe. The right by which the national representative holds his seat here, is of vital importance; and that it may be understood, I hope that this debate will go forth and be read by the whole people, and that, among other remarkable things, they will mark this threat of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Sir, we have heard much of the great superiority of Anglo-Saxon blood. Is there a man living, with a drop of that blood in his veins, who will subscribe to this doctrine of the member from South Carolina? Are these the principles of freedom by which to regulate the deliberations of a Legislative Assembly? I ask any member of this House what he thinks would be the issue, if a member of the British House of Commons should rise in his place, and tell another member that, for words spoken there he should be held amenable to a Grand Jury of Westminster? Sir, it would be considered too ridiculous for indignation; it would be received with one universal shout of laughter, and from thenceforth subject the author of such a measure to be held up,

"Sacred to ridicule his whole life long,
And the sad burden of some merry song."

(Laughter.) Arraigned as I have been, Mr. Speaker, on such a variety of charges, changing their ground in such rapid succession, it has been impossible to make my defence with any system or order. All that I say is unavoidably desultory. Whenever my accusers presented the color of an idea, before I could fix it, it was gone, and other ideas of other colors presented in its stead. The gentlemen have performed their parts here like those persons known in theatrical companies by the name of actors of all work, who assume many characters in the same play, and change their dress so often, that you never know it is the same actor that comes in, in so many different parts, all so unlike. So has it been in the rapid changes of the gentlemen, who, in a variety of characters, have arraigned me as a criminal to be brought to the bar, on the charge of gross contempt, "for giving color to an idea." How can I reply to such a charge, or how defend myself against the allegation of such a crime? Such are the attempts made to bring down upon my head the indignation and censure of this House; a calamity, sir, which I should regard as the heaviest misfortune of a long life, checkered as it has been by many and severe vicissitudes. Yes, sir, I avow, that if a vote of censure should pass upon my name, for any act of mine in this House, it would be the heaviest of all calamities that have ever befallen me.

Sir, am I guilty, have I ever been guilty of contempt to this House? Have I not guarded the honor of this House as a cherished sentiment of my heart? Have I not respected this House as the Representatives of the whole people of the whole Union? Have I ever been regardless of the great representative principle of the people, here exhibited? Have I ever been wanting, as a member of this body, in a proper esprit du corps? Have I not defended the honor of this House on more than one occasion? Was I not the first, on a former occasion, to vindicate members of this House from the charge of being susceptible to bribery and corruption, a charge coming from one to whom the majority were most devoted? Have I not defended this House from charges from another quarter, to which I wish no further to allude? And am I now to be censured for doing what I have not done, or for not doing what I did not do, under pretence of a contempt of this House, in an act which was done from motives of the highest possible respect to this House? For never, in any act of my life, did I more consult the respect due to this House, than in proposing the question I put to the Speaker touching that paper from slaves.

Sir, if he be an enemy who shall succeed in bringing down upon me, directly or indirectly, the censure of this House; I say, if he be my enemy who votes for this, let him know he has his revenge, his triumph; for a heavier calamity could never fall upon me on earth!

And this brings me to the resolutions before the House.* I object to the first resolution, (offered

[Pope's threat to his critics. Reporter.]
[Referring, it is presumed, to the able defence Mr. A. made the last session, against the attacks of Mr. Webster on the majority of the House for voting the three millions appropriation, on the French question. Reporter.]

*The resolutions were as follows:

Resolved, That the right of petition does not belong to slaves of this Union; that no petition from them can be presented to this House without derogating from the rights of the slaveholding States, and endangering the integrity of the Union.

Resolved, That every member who shall hereafter present any such petitions to this House, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of this House, the rights of the South, and an enemy to the Union.

Resolved, That the Hon. John Quincy Adams, by Mr. Patton, of Va.) because it does not meet and answer my question. Let the question be put by yeas and nays, and I am willing to record my yea, that it is the duty of the House to receive petitions from slaves, and I shall regard it as of high import to free institutions, if, on full deliberation, the House refuse to say that they will receive petitions from slaves. The resolution does not say whether they will or not. That question, and the only question really before the House, is not met. We do not know whether it is proper or not to present such petitions. But suppose it is not proper. Can there be any offence, before the House have settled or considered that question, for a member respectfully to ask whether it be proper? Now, sir, this question is not met, and that is my objection to the first resolution.

The second resolution touches neither my question nor me, but pounces on an ideal man. It says, "every member who shall hereafter present such petition" ought to be considered an enemy to the Union, &c. What is that, sir, but the same threat, indirectly made, which the member from South Carolina (Mr. Waddy Thompson) directly made, of sending the man who should present such a petition to the Grand Jury of the District of Columbia? This resolution declares that the member who shall hereafter make an attempt to present any such petition, shall be held infamous. Is this another maxim of the slaveholding representatives, touching the freedom of speech in this House? Sir, if that resolution passes, I will submit to it so far as not to present any petitions of slaves, but I shall consider it as a resolution most disgraceful and dishonorable to this House. What, sir, is any member of this House to be pronounced infamous for offering to aid human misery so far as to present its cry for mercy and relief to this House?

But, sir, not only would such a resolution dishonor this body in the eyes of the whole civilized world; it would also limit the rights and the liberties of members of this House, so as, in fact, to surrender them all. If, sir, you can get a vote to pronounce a member infamous who shall hereafter present a petition from slaves, you have but one step further to take, and that will be easy in the rage of the spirit of party—you will declare that every man shall be held infamous if he proposes any thing displeasing to the majority.

As to the third resolution, I ask of the justice of the House not to go for it. It indirectly does what the other resolutions of censure did directly. It says that no further proceedings shall be had against me, because I have disclaimed disrespect, and disavowed an intention which no one had the shadow of a right to impute to me. What is this but saying, that if I had not disclaimed and disavowed, I should have been censured and punished by an ex post facto law? But that having done so, having, in fact, pleaded guilty, therefore, out of pure kindness, they will forgive me! Forgive me, sir, for what? For violating the rules of this House—for contempt of this House? No, sir. Had I done so, the Speaker should have called me to order, and rebuked me on the instant. And suppose, sir, for a moment, it was a violation of any rule for me to put the question I did to the Speaker, concerning that paper, and this is the offence for which I am to be forgiven, how stands the case of the Speaker himself, who put that very question to the House? I do not see but that, if I am to be indicted by a grand jury, the Speaker must be indicted with me, for aiding and abetting. I did but ask the question of the Speaker. He asked it of the House; and if there was contempt or crime in either case, which was the greater?

Sir, I am content that this whole debate should go forth as it has been begun in the National Intelligencer. I am willing that my constituents, the people of this nation, the world, and all after times, having solemnly disclaimed a design of doing any thing disrespectful to the House in the inquiry made of the Speaker as to the right of petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition, if the House was of opinion that it ought not to be presented—therefore, all further proceedings as to his conduct now cease.

should judge of me and my action on this great moral question. And here I say, that I have not done one single thing I would not do again, under like circumstances—not one thing have I done that I have not done under the highest and most solemn sense of duty.

But it is said that I have trifled with the House: that I deny. I have disclaimed, I again disclaim, any such intention. No, sir, I had a higher purpose than trifling with this House, and having disclaimed such intention, no man has a right to charge me with it. Sir, I never acted under a more solemn sense of duty; I never was more serious in any moment of my life. I take it, therefore, that the last resolution, excusing and forgiving me, will not pass. It is founded on a supposition of disclaimer and retraction on my part. Sir, I renounce all favor from this House on the ground of disclaimer or retraction. I have disclaimed nothing I have done or said. I have retracted nothing. I have done my duty, and I should do it again, under the same circumstances, if it were to be done to-morrow.

Members of this House have accused me of consuming the time of the House by presenting abolition petitions. Is it I or they who have done this? If, sir, gentlemen who are opposed to these petitions had permitted them to pass to the table under the rule, no time would have been consumed. If the Speaker had promptly answered my question, no time would have been consumed in this debate. I should never have occupied half an hour on a Monday, in presenting these petitions, which I have felt it due to the petitioners generally to present singly, had not gentlemen risen to thwart me in the discharge of my duty. Sir, I protest against the consumption of the time taken up by debates growing out of objections made by other members being charged to me. I appeal to the House—I appeal to the nation—that it is not I, but those who object to my doings in the discharge of my duty, who are answerable for this consumption of time.

And now, sir, I have done. I have only to add that I had hoped the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Patton,) seeing that the House could not be brought to a direct censure of me, would have had the magnanimity to withdraw his resolution to effect that object indirectly. He insists upon having the question taken, and the House must decide.

[The effect of this speech on the House has been rarely if ever exceeded by the influence of any speech on any assembly. It was delivered after the opponents of Mr. A. had inflamed themselves to the highest exacerbation, by most vehement harangues for four days. The speaker had to address a majority strongly prejudiced against him, and eager to seize any tolerable ground of censure for his previous course in presenting abolition petitions. And yet the result of this speech, under all these disadvantages was, that but twenty-two members could be found to vote even indirectly and remotely to censure. All the resolutions were rejected.]

THE RIGHT OF SLAVES TO PETITION.

SPEECH OF MR. THOMPSON, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 7, 1837.

MR. SPEAKER: I am reluctant, sir, to throw myself again upon the indulgence of the House. The original resolution which I submitted upon this subject, and which seems so much to have shocked the delicate sensibilities of some gentlemen, was dictated by the irrepressible feelings which the conduct of the honorable member from Massachusetts was so well calculated to excite. More calm reflection has only served to confirm me in the opinion that the course which I adopted was that which duty demanded; and although I should not be sustained by a single vote, it would not in the slightest degree shake my purpose. No, sir, in this, as in every other contest of duty, honor, and right, there is consolation, if in nothing else, in the glorious sentiment of Henry at Agincourt: "The fewer men the greater share of honor." It is not the first time that, in the moment of conflict, I have found myself abandoned by some of those who had urged me into it. I am somewhat in the condition of Richard before the fatal day of Bosworth—my allies dropping off one by one. Like him, I hope, in nothing else. Gentlemen who yesterday reproved my flagging zeal, and urged a resolution for the expulsion of the member from Massachusetts, to-day find my resolution too strong by half. All I desire is, the formal and unequivocal expression of the House, that to present a petition from slaves is unauthorized by the Constitution, a disrespect to the House, and a violation of the rights and feelings of a portion of its members. I have no personal feelings of vengeance against the honorable member (Mr. Adams) to gratify, although his habitually harassing the House, and irritating conduct on this subject of abolition, have been well calculated to rouse such feelings. How great have been his trespasses during this session upon your patience and that of the House, is in the knowledge of every member.

My honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. Robertson) admits that the conduct of the member from Massachusetts was "a wanton trifling with the House, an unjustifiable torturing of the feelings of its members, and that the subsequent explanations of the gentleman nothing extenuate the offence." Now, sir, I beg to be informed, if a wanton trifling with the House, and torturing the feelings of its members, is not a disrespect deserving censure, what is?

The honorable member from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) has urged with much zeal and force that there was no offence in the question which was asked; that there can be no violation of the decorum of the House in asking a question, a question which may or may not be answered. Is this true, sir? No offence in a question? Can greater offence be offered than by asking some question? There are some questions not to be asked, and this is one of them. Is it no disrespect to ask a member if he is not destitute of honor or truth? None whatever, according to the argument, because the question may be answered or not.

Slaves have no right to petition. They are property, not persons; they have no political rights; and even their civil rights must be claimed through their masters. Having no political rights, Congress has no power in regard to them, and therefore no right to receive their petitions. They are property, not persons, under the Constitution. The Constitution is the paramount rule of the House, and any attempt, however made, to present petitions from them is a violation of that Constitution, and a flagrant disrespect and insult to a portion of its members. Does any man dare to claim that the House, of which I am a member, is a tribunal to which appeals from my slaves are to be addressed, and in which their denunciations of me are to be received? This is a question that I will not argue. From the position that slaves have a right to petition, to that which should assert their right to vote, "the step is short and natural." They can have no such right, unless they have political rights. If they have, to refuse them an agency in making the laws by which those rights are guarded, is to violate the great fundamental principle of our revolution. If they have the right to petition, the principle must be carried out to that extent. I repeat, sir, I will not argue such a question for any other purpose than to show the enormity of the act of offering such a petition."

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) objects that the charge is indefinite, intangible. How, says he, did the member trifle with the House? I will tell you, sir. After presenting various abolition petitions, the member (Mr. A.) stated that he had a petition from twenty-two slaves, and asked if it came within the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Hawes,) thus giving to the House an additional reason to believe that the prayer of the petition was for the abolition of slavery. I inquired if it was an abolition petition, and requested that it might be read. The honorable member from Massachusetts declined to answer. My friend from Alabama (Mr. Lewis) inquired of the Chair, whether the petition did pray for the abolition of slavery. He was informed by the Chair that it did. The honorable member was silent, and permitted the misapprehension of the Chair into which he had led both you, sir, and the whole House, to remain uncorrected, when he alone had it in his power to set the House right. One word from him would have sufficed. He refused to give that one word. He allowed more than one resolution to be submitted and speeches to be made on that supposition; and not until he supposed the House sufficiently embarrassed and entrapped, did he condescend to state what was the nature of the petition. Is not this trifling with the House? Let every member honestly answer the question. But, sir, I take broader ground. To present any petition, for any object, (and it is perfectly indifferent what that object is,) from slaves, is without authority or right, and an unjustifiable and insolent trifling with the House.

The honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. Graves) has replied to an argument which no one has used. I certainly have not. He seems to suppose that the act of the honorable member from Massachusetts is regarded as offensive, because it is calculated to bring into contempt the resolutions of his honorable colleague, (Mr. Hawes.) I have not heard any such ground assumed. I shall certainly be one of the last to break a lance in defence of those resolutions. The same honorable member has also argued that it could be no disrespect, as the member from Massachusetts disclaims any such intention. Does not every one see this would excuse any, the greatest violation of decorum? A member may ask another if he is not guilty of falsehood, and is not a knave, and in his defence say he meant no offence; is he to pass without censure?

The honorable member is a slaveholder, and represents slaveholders, and on that account I must say that I have heard no speech on this floor which has grated so harshly on my ear. I regretted it, deeply regretted it, as coming from a slaveholder. It concedes, in my judgment, the most vital principles for which the abolitionists contend. Look at their petitions. They say that slavery is an evil, a national sin, and a disgrace. Will these be cured by abolition in this miserable ten miles square? Does any man believe that their purposes are confined to that? You might as well tell me that you would set fire to ten feet square in a dry prairie, and that you designed and expected that it would extend no farther. No, sir, these men, fanatics as they are, understand their game. The know that this is our weakest point—that upon which their strongest show of plausible argument can be made; and, like a skillful commander, they first assail the weakest point of the enemy, as diseases settle upon the weakest part of the system, and a more pestilential disease that this does not exist. It is a foul and blasting malaria, which is prostrating the justice, virtue, and independence of a portion of the country. Is there not at least one member on this floor, who last session was opposed to these wretches, but who, at the last election, was obliged to give in his adhesion or give up his seat here—a painful alternative to any but a patriot—to a patriot, a proud occasion of sacrificing the poor honor of a seat in this body, to his sense of justice and right—to the peace and harmony of the Union. They regard abolition in the District as a first but decisive step to abolition in the States. So do I. So does the whole slaveholding country. The gentleman concedes them the power here, and we are only tenants at sufferance, at will—and at the will of those who we know will strike the blow whenever they dare do it. They are adders fanged and coiled, and only do not strike because they dare not. Is this the aid which slaveholders in this body give to each other? "Call ye this backing your friends? A plague of such backing, say I."

I think, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I am not responsible for the erratic and discursive course of this debate. I have endeavored to confine myself to the subject before the House, and I now reluctantly advert to some topics not strictly pertinent, but which have not been first involved by me. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) has complained of severe denunciations of his State. Not by me, sir. I am guiltless on this, as on all former occasions. I would not wantonly assail the character of any State, and especially of that ancient, enlightened, and renowned Commonwealth. But when these vile assassins are exciting our slaves to revolt—to murder—infanticide; when their poisoned shafts are daily aimed at our lives, and, what is of infinitely more value, at our characters, when I strike back, and gentlemen choose to interpose their State to receive the blows aimed at them, they must take the consequences. I shall bate no jot of the force of my blows on that account.

The gentleman has given us another eulogy upon these amiable fiends—these most respectable assassins. Now, sir, allow me to say that I have read a work on the subject of slavery, written by a man than whom none is more honored at the North, and one whom the South, too, once delighted to honor, and who, I doubt not, is the best of the infamous brotherhood; and I venture to say that no book of the same number of pages, in any language, contains libels more foul and false. As a class, they are fools or knaves, and there is no escape from the alternative. If they do not know how worse than vain are their efforts, and that they only tend to make worse the condition of those whose friends they profess to be, they are entitled to the former—if, knowing it, they persist in their vile purposes, with no hope of good, but at the risk of tearing down the proudest temple which human wisdom has reared to human liberty, none will deny their right to the latter appellation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, as if entirely unconscious of the offensiveness of such topics, speaks of the right of the people of the North to sympathize with human suffering—with the oppressed—with those improperly held in bondage. Now, sir, what does all this mean when translated? It means this: that we of the South are oppressors; holding men in bondage so cruel and unlawful as to enlist the sympathies of the generous, the warm-hearted people of the North—sympathies of which we must be destitute, or we would cease from such wickedness. Now, sir, gentlemen must expect these charges to be repelled. Rousseau, I believe it was, regretted that he had not been born a Roman. I am thankful and proud that I was born an American, a slaveholder, and a South Carolinian. I regard African slavery, in all its bearings, as a blessing—as a blessing to the slave himself; and I challenge a denial of the proposition, that nowhere on the earth, in his native land or any other, is the African so elevated in the scale of being, or in the enjoyment of as much comfort—so virtuous, enlightened, or happy as those who are slaves in this country. I am satisfied that in no country where domestic slavery does not exist, has the character of man ever been, or ever will be, found in its highest development. I believe it essential to the maintenance of liberty. Where, let me ask, when the liberties and honor of this country have been assailed by enemies, foreign or domestic, have they flown for refuge? I feel that I am treading on delicate ground. It may be invidious in these times, when the whole North is so clamorous about the freedom of speech and the press, to remind gentlemen of the sedition law; and when they seem to have taken American honor exclusively under their keeping; to remind them of the part which their States bore in the late war—that second struggle for independence—for we should have ceased to have had the most essential attributes of a nation if we had not waged that war. Northern commerce was assailed, and Northern seamen impressed. The North counted the cost, and was opposed to war. The national honor was assailed, and the rest of the nation counted not the cost, but rushed into the conflict, and came out of it triumphantly, with the North all the while hanging upon their skirts. I know, sir, that there were illustrious exceptions. I speak not of individuals, but of the conduct of States.

When the gentleman, (Mr. Lincoln,) speaks of the sympathies of the North for human suffering, for the oppressed, and those held in unlawful bondage, I cannot forbear to congratulate him upon the return of those feelings—for, if "aught that's true in history be," it was not always so. There would seem to have been a time when these honorable feelings had fled from their land. And even now, it seems to be a most modified benevolence, a most restricted philanthropy, which demands as indispensable that their objects should have a red or a black skin; for their own color and race, their hearts are as they ever were. How, Mr. Speaker, if it should turn out that slavery has been brought upon the country by this most tender-hearted people? How, if I shall show that the blackest and the bloodiest pages in the history of this country, or of man, are to be found in the treatment of the aborigines by New England? That, as long as the slave-trade was profitable and tolerated, it had no horrors in their sight? That they had no sympathies with the poor Indians until they had literally exterminated all the tribes, by whom their fathers, flying from another land, were kindly and hospitably received—ere yet the untutored savage had learned the arts, the frauds, the rapacity of the white man, which they first taught him? Now, when they are no longer incommoded by the vicinity of the savage, their sympathies are not with their brethren, circumstanced as their fathers were. Their philanthropy and their selfish interests are never opposed, however there may be such opposition to the interests of others. I like not your courtesan turned prude, after ability to the vicious has ceased, and trust her nothing the more that she claims to be of the "unco quid, the rigidly righteous," and is seen at church meetings and christenings, sanctified and demure to a proverb.

Are gentlemen ignorant that mainly on New England rests the responsibility of the great importation of slaves to this country? that the colonial Legislature of Virginia passed twenty-two acts against it? and that it was through the power and influence of the New England colonies that the trade was not stopped? It was a business in which they could turn a penny, and their humanity slept. When gentlemen are daily regaling the House with their pathetic jeremiads on the horror and atrocity of slavery, are they not disturbing the bones of their fathers? Are they not guilty of that worst of parricide, the murder of a father's fame? I should think that, if they believed in spirits, as they once did, they would expect the ghosts of their fathers to rise up and accuse them. In our own times, let me ask, how long has it been since the people of a State, now the head quarters of the abolitionists, by way of showing their abhorrence of slavery and the slave trade, placed the sovereignty of that State in another branch of Congress in the hands of a convicted, a notorious (notorious in all the meanings of the word) slave-dealer and kidnapper?

Well, sir, as to the other point on which these philanthropists are most sensitive—the treatment of the poor Indians; for their hearts seem to have two subdivisions—one for negroes, the other for Indians. Speak of the poor African, they are in paroxysms of charity; of the poor Indian, and their philanthropy is almost spasmodic; a most rare benevolence, which uses as its means murder and rapine; a charity which does its alms with money rifled from the pockets of others. What think you, sir, of Indian chiefs, ay, and women, too, taken prisoners in war, and shot or sold as slaves in the West Indies? What think you of wars of which the historian thus speaks with truly Spartan brevity—"the whole tribe was exterminated?" The Narragansetts, Mohegans, Pequods, Wampanoags—where are they? Exterminated! It is fitting—there is a beautiful propriety in the sons of those who exterminated them, setting up for philanthropists! as the exclusive friends of the Indians! What think you, sir, of a civilized and most religious soldiery, made up of men who had left their native land to indulge here, without restraint, a religion of peace, love, and charity, firing into the wigwams of squaws and children—enriching their sterile soil with the blood of women and children? What, sir, of rewards being offered by law for Indian scalps, indifferent (of course, for it could not be known) whether torn from the heads of warriors or women, of decrepid age or sleeping infancy? We of the South, who boast not of our humanity, have never gone farther than to offer rewards for the scalps of wolves—never for human scalps. The heart sickens, and human nature shudders at the picture. And from what history, I am asked, are these elegant extracts? From the history of the immediate descendants of the Pilgrims; and what may be deemed even a higher honor than that, they were thus descended, the ancestors of our present philanthropists—as Cornelia boasted more of being the mother of the Gracchi than the daughter of Scipio. It is no excuse to say that these colonies were then subject to Great Britain. The form of their government may have been in some particulars different, but these were the acts of the colonists themselves.*

I repeat, sir, that I congratulate the gentleman on the return of these humane feelings. I would, in all deference, recommend his people to beware lest the reaction may lead, as reactions are apt to do, to extremes. This spirit of philanthropy these good people may be unaccustomed to. Let them not drink of it too deeply at first. I take no special pleasure in these topics, but I am tired, sir, of defending, and I know of no better way defending than to attack.

* Extracts from Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts—account of the Pequod war.

"The Indians soon climbed to the top of the palisades to avoid the fire, and so exposed themselves to the English bullets; others forced their way out of the fort, and if any of them broke through the English, the allied Indians were in a ring at some distance, so that few, if any, escaped. There were 60 or 70 wigwams, and it was imagined four or five hundred Pequods, men, women, and children. Few, if any, escaped."—1 vol. page 78.

"The Indians in alliance with the English (i. e. Colonists) had taken 11 males and eight females; four of the males were disposed of, one to each of our Sachems, the rest put to the sword. Four of the females were left at the fort—the other four carried to Connecticut, where the Indians challenged them as their prize; they were sacrificed to end the dispute. 79. Many of the captives were sent to Bermuda and sold for slaves. The Pequod tribe was wholly extinguished." 80.

All these atrocities were perpetrated in the name of God, and to do him service. Hear E. G. "That it was evident that God had chosen New England to plant his people in, and that it would be displeasing unto him that his work should be hindered." In the account of the war with the Narragansetts this is found: "They began to fire the wigwams—in many of them the Indian women and children perished." 298.

The termination of Philip's war.—"A great many of the chiefs were executed at Boston and Plymouth, and most of the rest were sold and shipped off for slaves to Bermuda, and other parts."—307.

"The hand of the great Philip, a hero and patriot, was cut off; and" says the historian, "produced a handsome penny, many having a curiosity to see it." "The ruling passions strong in war as in death."

"The Government increased the premium for Indian scalps and captives to one hundred pounds. This encouraged John Lovewell to raise a company of volunteers to go out upon an Indian hunting. January 5th, he brought to Boston a captive and a scalp. Going out a second time, he discovered ten Indians round a fire, all asleep; he ordered part of his company to fire, who killed three; the other seven, as they were rising up, were sent to rest again by the other part of the company. The scalps were brought to Boston."

"Being shipped by the Indians in one of these Indian hunts," the historian says, "this misfortune discouraged Indian huntings."

* Freedom of opinion and of speech, and sympathies with the Indian and African are the three great topics of New England cant of the present day. How long has it been thus, vide the following extracts from Neal's History of New England; to say nothing of that glorious act for securing the freedom of opinion and the press, the sedition law, which had the united support of New England.

Specie Circular—Mr. Crittenden.

Senate.

I commend the chalice to the lips of gentlemen themselves, and desire that they should realize, by actual experience, how pleasant it is. If there is any thing which is calculated to wound gentlemen, it is the truth of history which offends, and not I who have referred to it.

[Mr. ADAMS inquired whether Mr. THOMPSON still adhered to the opinions heretofore expressed by him, which follow:]

"Does the gentleman, even in the latitude which he gives to the right of petition, think that it includes slaves? If he does not, he has wilfully violated the rules of the House and the feelings of its members. Does that gentleman know that there are laws in all the slave States, and here, for the punishment of those who excite insurrection? I can tell him that there are such things as grand juries; and if, sir, the juries of this District have, as I doubt not they have, proper intelligence and spirit, he may yet be made amenable to another tribunal, and we may yet see an incendiary brought to condign punishment."

Mr. T. replied, as to the first: When those remarks were made, I did not believe that there could be any man who entertained the opinion that slaves have the right of petitioning. The gentleman has since avowed that most extraordinary opinion. He had not, however, done so before my remarks were made. An opinion so extraordinary, that I could not have supposed he entertained it on any other authority than his own declaration. As to the second, I have only to say, that when I spoke of the liability of the gentleman to a criminal prosecution, I understood (and it was the fault of the gentleman himself that I so understood it) that it was an abolition petition. As it was not, the remarks have no application to him. If it had been, the expressions used by me were just, and well deserved; and I repeat the opinion, as broadly as it is there expressed, that the presentation of a petition for abolition may furnish sufficient evidence of correspondence and conspiracy with slaves to incur the penalties of the laws against those who excite insurrection. Not for the act done in the House, but for the evidence which the act in the House furnishes of a crime committed out of the House; a crime perfected before the member takes his seat. I find a man in my kitchen urging my slaves to sign a petition denouncing me as an oppressor and tyrant, and asserting that slavery is a violation of the rights of man and the laws of his Creator. What stronger incentive to insurrection? Would the fact of his being a member of Congress give him impunity? Suppose he acknowledges on the floor that he had done this with the purpose of exciting insurrection; or suppose he does some equivalent act, or uses words which equally establish it—may it not be used as evidence? Suppose a member voluntarily to acknowledge on the floor that he had killed a man—may this not be given in evidence? Suppose a member to denounce another in debate as a traitor, and to say that he will give five hundred dollars to any one who will assassinate him—the member thus denounced is assassinated by a bravo in the rotunda, who demands the reward—is this act to pass with impunity because the guilt of accessory consisted of words spoken in debate, though not the less clearly the guilt of an accessory? What is the object of the provision of the Constitution? The great privilege of the freedom of debate? Surely not impunity for crimes. Surely nothing could be more revolting than to contend that the criminal laws of the land may be violated, if done by a member of Congress in his seat. And the denial of my position leads to that. The gentleman puts the case of a member being brought before a grand jury for denouncing the President. Would the gentleman say that would be a violation of any criminal law of the land? Unless he can, the case is not parallel, and the gentleman knows it. If, however, it can answer him any purpose, he is perfectly at liberty to pervert my argument.

I shall continue, as I have done, to denounce the many flagrant and atrocious usurpations of this Government without fear of criminal prosecution; and I venture to say, that if the honorable member from Massachusetts regards the cases as parallel, no other human being does. But in what scorn would he not deserve and receive who should attempt to screen himself behind his privileges from the penalties of the criminal laws of the land? to interpose the privilege of a member of Congress between a felon and the gibbet—a privilege intended to secure perfect freedom of thought and of speech, claimed as an immunity for crimes? The moral guilt would be the same, and the same, I trust, would also be the infamy of the act and the penalties of the law.

SPECIE CIRCULAR.

SPEECH OF MR. CRITTENDEN, OF KENTUCKY.

[As reported by the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, Tuesday, December 23, 1836.—The Senate having proceeded to the order of the day, which was the consideration of the following resolutions, heretofore moved by Mr. EWING, of Ohio:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the Treasury order of the eleventh day of July, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, &c., and the same is hereby rescinded.

Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, who had the floor, having moved the adjournment yesterday, yielded it to Mr. BENTON, who read several extracts, to which he had referred in his speech of yesterday. Having concluded, he restored the floor to

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The opening of Mr. C's speech was in so low a tone as to be totally inaudible to our reporter. As soon as he was distinctly heard, he was observing that the Senate had been complained of by the Senator from Missouri, not only for having been tardy in its appropriations of money for the public service, at its last session, but for not having appropriated enough. The Senate had voted appropriations to the amount of thirty-eight millions, but this was complained of as scanty measure, and the Chamber had been gravely rebuked for not having done much more. Now, Mr. C. was very ready to take his share, and the share of any other gentleman who was tired of it, in the reproaches of the honorable Senator for an open opposition to a portion of this appropriation, and he should have considered himself fortunate had he and his friends been so far successful as to have defeated them. So far from regretting or being ashamed of the opposition he had made to this lavish expenditure of money, he took it to himself as a merit; so that if the design of the honorable Senator, in his exhortation and reproaches, had been to excite repentance, the homily had entirely failed.

But the more immediate subject before the Senate was the Treasury order, which it was proposed by his friend from Ohio to rescind, and to this he should endeavor to confine himself. The subject had been debated by the Senator from Missouri with all that zeal and ability which usually characterized the efforts of that gentleman. Nor had Mr. C. any difficulty in readily excusing even a more than ordinary measure of zeal in that Senator on this occasion; for he thought, from a variety of facts, pregnant with circumstantial evidence, that he could very clearly see the true and genuine paternity of the order in question. He could not but believe that its descent from the honorable Senator might be as correctly traced as could be done in any other case of genealogy.

On the 22d of April last, the honorable Senator had submitted a resolution that from and after the ——— day of ——— nothing but gold and silver should be received in payment for the public lands; and that the appropriate committee should report a bill to that effect. The subject was resumed on the following day, and by a vote of the Senate was laid upon the table. In that inglorious repose it had remained by general consent. It was permitted to sleep in a silence which amounted to the most unequivocal condemnation of the measure. This body then did condemn, as far as it could in such a mode, the very thing contained in this Treasury order; the author of the resolution being among the few, the very few advocates who voted in its favor. But no sooner had Congress adjourned, than, on the 11th of July, the very measure, in regard to which the Senate had expressed its decided opinion in the negative, was wrought up into the form of a Treasury order, surrounded, indeed, and embellished with sundry arguments directed against land speculators, and in favor of occupants or squatters. The very proposition, which was rejected by Congress in April, was enforced as a Treasury order in July. Who could have any difficulty in tracing the origin of the order to the rejected resolution? No sooner had the Senate condemned and rejected it, than it was instantly taken up in an Executive Department, and made to possess as complete effect as if the same thing had been done by the very law which the Senate refused to enact. Mr. C. would not, on this occasion, allude to another exertion of Executive authority, the circumstances of which very strikingly resembled the present case; when Congress, just before its adjournment, had declared the public money to be safe in the keeping of the Bank of the United States, but had no sooner adjourned than that very money was seized upon by the Executive authority, and transferred to the deposite banks. In both cases, the Executive authority had been made to supply the place of the Legislature. The eloquent Senator from Missouri had, in one clause of his speech, invoked the genius of the Constitution. Now, supposing that genius would come at the gentleman's bidding, would it pronounce a proceeding like this to be in conformity with that instrument? Were not the members of that and of the other House competent to decide on questions of the currency—questions which deeply affected all their constituents, far and wide? Did it not belong to Congress to settle such questions? And did not the duty of the Executive consist in carrying into effect that which Congress in its wisdom might ordain? But here that which Congress disapproved and refused to enact, is immediately carried into effect by the Executive, without any other legislative authority or sanction than the professed opinions of the Senator from Missouri. Mr. C. objected not only to the measure itself, but to the time and manner of its enforcement. Even were the thing itself not in violation of law and the Constitution, still the time and the manner in which it was done were derogatory to the dignity, judgment, and authority of Congress. What was the time which had intervened between the rejection of the resolution and the enactment of the order? It was the brief space between the close of April and the 11th of July. What great change had occurred within that time to justify such a measure? Mr. C. would, therefore, be in favor of rescinding the order, were it on no other ground than that of vindicating the Senate from the disrespect that seemed to him to have been offered to it by that proceeding.

But there were other more decided objections to a measure of this character, two of which he would distinctly specify. The first was, that it made an unlawful discrimination between different classes of American citizens; and, secondly, it made an equally unjust discrimination between debtors for the public lands and all other debtors to the Government. First, it made a personal distinction between citizens of the United States; gold and silver was demanded of all purchasers of the public domain, unless they were actual settlers of the land they wished to purchase, or bona fide residents of the State within which the lands lay. Here was a personal distinction, grounded merely on place of residence. A particular species of currency was exacted from the one class, while another less valued species was accepted from the other class. Could this be done? Was it consistent with equity? With equal rights of American citizens? The public domain was the common property of the whole people; and now did the resident of Illinois, or Ohio, or of Indiana become possessed of higher rights in the purchase of it than you or I? Why was he entitled to easement in the manner of making his payments? Where was the law or the Constitution giving him such a right? Where could it be found? Nowhere.

But it had been said that the discrimination was the same which had been made by various acts of Congress in favor of actual settlers; and Mr. C. would not contest that fact. But suppose it to be conceded that Congress did possess the right, and I considered it good policy to make a discrimination in favor of settlers, by yielding them a priority in the purchase of the tracts they had cultivated, how far would this go in advancing the gentleman's conclusion? Because Congress had power to do this, did it follow that the Executive had power to do it? Who ever heard of the Executive setting up a claim of authority to fix the price of the public lands, or what was equivalent, to determine in what species of currency the land should be paid for? In what sense could this be regarded as an Executive power? It was his place to execute the laws, but it belonged to Congress to judge what the laws should be.

Mr. C. said it had been argued that the laws authorized the receivers at the land offices to receive nothing but gold and silver, and that this order only carried the law into effect. Such an argument did, indeed, admit the authority of the law; but how did it bear upon the order? If the law required payment in gold and silver for the public land, how could it be dispensed with, as it was, by the order, in regard to citizens residing within the States wherein the land lay? There was no dispensing power conferred to the Executive to set aside the law, and no discretionary authority to make a difference between citizens equal before the law. The public lands were common property, which all had a right to buy on the equal terms prescribed by law, and the Secretary of the Treasury had no more right to assign different modes of payment to different classes of citizens, than he had to give more lands to one and less to another for the same money. In this view the order was altogether illegal.

But again: On what principle of justice was one class of debtors required to pay their debts in gold and silver, and another class in what was deemed by the Government less valuable? With accuracy we may be stated at forty millions of dollars; one-half paid in the West, for the purchase of public lands; the other half in the East, for duties and imports. What right had the Executive to declare that the Western half should be exacted in gold and silver, but that the Eastern half might be paid in bank paper? The arbitrary inequality and injustice of such a regulation would be clear to every understanding. Mr. C. could not be content under a discrimination so invidious and offensive. What must be the effect upon the West of continuing such an order in force? The money was collected by the land offices, and thence poured into the banks, but it was not expended in the West. The great objects of public expenditure, as every one knows, were on the Atlantic seaboard. It was there that the colossal palaces, under the name of custom-houses, were to be found. It was there that fortifications reared their formidable front, and bristled from point to point along the whole coast. It was there that all the great expenditures for the navy were to be made. If the money derived from the sale of the public lands were to be applied to the ordinary expenditures of the Government, then this mass of specie which was collected in the West was to be transported from year to year to the Atlantic States, and it could not be otherwise. The millions derived from the sale of the public lands could not be expended in the West, and therefore there would be a perpetual drain of specie out of the Western into the Eastern States. The people of the West could not be insensible to these results, or otherwise than justly indignant at a measure marked with invidious distinctions, which permitted their Eastern brethren to pay their debts to Government in the ordinary medium of business, but compelled them to pay in gold and silver.

When the knowledge of this order first reached the place of Mr. C's residence, the objections which he had stated had suggested themselves to his mind on the first perusal; but he had at that time no apprehension that the effects to be produced on the currency and business of the country were likely to be so extensive. If, as it appeared, the object of the order was the accumulation of specie in the banks, he doubted not that there would be a thousand ways devised to evade and defeat it. He thought that the same thousand dollars, by being made to travel backward and forward between the bank and the land office, might be made to purchase land enough to satisfy the desires of any number of buyers. Mr. C. spoke on this subject from information and conjecture, having had no personal experience. He had never attended a land sale in his life, and knew nothing of the arts employed, but it was not probable to suppose that men who were much engaged in business of this kind would become expert in availing themselves of every advantage in conducting it. But he had also thought that, on this side of the mountains, it would be easier to evade the order than on the other; for there was a proviso which admitted a certificate of deposit in the Treasury to be received in the place of cash. This, he supposed, would obviate the transportation of specie to the West, and would require it only to be carried to Washington, in which there would be no great difficulty; but he had since understood that a mode had been devised still more convenient. The intended purchasers would obtain drafts on the Bank of the Metropolis. They would present these drafts at the counter, and the question was asked, do you want hard money? Yes—I want to buy land. The matter was easily managed. A certain amount of silver was put into a little keg, and this was put into a wheelbarrow and carried across the street to the Treasury, where the requisite certificate was granted of so much money deposited in the Treasury. The keg was then wheeled back to bank, and this had been repeated until it became a matter of open ridicule among the subalterns of the Treasury. This little barrel had been rolled backward and forward from the bank to the Treasury and from the Treasury to the bank, a distance of not more than fifty yards, until, according to a calculation which had been made, it had travelled about 1,100 miles, and this was the boasted metallic circulation. This process did but exemplify, to a considerable extent, the operation of this Treasury order over the whole country. But, allowing for all these evasions, this order undoubtedly has, and must continue to occasion large sums of gold and silver to be temporarily withdrawn from general circulation, and paid into the land offices. From these offices it is transferred to the deposite banks—is there subjected to the ordinary banking uses and purposes, and serves to strengthen and fatten these corporations, to the prejudice of the general circulation, and of those banks from which that gold and silver has been withdrawn. To compensate for these evils, and this derangement of the currency, what adequate good has or can be produced by this order? I cannot perceive it—it appears visionary to me to suppose that it will add a single dollar to the amount of the specie of the United States.

But, sir, the direct operation of this order has not, probably, been more injurious, or, perhaps, so much so, as its indirect consequences in producing distrust and alarm. When the Treasury raises its mighty arm, the banks are shaken far and wide. The sudden call for gold and silver, made by this order, aided by some other causes, rendered the banks, to some extent, uneasy, and created apprehensions in the minds of the holders of their notes. The consequence was that these holders pressed the banks for payment; the banks pressed their debtors, and withheld their customary accommodations; and thus, sir, derangement and pressure were more severely and widely extended. Such, I know, has been the case in Kentucky to a considerable extent.

The Senator from Missouri had exhibited a table, the results of which he had pressed with a very triumphant air. Was it extraordinary that the deposite banks should be strengthened? The effect of the order went directly to sustain them. But it was at the expense of all the other banks of the country. Under this order all the specie was collected and carried into their vaults, an operation which went to disturb and embarrass the general circulation of the country, and to produce that pecuniary difficulty which was felt in all quarters of the Union. Mr. C. did not profess to be competent to judge how far the whole of this distress was attributable to the operation of the Treasury order, but of this at least he was very sure, through a great part of the Western country it was universally attributed to that cause. The Senator from Missouri supposed that the order had produced no part of this pressure. If not, he would ask what it had produced? Had it increased the specie in the country? Had it increased the specie in actual and general circulation? If it had done so, what good had it done? This, he believed, was yet undiscovered. So far as it had operated at all, it had been to derange the state of the currency, and to give it a direction inverse to the course of business. The honorable Senator, however, could not see how moving money across a street could operate to affect the currency; and seemed to suppose that moving money from west to east, or from east to west, would have as little effect. Money, however, if left to itself, would always move according to the ordinary course of business transactions. This course might indeed be disturbed for a time, but it would be like forcing the needle away from the pole; you might turn it round and round as often as you pleased, but, left to itself, it would still settle at the north. Our great commercial cities were the natural repositories where money centred and settled. There it was wanted, and it was more valuable if left there than if carried into the interior. Any intelligent business man in the West would rather have money paid him for a debt in New York than at his own door. It was worth more to him. If, then, specie was forced, by Treasury tactics, to take a direction contrary to the natural course of business, and to move from East to West, the operation would be beneficial to none, injurious to all. It was not in the power of the Government to keep it in a false direction or position. Specie was in exile whenever it was forced out of that place where business called for it. Such an operation did no real good. It was a forced movement, and was soon overcome by the natural course of things.

Mr. C. was well aware that men might be deluded and mystified on this subject, and that, while the delusion lasted, this Treasury order might be held up before the eyes of men as a splendid arrangement in finance; but it was only like the natural rainbow, which owed its very existence to the mist in which it had its being. The moment the atmosphere was clear, its bright colors vanished from the view. So it would be with this matter. The specie of the country must resume its natural course. Men might as well escape from the physical necessities of their nature, as from the laws which governed the movements of finance; and the man who professed to reverse or to dispense with the one was no greater quick than he who made the same professions with regard to the other.

But it was said to be the distribution bill which had done all the mischief, and Mr. C. was ready to admit that the manner in which the Government had attempted to carry that law into effect might in part have furnished the basis for such a supposition. He had no doubt that the pecuniary evils of the country had been aggravated by the manner in which this had been done. On this subject, however, he confessed himself to be but a learner. He had no doubt that the Government might so have distributed the money as to avoid all injurious consequences, and might have so managed the operation that the transmission of these funds, instead of occasioning injury or inconvenience, might rather have increased the prosperity of the country by falling in with the natural and legitimate course of business. But this had been passed by, and the Government had proceeded, like a porter or drayman, to carry the public money from one quarter of the country to the other. Thus, millions of specie had been carried from New York to Kentucky; but the people of Kentucky would have preferred that it should have remained in New York, for there they might have disposed of it at a premium of one or two per cent. This would have fallen in with the course of business, and have been beneficial to the country. But, as it was, the effect was the reverse.

But, sir, according to the honorable Senator from Missouri, all the evil which was not the effect of the distribution law was the effect of a panic, "a little starveling panic no bigger than a church mouse;" a panic which was now over; which, contemptible as it was, had enjoyed the distinguished honor of dying by the hand of that Senator, and meeting its end, like Caesar, in the Capitol. And was this all the comfort which the gentleman had to give under the pressures and distresses of the commercial interest? Mr. C. did not presume to set himself up as a competent judge of mercantile affairs. There were other gentlemen that floor who far better understood the interest of that meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, and who would speak on the subject in due time. But if there was any truth in the representations universally given, there was an extreme pressure now felt in all our great cities, from Boston to New Orleans, the effect of which was rapidly spreading through the interior. What was the cause of this embarrassment? The gentleman said it was this little panic. Well, but what was the cause of the panic? Who made it? What caused it? Was it not the Treasury order? The Senator loved the order well, but not the panic; and all the remedy he could propose was to let the sufferer it is but a panic, a contemptible little panic, a petty starveling panic; the country is sound, the country is safe. Sir, of what invaluable use has been that little word? It has furnished its full contribution to the beauty and the force of many a ponderous and patriotic argument of the Senator from Missouri. It has given point to many a sentence; it has helped to round off many a sonorous period. It has wielded it like some well-tried and favorite weapon, and has displayed great skill in its use. It seems there have been three great panics, which the gentleman has noted like so many eras of the plague. Whatever may be the national misfortune, and how loudly soever it may call for a remedy, when legislative wisdom can furnish none other, it is a sufficient remedy to cry panic, panic. Sir, it is a senatorial specific, a ready panacea for all the evils of the body politic. Yes, sir, this is gold. Your statesmanship goes no farther. Tell the people it is a panic, and let them understand that all the enemies of General Jackson's administration have united by common consent to get it up and keep it up. A legislator will thus feel that he has fully discharged his duty to the country and to his constituents when he has duly vociferated panic, panic. Two per cent. a month is given for a penny, and it is all panic, panic.

A justification for this illegal Treasury order is further attempted, by telling us that there are in the country one thousand banks, and that it is the design of this resolution to fasten on the country an odious paper system, and to pay for the public domain in the rotten and worthless notes of one thousand banks. To this the honorable Senator is opposed. So are we all. But he seems to think that all are not opposed to it; and he has traced down, from the days of Hamilton, the existence of a great and formidable party which hates gold and silver; and if I correctly understand how I must take my place in this division of parties, I must be one of those who hate gold and silver. Now, permit me to assure the honorable Senator that I partake at least so much of mortal mould as that gold and silver coin are not among the objects of my antipathy. These "fascinated counters" do not indeed express my affections, but they are very far from being odious to me. No very serious defence or reply, however, would seem to be necessary to the strange and exaggerated accusation of hating gold and silver. If, as I suppose, the honorable gentleman intended to apply that accusation to his political opponents here, I would suggest to him that he would probably do them no disservice if he would please to make good his charge, by convincing the public that they have no love for these precious metals. It would certainly place them in striking contrast with the party of the honorable Senator; and what he imputes as a crime, might possibly be regarded as a recommendation. The love of gold and silver has so much prevailed as the vice of political parties, and been the cause of so much abuse and corruption in governments, that probably the people of the United States might be tempted to make the experiment of administering their Government by a new set of agents or rulers, taken from this newly discovered sect of money-hating politicians—the first party of that description, I think, which has yet appeared in the world. But, sir, however this may eventuate, I ought, perhaps, to admit, whatever be its merit or demerit, that the party of the honorable Senator do love gold and silver better than their opponents. That party has been long blessed with opportunities of manifesting this attachment, and it has not neglected them. Its long and strict monopoly of the public Treasury, with all its shining heaps, and the manner in which it has used that monopoly, sufficiently attest its affection for the precious metals. Indulgence, too, may have increased this passion; for it is exactly one of those cases where "increase of appetite doth grow by that it feeds on."

On the other hand, sir, the opponents of this party have been so long excluded from all these opportunities and indulgences, that they are supposed, it seems, to have lost the natural taste, and, as if in mockery, are denominated as "haters of gold and silver." I know of no better grounds on which the honorable Senator can rest his accusation, nor does any reply occur to me better suited to its ludicrous gravity.

But now, sir, seeing that the honorable Senator is of that party which loves so well the constitutional currency, let me ask him what his love will prompt him to do? This Treasury order, it seems, is not the ultimate scope and aim of his attempts. What is it he would wish for? Is it to destroy all banks? Is it to annihilate the entire paper system, and give us in place of it showers of gold and showers of silver? Why, sir, if the fiat of that gentleman could annihilate at a blow all the bank notes in the country, does he really believe that the business of this community could be carried on without them? Sir, to attempt to transact the affairs of the American community by a medium of gold and silver coin, would be little better than going back to the old Spartan expedient of bars of iron.

But from what does the Senator infer that the party to which he is opposed hate, or at least are opposed to, gold and silver? Is the party which advocated the Bank of the United States the party which is in love with the paper system? That is his argument. But what was one of the chief grounds on which they advocated that bank? Was it not that its influence went to maintain a solid currency, convertible into gold and silver? Was it not that, by means of its central situation and extensive control, it would check excesses of local banks? So far from being opposed to gold and silver, it was the object of that party to keep up a circulation both of hard money and good paper, and secure to the country the advantages of both. And now, can we advance an argument in this House on the subject of the currency, without coming under some reproach about the Bank of the United States? You have put down that institution, which actually accomplished all that this order professes to aim at, and now just what we predicted is daily coming to pass. State banks are springing up like mushrooms in all parts of the country, and that under the patronage of the Government, and according to its earnest wishes. And these constitute a part of the thousand banks which figure so largely in the speech of the honorable Senator. Is not this the very effect which we told you would follow the destruction of the Bank of the United States? If you are flooded with banks, and the paper of some of them is of doubtful credit, is it the fault of those who did their best to preserve that which would have kept down these spurious issues? What can be more unjust than to charge us with loving this state of things? But is it not even ludicrous to contrast what has actually happened with the predictions of the party opposed to us, and to which the Senator belongs? They told us that the State banks would give us a better currency. The Executive messages, year after year, gave us the most solemn assurances that the State banks would fully supply the place of the Bank of the United States; that no distress would be the result, but that we should have a better currency. Behold the consummation of these prophecies. Do not the prophets stand in a position perfectly ludicrous? Are the notes of these thousand banks a better currency than the notes of the Bank of the United States? If they are, then why not receive them for the public lands? Did any man doubt the solvency of the Bank of the United States, or the goodness of its notes? You destroyed that bank. Your better currency is come in the place of it; we bring it to your own doors, and you spurn it. We offer it to you, and you reply, "What convert the public lands into realms of spoiled and speckled paper, called money?" Thus scorned, thus kooted at, is that very currency which you told us was to be better than the notes of the United States Bank; and because we prophesied such a currency, and labored to prevent its coming upon the country, we are now to be called haters of gold and silver!

We too, sir, are opposed to converting the public lands into worthless bank notes. But we supposed that, dubious as the credit of many of these banks is justly considered, some of them are good, and that the notes of these should be received from the people, without running into the sudden and inconvenient extreme of rejecting every thing but gold and silver; a measure, the more harsh in its operation and character, because of its being the unexpected act of an administration that, up to that very instant, had encouraged the circulation of these bank notes by proclaiming it to be a "better currency" than that which had been furnished by the Bank of the United States.

But the Senator tells us that the object of this resolution is twofold. Its prime object is to disgrace General Jackson, and he second, which is little inferior in importance, is to overthrow the national currency. These are the two revolutionary consequences which the Senator supposes to be aimed at by my friend from Ohio. For myself, I can with great truth say that I am actuated in this matter only by my view of the good or bad policy of the Treasury order, disconnected entirely from all personal feeling toward General Jackson. I have no more personal feeling against him on this subject, than I have against you, sir. Would you consider it an impeachment on your integrity for a gentleman to differ from you as to the policy of a political measure? Surely not. Why then should the Senator suppose that a motion to rescind this Treasury order must be intended to dishonor General Jackson? Sir, I object wholly to this introduction of Presidential influence into debate on this floor. Is it becoming in us to say one to another, you must do this or that, lest the President should feel himself degraded? Is this a fit weapon to be wielded in this house? The Senator from Missouri, from the intimacy he is supposed to enjoy with the President, may be considered as speaking with authority on such a subject. But may I, who am in some degree excluded from the Presidential smiles, attempt to carry a measure through the Senate by threatening the Presidential frown? May every little whisper wield this weapon over our heads? What is to be the influence of such threats? What is to be the end of such a system? What must its end be but to resolve all legislation into the will and wish of the Executive? The scope of such an argument would leave this Senate little more than a tame registry of Presidential edicts. The Government may retain the shadowy forms of republican freedom, but it will become in fact a stern, substantial monarchy. The phrase "degrade the President" is to be used as so many calumnious words; the moment they are uttered, the Senate is to be silenced. The President thinks a certain measure right, therefore we must think it right. I read that Philip of Macedon had but one eye, and he covered the place of the other with a patch. His influence in Greece, which had long been increasing, at length reached that point, that to court his favor the Grecian Senators appeared "with places with a patch over the left eye. [A laugh.] So I suppose it is to be with us. If the President on any occasion happens to do wrong, we are not to think or to speak on the subject, and must prefer to do injustice to ourselves, rather than run the risk of degrading the President.

I suppose I am to understand the Senator from Missouri, when he speaks of the "constitutional currency," to mean a currency of gold and silver. But the Constitution says nothing on the matter, save that the States shall pass no law making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender. That is all it contains on the subject. But I will here tell that gentleman that I do, to a great extent, agree with him in the picture he has drawn of a degraded paper currency, and I will very gladly contribute my mite to correct so great an evil. But I fear it is beyond our reach. The banks of which he complains hold their existence under State authority; and all our arguments amount to nothing more than mere idle speculation. You have no bank. You rejected that you had, and refused to make another. Is this Treasury order the mode in which you would correct the evils of excessive banking? Would you disorder and derange the whole currency of the country, in order that the banks may explode? For all the evils of the existing system, that gentleman and his party are fully chargeable. They put down that institution, which would have prevented the whole. They did it with the consequences plainly before their eyes—clearly shown, and distinctly foretold. They persevered, and those consequences have now come. From that act have grown up all these evils—evils which the Senator paints in glowing colors, but evils from all which I look forward in trembling hope to an ultimate deliverance. I entertain as great an apprehension of the danger of these thousand banks as he does; but it is a danger which the Treasury order will not remove. I am opposed to that measure, because it is not a competent remedy. Instead of mitigating, it aggravates the evil; and I therefore hope the resolution before us will receive the sanction of this body.

The gentleman is full of thanks to the President of the United States. Well, sir, I really have no idea that the President had in this matter any view or purpose hostile to the best interests of this country. I can readily imagine that his objects and his motives were of the most beneficent character. But, sir, where is the great occasion for this outpouring, this outbreathing of gratitude; so earnest, so sublime, that it approaches to adulation, nay, to positive adoration? I hope I am not insensible to the obligations of gratitude; but I have no idea that we are forever to be looking up to the President as a sort of demi-god, who has showered down benefits upon us, notwithstanding our ill deserts—benefits entirely supererogatory, and such as we had no right to expect or hope for. No, sir, I am willing to treat the President with due respect, and to acknowledge all his good deeds in such a manner as becomes an American citizen; further than this I am not disposed to go.

The Senator (said Mr. C.) in the peroration of his eloquent harangue, transported by the fervor of his victorious argument, regrets that there was not more talent and genius on the other side, over which he might prosecute still further conquests. He seems to lack something. Like the victorious Sarcena, who carried the true faith through the world on the point of his sword, or like Alexander, who called for more worlds to conquer, the honorable Senator, after having exulted in triumph over all that had been brought against him, calls out for more talent and more genius over which to pursue his conquering course. It is not, probably, in my power, sir, to contribute what is thus called for, to swell the gentleman's triumph; nor is it for me, sir, longer to keep the field when such champions are engaged.

(When Mr. C. had concluded, and taken his seat, Mr. Benton explained that his remarks on the want of talent, argument, &c. were not intended to apply to the actors in the Senate, but to those out of it, who, he supposed, had prepared the subject.)

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

SPEECH OF MR. PEYTON, OF TENNESSEE.

[As reported by Mr. Peyton for the Intelligencer.]

In House of Representatives, December 15, 1835.—Upon the resolution of Mr. WISE proposing a select committee of investigation, and Mr. PEACE's motion to amend the same.

MR. SPEAKER: I was, at first, somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) should be found in opposition to this investigation. That gentleman was once the zealous advocate of rigid scrutiny into all abuses committed by public functionaries. In an elaborate speech, upon this floor, he once sustained an investigation similar to the one now proposed by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise.) I allude to the case of the Wiscasset collector. But, sir, the gentleman announces the fact that he has changed. He was then opposed to General Jackson—violently and bitterly opposed to him—and he manifested that opposition in every conceivable way, and upon every subject that arose. But having now become a Jackson man, he has undergone, it seems, a complete political transformation. And what a change! his old principles discarded—his mental vision in total and disastrous eclipse, he has closed his eyes upon fraud, and speculation, and plunder!

But, sir, has it come to this, that the gentleman from Rhode Island is put forward as the champion of Andrew Jackson? Has that distinguished citizen already sunk so low that his fame and reputation are committed to the keeping of such hands? Oh, spectacle, mortifying and humiliating, to the honest friends and original supporters of Andrew Jackson! those who fought with him, and voted for him! who advocated his first election upon principle, and who, unlike the gentleman, yet stand up the dauntless advocates of the same principles! What must they think, how must they feel, when they are informed that the President's reputation as a statesman has fallen into the custody of that gentleman, who, formerly a violent, boisterous and detested assailant, has thrown himself into the current of the President's popularity, strong enough to bear even him along, and is now become his pretended friend, his defender and defender?

But, sir, to the gentleman's objections, or rather his pretended objections, to the proposed inquiry. He has given a striking specimen of the cunning and tact of the sect to which he belongs by the issue which he has made up—a false, hypocritical issue. What is it? Why, forsooth, that it involves the President's veracity! that it will be, does the President speak the truth when he says that all the officers are "honest" as well as capable and that he, good tender-hearted man, cannot endure to hear any thing which infringes, in the slightest degree, upon the veracity of that high functionary. Under this false and fraudulent issue the gentleman takes shelter, and expects to escape all inquiry, all investigation. Is argument required to expose a position so monstrous! Will not every high-minded man in this nation look upon it with scorn and indignation? Sir, I deny and denounce this as that false issue which has so long been the shield of the party, and behind which they always skulk at the slightest approach of danger. The President says that they are honest, and the gentleman says you are not to prove them to be rogues, because that would be to make out the President a liar. What a position!

Did the President write the paragraph in his message, laudatory of these officers, which the gentleman himself admits is unusual in such a document, and which, I am sure, has no precedent or parallel? No, sir, not one word of it, and he does not know, at this moment, that it is there. What is it, sir, which these gentlemen, so able and so honest, have introduced into the message, and now claim that it is evidence of so high and sacred a nature that it cannot be examined or impeached? Here it is:

"Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various Executive Departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation."

Did Andrew Jackson write this sweeping certificate of moral character for these gentlemen? No, sir, no. I plead non est factum. It is not his deed. They have fraudulently smuggled it into his message, to evade scrutiny into their conduct. Instead of suffering inquiry, it is of itself a cause of suspicion. I say, sir, that the President did not write it in support of which avowal I have evidence satisfactory, at least, to my own mind, and such as should be made known to this House, to the country at large, and to posterity. It should thus be made known, in order to shield the name and fame of the President from that imputation which, in all time to come, would attach to them, in consequence of this flagrant abuse of the confidence reposed by him in others. The committee on the part of the Senate, which, according to usage, was appointed to wait upon the President at the commencement of the session, and inform him of the readiness of Congress to receive the very message in question, found him extended on a sick couch, scarcely able to raise his hand. On the eve of their departure, he urged the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) to come back soon, and talk with him; that he was homesick, wanted company, and wished to have his friends about him. The Senator (alas, that it should be necessary for him to invoke the attendance of friends, and of such friends) did return, and remained with the President more than an hour, during which time he never alluded to the subject of politics. He spoke of dying, of the Hermitage, of his hope that he might be spared till he could reach it in the spring. His thoughts were with his heart, "and that was far away," dwelling upon other, and doubtless, holier meditations, than writing eulogies upon public functionaries, whose conduct he was in no position to examine, and who, if they were honest, needed not his testimony to the fact.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island has another objection to the mode of proceeding proposed by my friend from Virginia. He says that it is unnecessary, because, by the standing Rules of the House, the investigation into all such matters is enjoined, as a duty, upon the Committee of Ways and Means. The rule alluded to by the gentleman reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House, &c. &c. to examine into the state of the several public debt, accounts, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers." And yet the gentleman, in a subsequent part of his argument, contended that the exercise, by the House, of such a power as is hereby enjoined upon one of its standing committees, would be a disfranchisement of the heads of departments! An ex parte trial and conviction according to the rules of the common law! The rule referred to by the gentleman, shows the sense entertained by the House in relation to the necessity of such investigations as the one proposed into the state and condition of the several departments, with a view to the rigid accountability of public officers, and the legal disbursement of the public moneys.

But, sir, is the Committee of Ways and Means the appropriate committee to make such examinations? Look at the past. How long have our players of malversation in office been ringing in the ears of gentlemen? Look at the formation of that committee. Its chairman (Mr. Cambreleng) labors under a political, if not a legal, disability to institute and conduct them with efficiency. Dare he move in such a cause? No, sir; he would seal his fate for ever. But, if that committee were forced by the House into the investigation, with what hope of success could we rely upon it? The head of each Department would hand over to the chairman of that committee such a statement as he might choose to send here.

Why, sir, it would be like the trial of Reuben Whitney. Reuben has been tried, and, as you will be glad to hear, acquitted, since the last session. But how tried? Not by a committee of this House? No, sir, he was tried on the other side of the Alleghenies, while the witnesses and the prosecutor were a thousand miles off. He was tried at Jonesborough, Tennessee, before the President of the United States; the prosecutor not my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) but one John Kennedy, who prosecuted Reuben so handsomely, that he has since been rewarded by an appointment. Reuben was arraigned before the President in a large crowd, the charges against him so drawn up that they could all be answered in his favor without touching the true issues which involve his guilt or innocence. They, in effect, asked the President—Is Reuben a sinner, or is he a sinner? "He is a persecuted patriot, sir, persecuted on account of his opposition to the United States Bank." "There!" said they, "do you hear that?" and the shout, hurra for Reuben was loud and long. But, sir, the gentleman chose to wander from the subject before the House, and cry this political war into Tennessee. This is contrary to the policy of his State during the late war with Great Britain. She then had a higher regard for State lines and State sovereignty; her patriotism was only commensurate with her small limits.

He represents the President as going to the Hermitage on private business, and seems to justify all which his party attempt to ascribe by the President's visit to Tennessee. A private visit to the Hermitage! They scarcely gave him time to shake hands with the old family servants at the Hermitage. He was hurried from place to place, dragged along through dust and heat to public meetings, at towns and villages, and cross roads, and country stores, carried through Tennessee and Alabama, brought back and taken through Kentucky, by the way of Cincinnati, to Washington. The friends of Mr. Van Buren resorted to every art to excite and induce him to make an active part in the election; and they now talk of a private visit to the Hermitage! Sir, I was told this morning, as I entered the Capitol, that some one of the members from Tennessee denied certain facts which had been made. But, if true, I hope, sir, that no such gentleman, and maintain the truth of those facts any where. The President assured me for the course which he said I had pursued in relation to the bill which contained the appropriation to carry into effect the Che-roltee treaty, before he left the city, which complaint he frequently repeated on his way to the Hermitage. At Knoxville, a gentleman produced the Globe newspaper, which showed that I had voted and spoken in support of that measure. But it had no effect; for he continued to speak of it as he had done before. At Sparta, he denounced my friend from Virginia (Mr. Wise) as a liar. At the house of Mrs. Saunders, in Sumner county, Tennessee, he stated that my colleague (Mr. Bell) "told twenty times in one speech, and knew them to be lies at the time;" and that Peyton was a greater liar than Bell. In passing through the district of my colleague, (Mr. Forrester,) his very able speech at the last session of Congress having been mentioned, the President stated "that any man could get as good a speech as that written at Washington for five dollars." When asked how Mr. Huntman was, in relation to political parties, "He's on the fence," said the General, "and no one knows which side he will fall." The constituents of another one of my colleagues inquired, "Well, General, what do you think of our representative, Mr. Shickels?" "Oh!" said he, "he's of no account, sir, no account; turn him out, and send some one in his place who is of some account." I have repeated these things, sir, not on account of any pleasure they afford me, but because those very gentlemen who were the cause of these exhibitions are now denying them. Let any man deny this statement who dare.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island calls upon us to take "the bull by the horns," to "move an impeachment against the President at once!"—says that "he is accountable for the acts of his ministers, and any attack upon them is in effect an impeachment of him." This is strange doctrine to me, sir. We wish to rone these calves, and drag them bleating as they go from the Treasury, for they have been sucking too long already; and the gentleman says no, "take the bull by the horns." Move an impeachment against the President, indeed! He accountable, criminally accountable for the want of integrity on the part of his ministers! Was there ever any thing more impudent than this? Because General Jackson is a patriot, does it follow that Reuben M. Whitney is any thing but what the world knows him to be? Because General Jackson is an honest man, does it follow that Amos Kendall, and all the other hirelings, as he calls them, are honest too? This, sir, is the doctrine of the party—the doctrine of men into whose hands the government of the country has fallen. But, sir, the gentleman, in thus shuffling himself under the protecting mantle of the President, but displays the usual tact of the party to which he belongs. They are all patriots, if the President be a patriot. They are all honest men, if the President be an honest man. Sir, let me put a case in common life to illustrate this doctrine: one which every farmer will understand. Take any man of seventy years of age, put him on a farm with sixty hands to control, give him a full crop, corn, tobacco, and small grains; can he abuse them either in part of the crop will suffer? Suppose his fences are leaky and rough, that they are detected mauling the property of night, taken with their pigs and chickens, their chickens and potatoes, upon them, could they plead the virtues of their master as a justification of their crimes? Could you not lynch them without awaiting of their crimes? There is no man amongst them who can stand one moment upon his own merits. No, sir, they have crowded and huddled together under the mantle of General Jackson, until that is not broad enough to cover them; they have worn it threadbare, stretched and torn it into tatters. You may occasionally get a glimpse of Van's bald pate popped out here, Amos's sharp face there, Felix's red eyes yonder, Blair's shank at one place, and Reuben's pockets filled with Treasury receipts at another; and now, sir, we have the gentleman from Rhode Island squealing around like an odd pig, for whom there is no ear, hounding a peace to crawl in at. Now, sir, what I wish is, to strip the Jackson mantle off these gentlemen, and let them stand up for themselves. Every one knows that no gentleman upon this floor has any motive, any wish to make an issue with General Jackson, that he cannot be the object of this resolution. His course is run, his day is past, his power is in other hands, and we wish to hold those gentlemen accountable for the manner in which they exercise it. There has been no investigation into the Departments, which we propose to examine, for the last eight years. We wish to see a settlement of their accounts at the bar of the Public, and the balance fairly struck between them and the People. They may be honest, very honest; if so, it is due to themselves that they show it. It may be otherwise, and in that event, it is due to the country that we should have a committee of the House to show that. How is it proposed that they shall come to trial? Upon the certificate contained in the message, and upon that alone. The gentleman himself admits that these sweeping certificates are unusual. I detect the whole system of certifying which pervades every Department of the Government, and can be traced from Reuben M. Whitney up. (Believe you me, no go from Reuben down.) Yes, sir, a coward who shrinks and runs from an adversary whom he has injured, will get a certificate of his courage to use upon the stump; a traitor will get a certificate of his patriotism; a rogue of dishonesty, and a perjured witness of his veracity; and if you attempt to fix upon either of these his true character, he will ensconce himself behind his certificate. We ask permission to go into the various Departments, and see what their true condition is.

But, says the gentleman, that is equivalent to an impeachment of the President, for here is his statement that all is well; that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter; and the argument is, that if you find just cause of complaint, it will show that the President has said it is not true, and, therefore, if you do mean to attack the President, there must be no examination whatever. We hold these officers, whose conduct we propose to examine, to be trustees, and we have reason to believe that they have abused their trust, and abused the confidence of the President, and demand that they shall give an account of their own conduct to the representatives of the people, on a free met at once and told that you are putting the President upon his trial; it is an impeachment against him; make out your specifications and summon him to the bar of the Senate. All we ask, sir, is, that the representatives of the American people shall send a committee and examine the archives, records, and papers of their own Government, in any and all of its departments, and make their report of the facts to this House. We propose no criminal prosecution against any one, but an investigation into the condition of the departments, and the honesty and fidelity of the public agents, and this the gentleman calls a disfranchisement under the common law. He was eloquent and extravagant in his eulogiums upon the heads of these departments; he spouted their praises in poetry, and I suppose he means they shall live in song and story. He says the Secretary of the Treasury has not slept upon his arms. No, sir, he has not slept, and the party should feel under the highest obligations to him, for he has so contrived as to make the Treasury and the public lands a powerful auxiliary to Mr. Van Buren in the late election. By the celebrated Treasury order which he issued, requiring specie in payment for the public lands, with an exception in favor of citizens of the States in which those lands are situated, he in effect offered a bribe of one hundred dollars a head for votes in the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, and Michigan, which was then looked upon as a State. For, sir, at the sale of public lands in Mississippi last fall, specie was worth at one time 20 per cent.; and while the citizens of Tennessee, then considered in rebellion against Mr. Van Buren, were required to pay this enormous tax, the citizens of Mississippi, a doubtful State in the election, were exempt from it. At Government price, three hundred and twenty acres of land would cost the Mississippi four hundred dollars, while the Tennesseean, for the same quantity, was compelled to pay the sum of five hundred dollars, from the necessity he was placed under by this order of raising specie. And, sir, this was not confined to the poor and needy, but extended to the nabob, with his hundreds of hands, and thousands of bales, while the specie was exacted from the most indigent and meritorious Tennesseean. This, sir, is what I call high-handed oppression on the one side, and wholesale bribery and corruption on the other. Philip of Macedon never made a more unblushing use of money to corrupt and enslave the people of Greece. This Secretary must be entitled to the praise, and something more substantial still, to a portion of the spoils of the party. The gentleman alluded to, to the visit of the Secretary of State (Mr. Forsyth) to Georgia, which he calls unfortunate, true, his visit was unfortunate; and of the visit of the Secretary of the Navy (Mr. Decker) to New Jersey, which was also unfortunate. He seems unwilling to give them any credit for well-meant exertions, and "wishes to God they had staid at home." This appears rather ungrateful, as they used their best exertions in the cause. It is true the gentleman attempts to conceal the fact, but it is notorious that the Secretary of State went to Georgia, and used every effort to rally his shattered forces—that he was openly electioneering for Mr. Van Buren. Amos, too, if I was correctly informed, made an excursion for a like purpose into New England. I am sure that I saw it stated that he had his face lithographed, and copies sent through the country, so that those who could not see "the divine original, might at least gaze on love's counterfeit."

But, sir, the gentleman assumes another ground in defence of these "ministers," as he calls them. He says the appointment of this committee would amount to a disfranchisement of those officers whose conduct it is proposed to scrutinize, by denying to them a trial according to the strict rules of the criminal law. This principle holds only where a man is on trial for crime. All laws are to be liberally expounded, so as to detect fraud, but strictly construed when you come to punish a criminal. The gentleman goes too fast; he leaps to the conclusion, leaving us at the beginning of this matter; while we are commencing the development of fraud and corruption, which the law abhors, he anticipates the awful result which may be brought about, and is appealing to your sympathy on behalf of the culprit. Now, if he will be patient, we will go on with him, and in due season we will lean to the side of mercy, and acquit wherever there is reasonable doubt. This is strange doctrine to come from that side of the House. These officers are the trustees of the people, and accountable to the people. They have been long in office, and are about entering upon a new lease; and now, when called upon to make an exhibition of their fidelity and ability, their friends upon this floor raise the cry of disfranchisement and summary punishment. I deny and utterly repudiate this doctrine. Sir, in private life, no one denies the right of a principal to look into the conduct of his agent. What would that principal think of an agent who would shut his books and say, I claim protection under the criminal code; you cannot examine these books, lest it may lead to a prosecution against me? What honest man would not say at once he was guilty? What jurist would sustain the objection for an instant? Take the case of a guardian; a motion is made in court, a committee is appointed, and he is brought forthwith to a settlement; could he object on the ground that the examination of his accounts might develop crime, and lead to punishment? And, sir, have not the American people the same power over these keepers of their treasure, and guardians of their Constitution, laws, and liberties, which a court of justice can exercise over the guardian of an estate, and the children who own it? Sir, because investigation may lead to such a discovery, it does not preclude investigation altogether. The gentleman's fancy seems to be haunted by the idea of criminal prosecutions and penitentiary punishments. Well, sir, his fancies may be realized; he may know something calculated to excite his alarm; it may lead to that, and I would not be surprised if, in some instances, it did; but we move no impeachment, no indictment, no presentment at this time. We merely ask that this House, as the great inquest of the nation, shall inquire into the state of the Departments, and upon a report of facts, by a committee, it will then be able to determine what steps are proper to be taken. If crime is developed in any quarter, then it will be the proper time to bring offenders to trial, and they shall have all the benefits of the strict rules of common law, and criminal law, and the benefit of clergy likewise. Sir, there is something rotten in Denmark, or we would not have this resolute and continued opposition to all investigation which is calculated to show mismanagement on the part of agents and officers of Government. At the adjournment of the last session of Congress there were pending motions and resolutions, calculated to effect objects similar to those contemplated by this resolution, and they were all smothered by the party to which the gentleman belongs, and I believe, with his assistance. The gentleman dreams a select committee, while he is willing to go to trial upon the certificate of the President, and seems to have full confidence in the result if the matter be entrusted to the Committee of Ways and Means. Yet, sir, he is alarmed at the idea of a select committee, and says it will be a "fact-finding, censorious committee." Have the gentleman and his friends anything to dread in the appointment of this committee? Is the Speaker subject to the suspicion of doing injustice to any of the party in the appointment of committees? Sir, is it not a matter of absolute certainty that a majority of this committee, if appointed, will be composed of the friends of these officers? Cannot those gentlemen most their own friends without fear and trembling? Is there not virtue and talent in this House sufficient to guaranty protection to the innocent, as well as to ensure the detection and exposure of the guilty? Are gentlemen willing that it shall be understood, and go abroad to the country, that they cannot face such a committee, composed of gentlemen of the highest honor and purest principles, even though they are their own friends? And these, too, are the men in whose hands the Government of the country is placed, and who claim to be above suspicion, beyond the power of this House, forced in upon all sides by the ramparts of the President's certificate.

There is one other position assumed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, which is quite original, and merits particular attention; it is this, sir, that the direction given at the last session to the bill commonly called the Executive patronage bill is conclusive as to the views of this House upon the subject of Executive patronage. And he seems to draw an inference that the House then gave its sanction to all that had been or would be done in the way of Executive patronage, in all its departments. What are the facts in relation to that case? A gentleman from New York (Mr. Mann) on the 25th of February, 1836, moved "that said bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary." My colleague (Mr. Bell) moved "it should be referred to a select committee," and, pending these motions, a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Dring) moved "that the Executive patronage bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union," which motion took precedence of the others and prevailed, and there the bill has slept ever since. The question of Executive patronage was not taken up for consideration afterwards; and now the gentleman contends that the House having failed to act upon the subject, it was therefore against the bill, and in favor of Executive patronage, to the fullest extent. Sir, during the last summer, in Tennessee, I endeavored to inculcate this doctrine so far as to hold a majority of this House accountable for its failing to act upon this as well as some other important questions, but this doctrine was controverted by you and your friends. How would it hold upon another great question—the question of amending the Constitution of the United States so as to secure the election of President and Vice President to the people at all events, and under all circumstances? For the last two sessions of Congress this has been a leading question, and afforded a fair opportunity for the party to show their zeal in carrying out the measures of General Jackson. I, and the friends with whom I act, have ever been in favor of that measure. At the session before the last, soon after it was known that Judge White was a candidate for the Presidency, and while we were urging the House to take up the resolutions upon that subject, the present Speaker (Mr. James K. Polk) made a speech, in which, after professing a willingness to go for the measure, objected to acting upon the subject then, alleging a want of time, and also some imperfection in the resolutions. I followed in a few remarks, in which I urged the importance of a speedy action on the subject, and reminded the Speaker of his former course in relation to the matter, and, though he spoke against us, he voted with us to take up the resolutions. His friends, however, took their cue, and followed his precept instead of his example, and the resolutions were postponed. At the last session of Congress the same subject came up, with no better fate than before. It was with great difficulty we could get a report from the committee at all. They all professed to be in favor of the amendment. Oh! yes; but they seemed to agree to differ as to the mode of effecting it; and, at last, when the report came in, it took the same direction with the Executive patronage bill, or something like it. We could not bring the gentlemen to a vote on either. And is it to be understood, now the election is over, (I know that it would not have been admitted before,) that all those who voted to give those important measures the go-by are to be set down as voting against them? If so, how do the party stand upon the great leading measures of General Jackson's administration? If we call upon gentlemen to walk in the footsteps of the President upon that oft-repeated, but never heeded recommendation in regard to the election of President and Vice President, are we to tell that the House has already decided that question against the President's recommendations, by refusing to vote on the question? Are we to be told, if we propose to limit Executive patronage, that the House has already decided that question in the same manner, and has sanctioned the full extent to which Executive measures have been repeatedly carried? And, sir, what is that extent? It is sufficient, if not checked, and grows into a settled precedent, to rivet chains upon us and our children for ever. Such a precedent will authorize a President to make the nomination of his successor a cabinet measure, issue his proclamation calling a convention to choose that nomination, and denounce, in advance, all who dare oppose the nominees before or after the convention acts, as "assailing public virtue, and opposing the right of the people to govern." For, sir, this has been done in the late nomination of the "Government" candidates, as they are called in the English journals. Was that ticket so remarkable for its purity and virtue, that to oppose it was to assail the virtue of the people? Mr. Van Buren has promised to walk in the footsteps of General Jackson; and is, consequently, bound in due time to nominate his colleague (Colonel Johnson) for the Presidency, under a convention to purify his nomination, take the field, and secure his election by the use of all the ways and means in the power of the Executive. This, sir, is the extent to which Executive patronage has already gone, and which the gentleman contends has beforehand been sanctioned by this House. This, sir, is what I deny. Whatever this House may be destined to do, it has not power to that act.

Sir, I was not prepared for such doctrines; and I must say that I was not prepared for the opposition to the proposed investigation. I had hoped that gentlemen would have become ashamed of screening these officers, who, instead of running to General Jackson for certificates of moral character, should be the first to demand an investigation. But, sir, will the people of the United States be satisfied for ever that they shall shrink from responsibility, hold up General Jackson's character as their shield, and thereby escape a scrutiny of their conduct? If they have acted honorably, we wish them to show it; if those suspicions, so common, so universal, are groundless, we wish the country to know it. Innocence never seeks for safety in flight, in concealment, but rather courts investigation, and defies scrutiny. How can gentlemen reconcile in once with this trembling and shrinking—this shielding themselves under the numerical strength of their friends in this House? This was their course at the last session of Congress. Remember, sir, what fatally attended every effort to obtain a committee of investigation then. Recollect the extraordinary and obstinate protection extended to that darling Treasury pet, Reuben Whitney. Let it also be remembered that the Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously recommended an inquiry into the abuses of that bureau, which would have developed the causes of the late and present Indian wars in the South. That committee reported a resolution authorizing any two of its members to prosecute the inquiry, by taking testimony for the information of the House at this session. But, sir, this resolution, reported by a committee, a majority of whom were in favor of Mr. Van Buren, was rejected in the House. The citizens of Georgia and Alabama petitioned and implored the House to investigate that subject, alleging the most unheard-of frauds and abuses. Upon this application the vote stood—aye 77, noes 77, a tie, and the Speaker gave the casting vote against the investigation. Sir, men high in favor and high in office were suspected. The agent of the Government, John B. Hogan, gave the Department official information of the greatest outrages practised upon the Indians which were ever perpetrated upon any people savage or civilized. He was very soon removed, or rather promoted, from Indian agent to be collector at the port of Mobile. And yet, sir, we have no account of prosecutions, convictions, and punishments, which have followed his disclosures. Why, sir, those speculators, or rather Indian robbers, would find an old chief upon his paternal estate, where the chiefs and kings of his race had lived for centuries before him, with his slaves and his farms around him, smoking his pipe amidst his own forest trees, spurning any offer to purchase his home; and they would bribe some vagabond Indian to personate him in a trade, to sell his land, forging his name, and the first intimation that he would have of the transaction, would be his expulsion by force from his house! This was common, and not only so, but, under the pretext of reclaiming fugitive slaves, the wives and children (of mixed blood) of the Indians were seized and carried off in bondage. The famous Osceola himself had his wife taken from him, and that, too, it has been said, by a Government officer, and was claimed by this same officer to a log. Sir, what else could be expected but that these scourged, plundered, starving savages would glut their vengeance by the indiscriminate slaughter of the innocent and helpless families of the frontier, whose blood has cried to us in vain? This has caused the Florida war, which has produced such a waste of treasure, the loss of so much national and individual honor, and of so many valuable lives! This has called the gallant volunteers from my own State, and from my own district, who have traversed a thousand miles to fight the battle of strangers—to contend with a savage foe, while drinking those stagnant waters, whose malarial death, many of whom are left in the wild woods of Florida, where "the foe and the stranger will tread o'er their heads," while their fellow-soldiers are far away, happy at home with their friends and families. One—ay! sir, any one of those noble youths who now sleep under a foreign sod, was worth more than the whole army of plunderers who have caused the mischief. And yet, sir, such men as these were shielded at the last session of Congress by the casting vote of the Speaker. And now, according to the argument of the gentleman from Rhode Island, the House has sanctioned all they did.

I think, sir, it is time for this course of things to cease. It is time for the people to know something of the conduct of those in whose hands the public business is entrusted, and who really Jackson long enough. I was present when Mr. Van Buren took his position there. It was a striking display of that paternal care which the President has extended over Mr. Van Buren. In the spring of 1834, the President, Mr. Van Buren, and a few other gentlemen, I amongst the number, rode out to the Washington country to witness a trial of speed, (an amusement of which I am very fond, and for which the President had not altogether lost his taste at that day.) It was a trial run between the celebrated Bushis and Emily. The horses were brought on the course, all was calm and quiet until the rider of Bushis mounted, when the old courser began to rear and plunge; it seemed to stir the mettle of Old Hickory; he reared upon his stirrups and took command; "hold him," (said he to the boy), "don't let him run against the fence." "You must break him of that, sir," (to the trainer), "I could do it in an hour." Turning to me, he said, "take your stand there," (pointing to a position on the side of the course), "there is not one place from which a horse can be correctly timed." I took my station with lever in hand. "Now," said he, "come up, and give them a fair start." At this moment he discovered the Vice President, who had come up and taken his position near me; he exclaimed with great emphasis and earnestness of manner, as he flashed his eye from the excited animals to the Vice President, "Mr. Van Buren, get behind me, they will run over you, sir." It would have done you good to see how natural and easy and easy it was for Van to slope off behind the old chief. And, sir, there he has been ever since. Old Hickory would not get out of the way for us to run over him; if he had given us a fair chance, on any stretch or turn during the whole race, we would have run over him, or made him fly by the track. But, sir, we have got him on the repeat; the General will be out of the way; he is no game horse, and we will make a case of him on the repeat. I do not complain so much that the President has fallen in love with Mr. Van Buren, but I claim the privilege of falling in love with whom I please; and this, sir, is the last privilege which will ever be surrendered by me, or woman either. But, sir, Mr. Van Buren is in love with the President, too; and he accidentally found it out. The rumor of this discovery is somewhat curious. I do not know this to be true, but it was much talked of and universally believed in this city. Mr. Van Buren was in conversation with a lady, an intimate friend of the President, amiable, interesting, and remarkable for communicating to him whatever she thought would be agreeable for him to hear. Mr. Van Buren said to this lady, "that he had been reading much, and thinking deeply of late, upon the characters of great men, and had come to the conclusion that General Jackson was the greatest man that had ever lived in the tide of time; that he was the only man among them all who was without a fault." The fair friend of the President was delighted. "But," said he, "whatever you do, don't tell General Jackson what I have said. I would not have him to know it for the world." You see, sir, that he was afraid she might forget it, and therefore thought it safest to jog her memory. But, sir, he might have saved himself that trouble, for the excellent lady flew to the President, and told him all that had passed. "Ah! madam," said he, with tears in his eyes, "that man loves me; he tries to conceal it, but there is always some way fixed by which I can tell my friends from my enemies." Now, sir, Van was like the Frenchman, (though I want it distinctly understood that I differ with him about this, as well as about many other things.) A Frenchman began to write his deed thus: "Know one woman by these presents." "Why," said the other party, "do you not put it know all men by these presents?" "Vell," said he, "is it not de same thing? If een woman know it, will not all de mens find it out?"

In reply to General Ripley, of Louisiana, Mr. PEYTON said: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana has charged me with assailing the President's measures, and to that cause he ascribes the excited state of feeling under which he spoke while in Tennessee. My opposition to the measures of the President! I deny that gentleman to point to one of the great measures of Gen. Jackson's administration which I had not supported, unless he claims the election of Mr. Van Buren as one of those measures. If so, I did oppose that measure, and will ever be found in opposition to such an Executive measure. But, sir, has any man the boldness, the hardihood, whatever may have been his motives of action, to avow such a doctrine upon this floor? The gentleman speaks of Tennessee in connection with "the ingratitude of republics," and expresses a "hope that the people of that State will yet learn to appreciate the character and services of General Jackson." This charge against Tennessee, of ingratitude to the President, is not original with the gentleman, (Gen. Ripley.) It has been adopted by him from the lowest source—it issued from the dark caverns of the Globe. What, sir! the people of Tennessee learn to appreciate the character and services of Andrew Jackson! Look at his history—when he first crossed the Alleghenies, a headless stranger, with his knapsack upon his back, his rifle on his shoulder; no power, no patronage then, sir, with nothing to recommend him to our pioneer fathers but a congenial spirit. How did they receive him? With open arms they took him to their bosoms. They conferred upon him all the honors, all the offices known to their laws and constitution. And, sir, their sons have stood by him in every crisis, in every peril of his subsequent life. Look back, sir, upon the highway of his fame, and you will find the bones of a Tennessean mouldering upon every field of his glory. And the gentleman hopes that Tennessee will learn to appreciate his character! It is true, sir, that in the late Presidential election Tennessee early took her stand. She planted herself upon those principles for which she had battled by the side of Gen. Jackson; and there she proudly stands yet, firm, fixed, and immovable. She was not to be driven from the ballot box. She could not, she dare not yield her principles, and surrender up her liberty to the command of any man. But, sir, I wish to set the gentleman right upon another point. He contends that the House, in adopting this resolution, will do General Jackson injustice; that we who advocate it have already done him great injustice. Is it in this manner that every inquiry, every investigation is to be strangled in its infancy, under the pretext of inflicting injury upon General Jackson? Why, sir, we have to legislate upon this subject under the terrors of "expunge." Yes, sir, the gentleman has announced to the House that if this resolution is passed, it will be expunged. The Lord save me from an expunging House, as well as an expunging Senate. I have witnessed, with loathing and disgust, the operation of that process in the Senate. I have seen the great expunger (Col. Benton), in the grim majesty of his expunging power, lashing with the whip of scorpions, abler and honest men than himself to the work; flogging them on to make war upon the Constitution of their country, and the journals of the Senate; and I have shuddered when I saw it. But I saw, sir, last winter, a disposition manifested by the party, I am sure I did by some of its leaders, to encourage him in his mad scheme of wasting the surplus revenue, that he might batter out his brains against the walls of his own fortification system, and thereby save them the trouble of knocking him on the head. Sir, he will never rise under the weight of that stone and mortar, from the mud and quicksands into which they have plunged him. Sir, I hope never to see this House scourged by so rude and barbarous a despotism. I hope that Heaven has for us in store a better fate. "Expunge," I say, expunge what? We propose to look into the conduct of your "hirelings"—to examine the dark deeds of your Whineys and your Kendalls, and have "expunge" flung in our faces. But are we, the Representatives of the American people, to falter in our duty, and cower under the iron sceptre of some expunging hero who is to rise up amongst us? And, sir, if we but touch one little twig of this great Jackson tree, which overshadows the land, and stretches its branches throughout the continent, we are charged with an assault upon its trunk, and expunge is instantly proclaimed. No, sir, we wish to brush off these sap suckers, who have been drawing from that body its vitality. We have to approach them as boys kill woodcocks, by whipping round old Hickory, and I have always admired the mildest measures, the use of limber switches, so as not to hurt him. There was something in coming to appeal from me to the tenor of his remarks, which seemed to appeal from me to the people of Tennessee, and I threatened me with their displeasure. Sir, the boldest representative upon this floor is far behind the spirit of that people in their unshaken purpose of asserting their rights and maintaining their freedom. A cruel war has been waged against Tennessee, but she has met the crisis as became her character: she has met the mercenary legions unawed; she may be crushed, but not conquered, she may fall, but if she does, it will be at the shrine of the Constitution, in the grave of public liberty. And, sir, I will go down with her: I would not survive her fate. I am willing to go home and meet my people; I have nothing to fear from them: their kindness and partiality towards me have always been far beyond my merits. But, sir, the injustice done to General Jackson by supporting this measure: what is it? We demand an investigation into the agency of Reuben Whitney, we ask for an inquiry into the condition of the Treasury. We require that there shall be a full investigation into all the departments, and into the conduct of the whole army of public officers, who have been engaged in this business of the succession—this trampling under foot of laws and Constitutions. We wish to know from whence came this money. Where is the source of their corruption? Where is the mint from which they can send their hiring editors through the country, poisoning the fountains of intelligence amongst the people? How is it that our army in Florida has been neglected, and left to suffer for want of supplies, while it was within a few days' sail of New Orleans? Men starving, horses sinking under them in the swamps—all, all, sir, in consequence of gross and criminal neglect somewhere. Was it that our high functionaries were too busily engaged to think of the army—too full of Mr. Van Buren to cast a thought on Ocoola—too busily engaged in electioneering—to think of the gallant men who were fighting the battles of their country? It is in behalf of men whose conduct has been such as this, that the message volunteers a laudatory certificate. Sir, I deny the authenticity of this message. General Jackson never gave that certificate. They have written it themselves, and obtained the signature of his name. And yet, with such a testimonial in their favor, they shrink from the proof—they shrink from inquiry. Let us have the proof, sir, and then we will see whether they are honest or venal, corrupt or immaculate. Sir, I do not say they are corrupt: that is just what I wish to find out. I want a strict and impartial investigation. It is lawful, it is usual, to make such inquiries. It is surely right to investigate our affairs—to examine into the deeds of our own agents. This is our right, it is our duty, and cannot do "injustice" to any one. I protest against the issue which the gentleman from Louisiana has joined. It is not a question between General Jackson and this House: his person and conduct is one thing, and the persons and conduct of these officers is another. I hope that no attempt to crush this investigation on such an issue will succeed; and, sir, let us hope that no American Congress will ever be found ready to expunge an order directing an investigation into the Departments. No, sir, this will never be the case, so long as a shadow of our liberties remains.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN.

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In Senate, February 28, 1837—On the Distribution Question.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was one of those who intended to vote against the amendment to the fortification bill, which had been adopted in the House, directing that the surplus revenue exceeding five millions of dollars, which might remain in the Treasury on the first day of January next, should be deposited with the States, under the provisions of the deposit act which had passed at the last session of Congress. As he had advocated the passage of that act, it became necessary that he should make a few observations explanatory of the course which he purposed to pursue on the present occasion.

Mr. B. stated that there was but little analogy between these two measures, unless it might be that they were both called deposit bills. This was the chief point of resemblance. The principles upon which the present proposition was now advocated, were entirely different from those which had been adopted by the friends of the deposit bill of the last session. And here he must be permitted to express his regret that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) seemed to have abandoned his bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States. For his own part, he infinitely preferred that measure to the one now before the Senate.

What were the principles (said Mr. B.) upon which the deposit bill of the last session rested? There was then a vast sum of public money, beyond the wants of the Government, in the deposit banks, whilst an absolute certainty existed that at the end of the year, this surplus would be greatly increased. At that time, these banks were not bound to pay any interest on their deposits. These accumulations of public money were loaned out by them to individuals; whilst all the profits arising from such loans went into the pockets of their stockholders. A wild spirit of speculation was thus fostered, which threatened to destroy the regular business of the country, and to convert our public domain into paper money. The enormous evils of this system were palpable. The banks were then inflicting deep injuries upon the country, by the manner in which they used this money, and it was every day becoming more and more uncertain whether they would be able to meet the demands of the Government when called upon for this purpose.

Under these peculiar circumstances, what was to be done? We were compelled to choose between two great evils. We must either have suffered the money to remain in the banks, and subjected the country to the consequences; or, it became our duty to deposit it with the States, and give them the advantage of using it until it should be required by the wants of the Government. No other practical alternative could be presented. For my own part, I felt no hesitation in making my choice.

At that time it seemed to have been admitted by every Senator, that, as a general system, it would be extremely dangerous to the country annually to distribute the surplus in the Treasury among the States. No voice was raised in favor of such a principle. It was universally condemned. As a plan of general policy, a worse one can never be devised. If pursued, it must, in a very few years, destroy the character of this Government. Let it once be established, and all men can see the inevitable consequences. Every Senator and every Representative will then come to Congress with strong feelings directly hostile to the best interests of the Federal Government. Instead of having our eyes exclusively fixed upon those great national objects entrusted to our care by the Constitution; we would be more or less than men, if we could banish from our minds the consideration that the full amount of every appropriation for such purposes, would be so much deducted from the surplus to which the respective States would be entitled at the close of the year. The question will then be not merely what appropriations are necessary to promote the general interests of the country, but, blended with this question, will be another—how much can be withheld from these purposes, and to what extent can the dividend of our own States be thus increased? For example, a proposed fortification will cost half a million; in voting for or against it, the consideration will necessarily obtrude itself, would it not be better, would it not be productive of more good, to distribute this sum among our own States? In peace, it is our duty to prepare for war. With this view, a proposition is made to increase our navy. This may be necessary to protect our commerce, and to present such an array of our power to foreign nations, that they will not dare to injure our citizens, or to insult our flag upon the ocean. In voting upon such a proposition, how easily may we delude ourselves with the idea that there is no danger, and that the country will derive more real benefit from expending the necessary amount upon railroads and canals in the respective States. Every dollar which can be withdrawn from the General Government is a dollar given to the States. Establish this policy, and you set up a principle, to use a Senatorial word, antagonistical to the constitutional and efficient exercise of the powers of the Federal Government. You will thus paralyze the energies of this Government, and reduce it to almost the same feeble condition in which it was placed under the old articles of confederation. Can the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) deny—has he denied that this would be the effect of such a system? Under its operation, will it not always be a question how much will this or will that appropriation for national purposes deduct from State dividends? You thus present to the very agents selected to administer the Federal Government the strongest temptation to violate their duty.

The deposit bill of the last session was advocated upon the principle that it was to be a single operation, and to be justified alone upon the extreme necessity which then existed. What is now the state of the case? This amendment has been engrafted by the House upon an ordinary appropriation bill. From the very nature of such bills, they ought to be, and generally are, confined to grants of money for the execution of existing laws, and for carrying into effect the settled policy of the country. To unite this deposit section in the same bill, with the appropriations necessary to complete our system of fortifications, is to declare to the world that it has become a part of our settled policy. Does any necessity now exist for the adoption of such a measure? Are we now placed in the same situation in which we were at the last session of Congress? Will there be any surplus in the Treasury on the first of January next, beyond five millions? Has this fact been ascertained? Shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon the question. Whether there will be or not is uncertain, contingent, dependent upon the action of Congress, and upon the speculations in the public lands. My own impression is, that, if there should be a surplus, it will be comparatively small; unless this very proposition for its deposit with the States should be the means of creating or enlarging it, by defeating the passage of important bills for the defence and benefit of the country. What necessity now exists for the adoption of this measure? If there shall be a surplus when Congress meet on the 1st of December next, it will then be time enough to provide for its disposition. One great objection to this measure, is, that it will make the extreme medicine of the Constitution its daily bread. It has already become so familiar to us that Senators are now willing to insert it in an ordinary appropriation bill, and thus make it the settled policy of the country. It should be the exception, not the rule. Above all, it is a remedy to which we ought never to resort until we know that a surplus exists, or are absolutely certain that it will exist. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.

I shall not now speak of the unhappy influence which this system of distribution would exert upon the State Governments themselves, because I have not risen to make a general speech, but merely to place my own conduct in relation to this subject in its true light.

And now, sir, permit me again to express my sorrow that the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay) had not been willing to postpone this question, and to wait until the next session. Then his land bill might be presented to Congress under brighter auspices than it has ever been heretofore. If a choice is to be made between that bill and a system of distributing surpluses, it will not be difficult for me to decide. There is, in my judgment, no comparison between the two. If you grant the proceeds of the public lands to the States as their right, this is one source of revenue which you withdraw from the control of Congress. Our system of policy would thus be rendered fixed and stable. We could then accommodate our duties on imports to the necessary expenses of the Government, and our tariff would not be subject to those perpetual changes which must ever exist while we derive a portion of our revenue from such a fluctuating source as that of the public lands. The States would receive this money, not as a matter of bounty, but of right. They would, therefore, not feel dependent for it upon the General Government. Nearly all the evils attendant upon a distribution of the surpluses would thus forever be avoided; and Congress would then be compelled to raise the revenue necessary to defray the expenses of the Government from the customs and from other taxes. This would introduce a wholesome spirit of economy into our councils, without making it the interest of the Senators and Representatives in Congress to array themselves against appropriations for objects of a national character. I should, therefore, have rejoiced, had the Senator from Kentucky adhered to his land bill and opposed this amendment, which, if it should prevail, must destroy that measure. For my own part, I shall vote to strike this amendment from the bill without the slightest apprehension of subjecting myself to the charge of inconsistency.

At a subsequent stage of the debate on the same question, in reply to Mr. Calhoun:

Mr. BUCHANAN must say in candor to the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) that he had entirely failed to convince him he was wrong. Of one thing, however, he had convinced him, and that was, that the Senator in fact, if not in profession, was one of the very best tariff men in the country. Let him succeed in supporting this amendment which has been adopted by the House; let him succeed in establishing a system of distribution as the settled policy of the country; and then what will be the inevitable consequence? High taxes upon imports will be maintained for the purpose of raising money to distribute. We shall no longer hear of reducing the revenue of the country to its necessary expenditure. We shall then have no difficulty in disposing of the surplus. It will go the States as a matter of course, and our whole system of Government will thus be changed.

For my own part, (said Mr. B.) I should be sorry to reduce the tariff below the proper limit. I am in favor of affording to our domestic industry all the incidental protection which can be yielded it in raising the revenue necessary for the wants of the Government. Indeed, if any thing could reconcile me to the doctrines of the Senator, it would be the protection which they must necessarily afford to our manufactures. Let this amendment pass the Senate as it has already passed the House, and who can believe that the tariff will ever be reduced? If all the surplus money which can be collected by this Government is to be distributed among the several States, this will perpetuate high duties for ever. It is not, however, either my intention or my wish to quarrel with him on this account. If he will, by advocating this system of policy, force upon us a high tariff, my constituents will bear their part of the dispensation with Christian fortitude.

I am sorry now to believe in the truth of the declaration of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) that the land bill is a lifeless corpse. I have clung to that measure, through good report and through evil report, until it has been abandoned by all its other friends, and I am left as the only mourner of its unhappy fate. Dead and gone, as it appears to be, I shall not do its memory so much injustice as to compare it with the system of distribution which its former friends have now adopted in its stead.

The land bill would be the safety valve, the regulator of our system of revenue and expenditure, without inflicting any of the evils on the Federal Government which must flow from annual distribution of the surplus in the Treasury.

What is the theory of our Government under the Constitution? Congress possesses the power to levy and collect taxes. For what purpose? To accomplish the great objects specified in the Constitution. This power of levying taxes carries with it an immense responsibility. The representatives of the people, when they know that all the money they appropriate must be taken from the pockets of their constituents, will be careful to expend it with economy and discretion. But we possess a vast reservoir of wealth in our public lands, so irregular to its current that, in one year, it pours into the public treasury twenty millions, and in the next it contributes but one-tenth of that sum. This deranges all our legislation, and renders all the great interests of the country fluctuating and insecure. It encourages extravagant appropriations by Congress, and banishes economy from our legislation. It leaves every interest in doubt and uncertainty. This year, when we have more money than we know how to expend, we hear the cry that the tariff must be reduced; the revenue must be diminished to the necessary expenditures of the Government; protection must be withdrawn from our manufactures. The next year, perhaps, there may be a reaction. Speculation in the public lands may have exhausted itself, and the receipts of the Treasury from this source may be greatly diminished. What comes then? The tariff must be raised; the duties on imports must be increased to meet the necessary wants of the Government. Thus the public mind is kept in a perpetual state of excitement. No domestic interest can calculate upon any fixed and steady protection. We are in a state of continual doubt; public opinion fluctuating with the fluctuations in the sales of the public lands. None of the great interests of the country can ever flourish, unless they can calculate, with some degree of confidence upon some steady and certain course of legislation in relation to themselves. Now, sir, a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States would remedy all these evils, and correct all these anomalies of our system. It would secure to us a settled policy upon which the country might rely. It would draw off from the General Government this eccentric source of revenue, and distribute it among the States. We should then be left where the Constitution intended to place us. The Government would then be administered on its original principles. All our expenditures would then be derived from the taxes which we might impose on the people; and the tariff would thus be rendered fixed and certain. Whatever protection might then be afforded would be stable. Under such circumstances, an incidental protective duty, comparatively small, would be of more real value than a much larger one, subject to all the risk and uncertainty which now exist. A manufacturer, whilst embarking in business, would not then dread the policy of Congress might change before he could get into successful operation. There would then be no taxes raised from the people to be distributed among the people. We should hear no more of surpluses.

Combining some such a disposition of the proceeds of the public lands with an arrangement as to the lands themselves, which would be satisfactory to the new States, the system might thereby be rendered perfect and permanent. I am strongly impressed with a belief that a plan might be devised which would meet the approbation of all reasonable men in the new States, whilst the just rights of the old States would be amply secured. But all hopes of such a consummation has almost departed. The friends of the land bill have cast it aside. Even the Senator from Kentucky has abandoned the promising child which he had adopted and nursed so long and so tenderly, and is now caressing and cherishing the ill-favored bantling which is now before the Senate.

Has any argument which I urged when I first addressed the Senate been answered by the gentleman from South Carolina? (Mr. Calhoun.) He says that it is a reflection upon the virtue and patriotism of the American people and their representatives, to suggest that they would withhold the necessary appropriations from the Federal Government, because the States might expect to receive what would remain unexpended in the Treasury at the conclusion of each year. Can this inference be fairly drawn from my argument? Every wise legislator, of every age, in framing any plan of government, has always taken care that the duty of those who were to administer it should not clash with their interests. In other words, that those who were to work the machine should not have any strong feeling opposed to its successful operation. Man, in his best state, is but a frail being. If you place his interest upon the one side, and his duty upon the other, the history of the human race abundantly proves, that he has too often abandoned his principles for the sake of promoting his private advantage. Lead us not into temptation, was the prayer of Him who best understood human nature. Am I, then, to be charged with reflecting upon the American people, because I believe they will be influenced by the motives which have swayed all mankind from the beginning? What wise man would ever think of establishing a Constitution which would place the interest of the governors in opposition to a correct and efficient administration of the Government? Would not this be emphatically the case, if you say to the Senators and Representatives in Congress that you shall have every dollar of surplus in the Treasury at the end of each year, for the use of your own States, which you can withhold from national objects? I would ask the Senator, if he were about to erect a house, and desired to have it elegantly and substantially built, whether he would put a given amount for that purpose into the hands of his agent, upon condition that the whole surplus which he could save should be his own property? This would be offering him a premium to be faithless to his trust. No, sir; I deny that, in applying to the American people the laws which govern human nature generally, I am treating them with disrespect. I merely say that they are mortal men, and not angels. I should be the last man to distrust their patriotism, because I firmly believe that, comparing them with the rest of mankind, they are, in the mass, more pure and more virtuous than any other nation upon the face of the earth.

Our own history presents us a useful lesson upon this subject. Let us refer to the days of the confederation; and what was then the state of things? Did the different State Governments pay into the Federal Treasury their contingents, which were due upon every fair principle? Would the debts of the Revolution have ever been discharged, had the old confederacy continued to exist? No, sir. The members of the State Legislatures refused to tax the people of the respective States for these purposes. They were placed in such a position that their duty to the Government of the confederation was at war with the interest of their constituents; and the consequence was, that Government became a mere shadow—destitute of power, and incapable of performing its most necessary functions. Yet these men who refused to perform their duties, were the very men who had perilled every thing in the cause of liberty spend the decline of his days in solemn reflections upon the scenes and events of a long life, most actively spent in deeds big with the fate of a country he has defended, and of its institutions "hallowed by the wisdom of sages, and consecrated by the blood of heroes." May he live long to witness the effects of his errors, if errors he has committed, to acknowledge and repent of them; and in like manner to enjoy the blessings of his administration, if of any blessing it has been fruitful. No, sir; my meaning is not now to condemn the President, but to defend the people. This is the sole object of the questions I have put. I do not mean to accuse the President of all these enormities against civil liberty, of which I have asked—Is he guilty? Nor do I admit, if he is guilty of them, that the people have sanctioned all or any which I have enumerated. But, sir, I merely state the fact, that the party who claim to hold him in keeping, and to hold on to his power after him, claim and tell us that the people have yielded every thing worth preserving, and have sanctioned all these enormities, and more, and worse. What their object may be in admitting these encroachments, and in claiming that the people have sanctioned and approved them, I know not, unless they mean hereafter to rely upon most "unsafe precedents." The fact is alarmingly so, that these claims are now set up, going so far as to asperse the people, whom they affect so much to reverence, with approving and sanctioning proscriptio, corruption, arbitrary power, the destruction of the checks and balances of the Government, profligate extravagance in its administration, Executive dictation, royalty itself, and a caucus succession in an elective monarchy! Inadventure, I warn them that I now deny the fact that the people have sanctioned or approved of any such unpardonable sins against them or their only bulwarks of safety. If this people have yielded already what "the party" claim, they would have yielded all for which their fathers fought; and those fathers would rise, if the mighty dead could rise, from their very graves to reproach their debased degeneracy, and their cruel injury alike to them and all posterity.

I have done no wrong to Jackson, then, as all candid minds will bear me witness; I have given him credit for "every captive he has brought to Rome." At the same time I do not mean to say he has not committed many grievous errors. For many of them I can well account, though I cannot pardon. We are taught in history that "suspicious princes often promote the last of mankind from vain persuasion, that those who have no dependence, except on their favor, will have no attachment, except to the person of their benefactor." Thus were the Perennises and Clanders promoted by a Commodus, and such ministers were well qualified to drive from the esteem of such a prince the "faithful counsellors to whom a Marcus had recommended his son." The one "a servile and ambitious minister, who had obtained his post by the murder of his predecessor, but who possessed a considerable share of vigor and ability;" the other "a Phrygian by birth, of a nation over whose stubborn but servile temper blows only could prevail. He had been sent from his native country to Rome in the capacity of a slave. As a slave he entered the imperial palace, rendered himself useful to his masters' passions, and rapidly ascended to the most exalted station which a subject could enjoy. His influence over the mind of Commodus was much greater than that of his predecessor. Avarice was the reigning passion of his soul, and the great principle of his administration. The rank of consul, of patrician, of senator was exposed to public sale. In the lucrative provincial employments the minister shared with the governor the spoils of the people. The execution of the laws was venal and arbitrary."

Is it astonishing that, with ministers like those of Commodus, tempted as they were by the public money in deposit, and by the vast public domain of this nation, stretching over rivers and lakes, and prairies of unbounded extent and inexhaustible fertility, Jackson was duped, and the public domains were removed within reach of Perennis and Clander? Again, sir, an incident in the history of this same Emperor, very similar to the one in the history of our own President, accounts for his hostility to the Roman Senate. One evening, as the Emperor was returning to the palace through a dark and narrow passage, in the amphitheatre, an assassin, who waited his passage, rushed upon him with a drawn sword, loudly exclaiming, "The Senate sends you this." The conspiracy was proved to have been formed not in the Senate, but within the walls of the palace." But "the words of the assassin sunk deep into the mind of Commodus, and left an indelible impression of fear and hatred against the whole body of the Senate. The Delators, a race of men discouraged, and almost extinguished under the former reigns, again became formidable as soon as they discovered that the Emperor was desirous of finding disaffection and treason in the Senate." Sir, we all know that in the snapping of a percussion cap the President heard distinctly the words, "The Senate sends you this"—that that detestable race of men called Delators were ready to swear that the conspiracy was formed in the Senate; and, if there was not a better reason, perhaps to the act of a madman now confined in prison might be ascribed the President's past hostility to the Senate. But there is a better reason. "By declaring themselves the protectors of the people, Marius and Caesar subverted the Constitution of their country." And, perhaps, in the histories of Marius and Caesar, our modern Clanders learned that an "humble and disarmed" Senate is always "found a tractable and useful instrument of dominion."

In a certain event, if the election of President had failed in this House, an "humble and disarmed Senate" might have been found—a "tractable and useful instrument;" indeed, to elect an Elagabalus, under whom another Hierocles might have enjoyed the honor of being "empress, husband," and under whom "a dancer might have been made prefect of the city, a chariot prefect of the watch, a barber prefect of the provisions," and all "recommended as fit officers—enormitate membrorum." Sir, I might enumerate numberless such excuses for numberless such errors of the President, or rather of the President's ministers. But enough has been said, and I mean not to condemn or accuse him, I repeat, but to defend the people, whom "the party" accuse and condemn.

If it be true, as we are told, and I do not say it is not true, that the President has made and unmade men in office, has proscribed the faithful, has corrupted the pure, has humbled and disarmed the Senate, has made the House of Representatives servile and dependent, has seized and squandered the public money, has deranged the currency and endangered every man's estate, has controlled elections, has assumed royal prerogatives, made himself a king and a king his successor; and if it be also true, which I utterly deny, that the people have sanctioned all this exercise of absolute power, I ask gentlemen of all parties, these even who claim to be the exclusive keepers of the king's conscience, if this does not prove one virtue—the virtue of constancy, at least, in the people? Have they not been constant and confiding beyond measure in their attachment to him? Has their fault not been in too much confidence and constancy?

If what they say be true, and it is a man argument with them, that "the voice of the people is the voice of God;" that whatever Jackson has done they have sanctioned; that he spake, and they yielded it; that he vetoed, and they voted with him; that he dictated, and they obeyed, is this not proof positive that their affections and their voices have ever sustained have ever animated, have ever indulged, have ever justified and excused him? Such unexampled confidence, such unexampled constancy, such unexampled attachment and affection were never witnessed before in any people towards any ruler; and I put it to the candor and sense of justice of all men to say whether what the people have yielded to their favorite has not been more, trebly more, than reward enough for all his services and sacrifices, however great? Admitting the debt of their gratitude to him to have been ever so great, I ask if the debt has not been more than paid? Whether the President does not now owe more than he can ever pay to a generous people, who have confidingly, to a criminal degree, entrusted him with their all—their honors, their rights, their liberties, their sovereign power? Sir, what can one aged man, fast hurrying to the grave, pay to a people in consideration of what all the treasures of earth, and all the blood of them and their children, may not buy? Nothing! Nothing! Yes, yes, there is one boon, one sacred legacy, of inestimable value, which, in parting from them and the world, he might have left them. He might have left them the legacy of a patriot's advice. He might have left them the truth, and solemnly imprinted it upon their minds and memories for ever, that "they had trusted him too much," and his advice to them, "never, never, in their history, to trust another man as they had trusted him," and he might have returned to them their trust, and have restored them to their senses. This, and this only, would have repaid them. It would have restored to them what has been taken from them, which alone can compensate for itself.

The last message of such a President to such a people should have been the "farewell" of a father to his children. It should have been deep in wisdom, profound in its philosophy, hallowed in its lessons of virtue, calm in its tone and temper of reason, eloquent in its appeals, sublime in its moral, and passionate only in its fervent affection. It should have been the legacy of Augustus to his successors, the "farewell" address of Washington to his countrymen!

But this is the last annual message of Andrew Jackson! I would, for him and his country, that it was any thing but what it is. And why is it what it is? Gentlemen will pardon me—I mean nothing disrespectful to the President—when I say they know it is due to candor and truth to say—it is what it is, because it is not the message at all of Andrew Jackson! They know that, immediately upon the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the President and his Prime Ministers were dispersed from their duties at the seat of Government, and from the cares of public business, on their respective missions to the States of this Union. He of State bore despatches to Georgia, and the "Old Chief himself" was lugged along through Western Virginia, over

"Ruts and ridges,
And bridges,
Made of planks,
In open ranks"

to Tennessee and Alabama. It is a pity, sir, that more of the people had not witnessed the Executive electioneering tour, for then, perhaps, more of the States would have followed the example of Georgia and Tennessee, neither of which could be seduced or intimidated into the support of "the man"—a Tennessee toast said, "the dog"—as well as "the master." I am told that they carried him about like a lion for show, and made him roar like a lion. They had catechisms prepared for him, and the negotiations of the mission were conducted by preconcerted questions and answers. A crowd would collect—on the highway or in the bar-rooms, no matter which—and some "village politician" of "the party" would inquire—"What think you, General, of such a man?" In a loud tone, much too stentorian for those lungs which are now lacerated, the answer rung—"He is a traitor, sir." "There, there!" repeated the demagogues to the crowd—"did you not hear that?" "What think you of another, General?" "He is a liar, sir." "What of another?" "He is a black-cockade Federalist!" Of another? "He made a speech for which he paid some stenographer five dollars!" And another was—"Of no account—no account, sir, and ought to be sent home to have his place supplied by a more efficient man;" and another was—"Upon the fence, sir—upon the fence!" "But, General, what think you of Mr. (the first time Reuben was ever called Mister!) Reuben M. Whitney?" "There is no just cause of complaint against Mr. Whitney, sir; he is as true a patriot as ever was; they are all liars who accuse him of aught wrong, and the official documents prove them to be so!" All the while these responses were repeated by the deacons of the service, and the people were called to give heed to them. Those who saw the farce and the frauds, did heed them, sir—did heed them.

My friend (Mr. P.) told them that they would kill him: that there was too much travel and fatigue; too much standing and talking; too much bustle and excitement for a weak and infirm old man to bear. But still, they showed him about, in the heat of summer, and still they made him roar, until he frightened the people, who at last began to apprehend he was a lion come to devour their freedom of elections, and all else they valued as dear. Defeated in his mission, he at length became disgusted himself, chagrined, and mortified. He returned to Washington through Ohio, and by the Guyandotte route, through Virginia again, and has been sick and disabled ever since. The loss of Tennessee, particularly the Hermitage, excited him still more, and this renewed excitement may have caused that hemorrhage at the lungs which has been pouring out the current of his life. At no moment since his return has he been able to write or dictate a message. There he has been lying, as it were, a dead lion, who could not even "shake the dew drop from his mane," and his couch of infirmity has been haunted by the Perennises and Clanders of his palace as by Vampires. In their hands has he fallen, and it is because this "last annual message" comes to us and the country reeking with the fumes of the Kitchen Cabinet, that it is what it is!

What is it? The worst as well as the last annual message which Andrew Jackson ever wrote—I had like to have said, ever sent to both Houses of Congress. Its vanity and egotism—its profane hypocrisy, and solemn mockery of the good man's supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe—its sophistical nonsense, showing its duplicity to a foreign power, and concealing its real policy from ourselves—its low ad captandam arguments, addressed to all the prejudices of ignorance and passion, to justify the most shameful attacks upon the currency for the vile purposes of licensed depredators on the public lands—its glaring falsehoods as to the most important facts of trade, currency, banks of deposit, and finance—its electioneering, continually harping upon an institution dead in fact, and thrice wounded since dead—its oft-repeated homily against one good bank, and its unblushing recommendation, in the same breath, of nearly half one hundred bad and irresponsible banks—its disingenuous attempts to reconcile glaring inconsistencies of the President on the deposit and distribution measures—its pitiful apologies for the disgrace of our arms by Ocoila—its bold recommendation of an increase of the standing army—its unjust attempt to cast censure, due to the errors and blunders of the administration itself, upon the shoulders of an innocent State officer, and then calling for an appropriation to repair these same errors which it says are not those of this Government—its false claim of a national policy, founded in humanity towards the Indians—its reiterated jesuitical recommendation of an amendment of the Constitution as to the election of President, which was never meant to be carried into effect by "the party," or to be any thing more than a topic with which to prejudice the people's minds against an election by the House—its impudent boast of the intelligence and patriotism of the successor, whom Executive patronage and dictation have succeeded in electing—its shallow political economy—its demagoguism—its arts of vile deception and humbuggery—its ranking venom of party spirit—its miserable rhetoric, sinking below criticism—its grovelling and moral sentiment—its total want of all sage counsel or advice, and of all pathos and feeling—are all equalled only by its false certificate in chief to "the prosperous condition of all the various Executive Departments," to "the ability and integrity" with which they have been conducted, and to the fact of the President's belief "that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation!"

Now, sir, complaints have been loudly made from various quarters, by this House and in the press, by responsible persons, as to the condition of most of the Executive Departments, and as to the want of ability and integrity with which they have been conducted; and investigations by us of the truth or falsehood, justice or injustice, of these complaints, have, heretofore, been doggedly and repeatedly refused. "The party" were content with the mere affirmation by the President to the crowd of their innocence and purity, when he knew no more about their guilt than he knew of the facts of a certain event in this Capitol last winter, of which you and I, Mr. Chairman, knew all, and more than we wanted to know; about which, if the Tennessee papers are to be believed, the President has given another certificate, though he was more than a mile off, and there were at least seven fathoms of bricks and mortar and stone between him and the place of the occurrence. They have made him a witness in both cases where it was impossible for him to be a witness, and in giving his testimony he has been compelled to resort to his "imagination for his facts." I cared nothing about the certificates of the President so long as they abided in the ephemeral form of heated partisan declarations along the public roads, or so long as they were read from the stump merely a thousand miles off. But, sir, this "certificate in chief" is no longer a mere tavern ipse dixit on the highway, but it is to be filed in the archives of this Government as a part and parcel of the "last annual message" of the Greatest and Best! Perennis and Clander have certified to their own good behavior, innocence, and purity, have incorporated their certificate in the "last annual message," and have affixed to it the official manual of Andrew Jackson.

Is this certificate true? I put it to the gentlemen if it be not true, whether injustice has not been done to Andrew Jackson, to those who have uttered just complaints, and to the public service, by this audacious forged self-acquittal?

Is it true or false, that the various Executive Departments have been conducted with ability and integrity, and that they are in a prosperous condition? That is the issue. How is to be tried? Will gentlemen tell me that the President has tried the issue already, and that they are content with his certificate in form. Sir, I begin this session as I ended the last session, by asking the opportunity and power, and by claiming the right of an investigation by a committee, an efficient, able, and fair committee, with full powers to eviccate the truth. The truth is all I desire. I make no accusations, no complaints, except of the denial of investigation.

If all have been conducted with ability and integrity, the Departments have nothing to fear, and investigation may do great good. If it does not find and expose past fraud and corruption, it may prevent much evil hereafter, by the fear of scrutiny. I do sincerely, from the best of motives, earnestly desire to see the doers of the Treasury Department, of the Land Offices, of the Indian Bureau, and of other departments and offices, thrown open to full and fair investigation. We then can have the facts of which to judge for ourselves, and on which to make up our own verdict. It is the duty of the grand inquest to find or ignore a bill for itself, and of the venire to try the issue, and find a verdict for itself. No judge, much more no party, shall find a bill, true or false, or render a verdict for them. Cleanse the Augean stables, say I, and I say more. The Numidian king, when he was carried a captive to Rome, and saw the corruptions of her citizens, returned from the city with contempt, and said, "Give me wallah, and I will buy up the whole Republic." Fanny Wright, I believe, uttered a truth, that whenever you see two men talking together, there are ten chances to one they are talking on one of three subjects—"trade, politics, or religion." The three subjects have, since she wrote the remark, entirely amalgamated into two. Trade and politics have now become one. Some of the priests, I am told, are offering to join the union, and mammon is the god of this day's worship. Trade, sir, trade swallows up every thing!

Tell me not this is the short session. Investigation was refused last winter, when the session was long. I know, sir, that this is an inauspicious period, perhaps, to expect gentlemen to look back at the past, or to pause a moment on the present. I know that every eye is turned, and every mind of gentlemen is bent towards the future. "Coming events, which cast their shadows before," are much more dazzling to their hopes and fancies, than painful truths of the past or the present are to their memories or their wills. They know, sir, that some of the swarm of "Conservatives" which are now fat and full of the blood of the Treasury, must be driven off for some of the lank and hungry "foco foco" flies, who are voraciously eager to light upon this poor body politic of ours. All things may not become new, but there must be some changes; and for every change there will be a chance for some impatient expectant. I know that General Jackson has been made to say in this "last annual message"—"He that cometh after me is mightier than I;" but he has not been made to add—"Whose fist is in his hand, and 'he will thoroughly purge his floor.'" Sir, lest he may not purge his floor, I wish it to be swept clean for him before comes in, so that Jackson may not be blamed after he is gone.

Certain it is I cannot anticipate; time must develop the course and the policy of the coming administration. And let no one accuse me of commencing an attack upon it in advance. No, sir; so far from it, though I hold Mr. Van Buren responsible for most mischief that has been done, and most that is now doing; though he has been the caucus candidate for the Presidency, and was the nominated successor; though he is elected by Executive patronage, corruption, and dissimulation; though he succeeds at the expense of the elective franchise; though he is a minority President, and has promised to follow generally in footsteps of this Kitchen Cabinet administration; yet, if he bravely dares to falsify that promise "more honored in the breach than in the observance;" if he will kick away the base ladders by which he has climbed to the height of his ambition; if he will now leave Falstaff where he found him, and array around him the wisdom, intelligence, and virtue of the country, and base his administration on a sound, elevated, and enlightened policy, free from corruption, and purely patriotic, uncontaminated by party, I will pledge my humble support to his measures, though I never can support the man, or pardon the past examples he has set. And why can I not support the man whilst I approve his measures? For the very reason that he has not "entered in at the strait gate." I shall always eschew the example which has been set in 1835, as I did that of 1825, in the election of President of these United States. The one example has been rebuked with a vengeance—the other will not be forgiven by me.

Sir, in this contest one great battle only has been fought between power and the people. The result is known. The conflict was not decisive and must, as long as there is an honest heart to hope for freedom—shall go on until constitutional liberty, law, the independence of the people, and their representatives, honesty, truth, and justice, are triumphant, or all are fettered, in a despot's chains! Defeated, but not conquered; checked by the Praetorian bands of patronage, but not arrested in their onward march; the patriot army is not discouraged or dismayed; smitten, but not struck down, the flag of the country is still flying! Defeat may drive some, the craven or the coward of spoils, from the standard of the true and the brave, but to the firm and proud spirits of the patriot band I would say: "Who shall separate us from the love of country?" Shall defeat? Another such defeat will be a glorious victory! In this "we are more than conquerors," for I am persuaded that neither office, nor bribe, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of our country, its laws, and its liberties! God only knows in whose name this victory shall be achieved; it matters not; but this I know, he who he may, his cause will be consecrated by the toils, the prayers, the sacrifices, and the hopes of the unsubdued and untamed freeman. No, sir; let no man despair of the Republic. The fight is not yet ended. The people are not yet vanquished. Their hosts are withdrawn only for the moment to recruit their forces, and to repair their broken weapons. The weapons of our warfare are the weapons of truth. It shall be my duty to assist in pointing anew its spears and its lances.

The question on the resolution was then taken without further debate, and carried—yeas, 66, nays 7.

So the resolution was adopted.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

SPEECH OF MR. PICKENS, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

[As reported by the National Intelligencer.]

In House of Representatives, January 3, 1837.—On the resolution proposing an inquiry into the condition of the Executive Departments.

MR. PICKENS observed that it had not been originally his intention when this resolution was first brought before the House by his friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) to have taken any part in the debate; but from what he had heard in the course of this important discussion, the strange, and he must say monstrous doctrine which he had heard advanced by the supporters of the administration; he had been led to change his original intention, and would now, therefore, offer a few observations on this subject.

In opposition to the resolution which calls for a select committee with power to make a thorough investigation into the conduct of the Departments, we have been told that there are already standing committees in existence constituted by this House, with full powers to make all the investigations which are proposed by this resolution. Let any gentleman (said Mr. P.) read the rules and the duties assigned to these committees, and I put it to this House if such an asseveration is any thing else but a shallow and flimsy pretext brought forward with the design of disguising and covering an unworthy vote against the appointment of the select committee called for by the original resolution.

The duties of the standing committees of the House are to investigate accounts, to inquire into the various expenditures of the different Departments, of the disbursements made, and the vouchers of our public officers, &c. They were never intended to embrace such objects as are contemplated in the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise.) These standing committees never supposed it to be within their range of duties to investigate the transactions of your officers with the land speculations of the country, or that stupendous tissue of fraud, speculation, and villany, connected with your Indian agencies, Indian reservations, their locations and transfers, which, if ever fully revealed, will develop a system of legalized crime and plunder utterly disgraceful to any civilized Government. Besides, all these transactions connected with the deposit banks and their agents so full of suspicion, come peculiarly under the cognisance of a select committee, with the power to send for persons and papers, which power is not given to the standing committees of the House.

But, sir, (said Mr. P.) amongst the various efforts and pretenses ingeniously raised to smother the inquiry now called for, there was one argument, it can be called such, that fell from the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann,) which excited in him the profoundest astonishment and surprise. This gentleman intimated that the demand for a select committee to inquire into the Departments, to send for persons and papers, and to probe into the dark deeds of unfaithful public agents, is unconstitutional! He (Mr. Mann) says that this proceeding is to be viewed in the light of a general search warrant! and therefore argues that it is contrary to the Constitution!

Mr. P. then read the clause in the amendments to the Constitution on that point, as follows: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or thing to be seized." Now, sir, (said Mr. P.) since the time when Algernon Sidney had his private papers in his private apartments searched because they were supposed to contain treason against a suspicious and arbitrary Government, such an idea as is now attempted to be extorted from this clause in the Constitution, he would venture to say, had never entered into the mind of any man. So, then, according to this perverted and strange interpretation, that great principle, incorporated into the system of English liberty, and transferred to our Constitution, which was intended to raise a shield over the rights of private citizens against the lawless search of an usurping and despotic Government, is now to be understood as intended and designed to protect and screen a bad Government and its evil agents in deeds of fraud, corruption, and malversation. Yes, sir, (said Mr. P.) this clause in your Constitution, according to learned commentators of these profligate times, is not intended to protect the people against encroachments of a harassing Government, but to cover Government from the scrutinizing inquiries of a free people! It is a clause intended to shield the officers of a corrupt dynasty in their abandoned career of fraud and speculation, but not designed to protect private citizens against capricious and unwarrantable search into their private dwellings and private papers! Surely such an idea as this could never enter the mind of any man, except one who had bowed the knee of sycophancy so long before the throne of power, that his heart was prepared to worship at the shrine of any image which his master might hold up as the popular idol of the day.

Sir, (said Mr. P.) it is the first time in my life that I ever heard that the papers, records, and documents of public offices, and of the officers, were to be viewed as private property, belonging to private individuals, and as such, to be exempted from inquiry and investigation. Such a doctrine he confessed was new to him; it is a doctrine directly at war with liberty; it is a doctrine calculated to lead to the most monstrous and fatal results. And if this is to be the doctrine practised upon by the coming administration, it is full time that a deceived country should know it. No, sir, all the papers and documents, all the offices of this Government, are not private; they belong not to private gentlemen, they are not sheltered by the Constitution from investigation, they are the property of the Confederacy, and the right over them, the right of search, the right of thorough investigation, belongs to this House; belongs to us, the representatives of a free people. We stand here as guardians of popular rights; as a co-ordinate and independent branch of this Government; and we are base traitors to our country if we diminish or weaken our rights, if we abandon the proud prerogatives guaranteed to us under the Constitution we have sworn to defend.

Again, sir, the amendment to this resolution, which has been proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. D. J. Pearce,) has not excited less surprise and astonishment in my mind, than the doctrine I have just adverted to. Mr. PICKENS said he could view that amendment as nothing more than a pretext to shield the perpetrators of fraud against all inquiry and discovery by the people. (It said Mr. P.) I was not mistaken in what that gentleman maintained, I understood him to say that the officers of the Government are agents of the Executive; that they are responsible alone to the Executive; and that that he, the Executive, is responsible to the American people, and may be impeached before the Senate by the vote of this House. Such, in substance, was the argument of the gentleman. According to this doctrine, the people, by their representatives, have no control whatever over the officers of the Government; they are independent of the people; distinct from the people; and removed out of our reach, and out of our power. But I would have that gentleman to know that we, as well as the officers of the Government, constitute a part of the Government; we, the representatives of the people, create by six taxes these offices, and define the duties of the officers; we fix and pay their salaries; they are officers of this House as well as of the Executive himself, created by our authority, and amenable to us for all their conduct. I know that, for the last six or eight years, the contrary doctrine has been inculcated and enforced; this House has only been considered as a part of the Executive, whose only duty was to record the edicts of royalty, or give sanction to its wishes. There can be no more certain evidence of the decay of this Republic, than for this House to sleep upon its privileges, and quietly acquiesce under the accumulation of Executive power. But, sir, I call upon every gentleman who feels himself to be a freeman, the representative of a free people, not to abandon their proud prerogative, but to claim the high character and privilege of this House to know their power, and to have the independence to assert it. Yes, sir, I invoke the spirit of the entombed Constitution to preside over, and to guard the power and the privileges of this House. I am utterly opposed to this modern doctrine, which makes us the mere agents of the Executive, a secondary branch of the Government only! If we are indeed thus prostituted, lost, and humbled, if we have ceased to be what the Constitution intended, it is time that we should know it. If we are used merely to play the part of the Rump Parliament, yielding up every thing quietly to the will of the Executive, shielding him and his agents in every act, subserving his ambition, and aiding him and his officers to trample down the consecrated barriers of freedom, and to pursue unchecked their lawless career, it is time the world should know the infamy that has fallen upon us!

The amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) is merely a pretext, made for the purpose of evading a direct vote upon the original resolution; that amendment provides that, if, in the course of events, any cause for a specific charge should exist, then the right of sending for persons and papers shall be given. We do not stand in the situation of a private citizen at issue with a private citizen; we are not bound to make an affidavit in order to obtain a search warrant; we are not bound to make specific charges in order to obtain permission for investigation. Each member acts upon this floor in his official capacity, and is responsible before the country. We are the representatives of the people, and, as the source and chief depository of power, we have the right to demand investigation, without assigning specific charges. We have the right to investigate all the offices and papers, (except perhaps those that cannot safely be made public, relating to foreign diplomacy,) and archives of the Government, and of all its agents in every department; and this right is essential to maintain the purity of our Government and of our institutions. "But," say the supporters of the administration, "why raise a select committee? Why incur this expense?" Answer, is it not better for them to incur this expense, than that they should sit under the suspicion of corrupt conduct? If the investigation should bring nothing to light, will it not then have been better for the Government, by having had this opportunity of showing its purity and establishing its character? Will it not look better to suffer this investigation to take place, than to let suspicion spread, by suffering charges of such serious character to pass by unnoted and unrepelled?

Mr. P. said he was not one of those demagogues whose mouths are ever pouring forth declarations of their attachment to the people, but I confess I am democrat enough to proclaim our rights in opposition to the insidious encroachments of Government. I avow that I am for the power and the rights of the people being felt practically in this Government, while those who are always declaiming for those rights seem to come here but to smother and suppress them. They profess to be the advocates of the popular cause, while they are all found arrayed in close phalanx on the side of power, purring out eulogies upon the administration; screening its officers, justifying acts of fraud and corruption, and opposing the people in their demand for inquiry and investigation! Though the party to which I have the honor of belonging has been stigmatized and traduced as the enemy of popular rights, I profess, sir, my attachment to them. I have undying devotion to the liberties of my country, and I hope yet to live to see the day when the rights of the people, the rights and power of this House, shall no longer be trampled under foot by base subservience to Executive power by those who bow the knee to its mandates, and crowd in eager anxiety to beg the crumbs that fall from the table of a royal master.

Yes, sir, (continued Mr. P.) I hope to live to see the day when the doctrines we have heard asserted on this floor will be lost and forgotten amid the glory of purer and brighter days—when the representatives of the people shall have their rights and proudly maintain their authority under the Constitution—when pilgrims and votaries of liberty from every quarter of the oppressed earth shall gather together here, and bow in reverence before that monument which a free people shall raise, whose noble shaft shall pierce the very heavens, reflecting back from its broad and radiant surface, the light of everlasting truth and the beams of universal freedom.

Mr. P. continued. Mr. Speaker! I cannot refrain from declaring the profound astonishment with which I listened to the extraordinary facts related on this floor by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) in relation to the electioneering campaign made by the President last summer through the Western country. We have heard that he has been zealously engaged in the work of securing a successor to his power and authority. We heard of his interference in this matter, of his labors and undignified speeches in the contemptible work of raising into power one who lived by fawning upon his hand. Mortifying and disgusting as these facts are, not less astonishing did it appear to me, when in answer to them we heard the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Glascock) and the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Ripley) rise in their seats, and instead of offering apology or denial, exert themselves to justify and vindicate the interference. Sir! I well remember the "Gwinnett letter," which indirectly ordered the Ruckerized convention at Baltimore to do the bidding of a master. I knew well that the successor had been appointed, but I did not know, I did not believe, that I should see the day when a representative of a free but betrayed people would rise in his place in this House, and vindicate such appointment.

We are told, in apology for an interference as unconstitutional as it has been undisguised and shameless, that the President has a right to speak his own opinions, "that he is a free man as well as any other citizen," "that he is a man who was never known to hesitate in the frank assertion of his opinion," &c. The private opinion of the President is one thing, the public declaration of his wishes is another. Whenever his opinion, whatever it may be, be private or be public, is sustained with all the power and influence of office, is enforced from cabinet ministers down to all the petty holders of office, is proclaimed and preached by menial sycophants and a subsidized press, notoriously under the dictation of power, then, sir! the President's private opinion and preference become a law to a hundred thousand mercenary followers, who live upon his will.

Every people, from their history and education, have a peculiar criterion by which to judge of liberty. In England an idiot or a knave may sway the sceptre of empire by the law of legitimacy, and the plumes of a titled nobility may wave over stars and garters, and yet the Englishman may proudly claim to be a freeman; and why? Because these things are sustained by the fundamental principles of the British Constitution as part of their authorized and lawful Government. But when Cromwell raised his Government over the ruins of the British Constitution, and against the fundamental laws of the empire, although he added to the glory and the power of the British name, yet he was a dictator, and the people were slaves no longer as they acquiesced in the usurpation. So it is here. We live in a land of constitutional law, every principle of which sustains the freedom of the elective franchise, from the highest to the lowest. If this great principle of American liberty be violated and defied by Executive dictation, no matter what character is raised up as the successor of power under such a dynasty, we are slaves and outcasts if we tamely acquiesce. As far as practical liberty is concerned, there is no difference in effect, as to the people interested, between the Government of him who comes in, trampling over the freedom of election through dictation, bribery, and fraud, and he who comes into power waving over the desolated fields of his country the bloody sword of a conqueror and usurper. As to all practical effects, they are the same.

Is there any man in this House who does not know that the President elect could not have been chosen but by the direct influence and interference of the President? Let no man say there is no proof of this interference. Independent of the facts stated by my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) and the published letters, toasts, &c. of the President himself, I will now call the attention of this House, and of this country, to some facts, upon which I would defy any sworn jury of freemen on earth to bring in a verdict of "not guilty." I will introduce a witness against whom hirelings have poured out their malignity and calumny, but whose veracity and private integrity no man dare impeach. I will give the language of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, (Judge White,) as it is published in his speech at Knoxville last summer. When the President was on a visit to Tennessee, in the summer of 1834, and after the rise of the State convention, many members wished to nominate me for the Presidency, but abandoned the attempt after they understood that it would incur the President's displeasure. On his journey to Washington the President conversed freely with some of my friends, and remonstrated against any attempt to nominate me; said there must be a national convention, and Mr. Van Buren ought to be nominated for the Presidency, and for the Vice Presidency, and, when his eight years were expired, that I was young enough then to be taken up as President. "After I gave my consent to the people to run, and before the meeting of the Baltimore Convention, I was repeatedly forewarned what I might expect if my name was not withdrawn," &c.

Such are the unvarnished facts of the case. And who is there bold enough to deny that the President has interfered? Sir, the facts are beyond the possibility of denial, that he has openly interfered, and used his power and authority to nominate his successor, and to do it by bargain and arrangement. Every paltry intrigue and profligate proposition have been used and employed to effect this purpose. The chief offices of the Republic have been bartered away, and the President, through the tremendous power and patronage of his position, has called up a betrayed country to receive its rulers from the hands of a master.

To see the force and bearing of these propositions which the President made, and to show that he fully understood his position and their profligate tendency, I will now refer to a scene in 1825, when his predecessor was chosen by this House. In two letters written by General Jackson, the one dated June 5, 1827, and the other dated July 18, we have the following extraordinary development:

"Early in January, 1825, a member of Congress of high respectability visited me (General Jackson) one morning, and observed that he had a communication he was desirous to make to me; that he was informed there was a great intrigue going on, and that it was right I should be informed of it; (how very kind!) that he came as a friend; and let me receive the communication as I might, the friendly motives through which it was made, he hoped, would prevent any change of friendship or feeling with regard to him. To which I replied, from his high standing as a gentleman and member of Congress, and from his uniform friendly and gentlemanly conduct towards myself, I could not suppose he would make any communication to me which he supposed was improper. Therefore, his motives being pure, let me think as I might of the communication, my feelings towards him would remain unaltered. The gentleman proceeded. He said he had been informed by the friends of Mr. Clay that the friends of Mr. Adams had made overtures to them, saying, if Mr. Clay and his friends would unite in aid of the election of Mr. Adams, Mr. Clay should be Secretary of State. That the friends of Mr. Adams were urging, as a reason to induce the friends of Mr. Clay to accede to their proposition, that if I was elected President, Mr. Adams would be continued Secretary of State. ["Intendo, there would be no room for Kentucky."] That the friends of Mr. Clay stated that the West did not wish to separate from the West; and if I would say, or permit any of my confidential friends to say, that, in case I was elected President, Mr. Adams should not be continued Secretary of State, by a complete union of Mr. Clay and his friends, they would put an end to the Presidential contest in one hour. And he was of opinion it was right to fight such intriguers with their own weapons. To which, in substance, I replied, that in politics, as in every thing else, my guide was principle; and, contrary to the expressed and unbiassed will of the people, or their constituent agents, I never would step into the Presidential chair; and requested him to say to Mr. Clay and his friends (for I did suppose he had come from Mr. Clay, though he used the term of Mr. Clay's friends) that before I would reach the Presidential chair by such means of BARGAIN and CORRUPTION, I would see the earth open and swallow both Mr. Clay and his friends, and myself with them. This disclosure was made to me by Mr. James Buchanan, a member of Congress from Pennsylvania, a gentleman of the first respectability and intelligence.

"The evening before, he had communicated, substantially, the same proposition to Major Eaton, my colleague in the Senate. [How did the General know that?] With a desire, warmly manifested, that he should communicate with me, and ascertain my views on the subject. This he declined doing, suggesting to Mr. Buchanan that he, as well as himself, could converse with me, and ascertain my views on the matter; though, from his knowledge of me, he thought that he could well conjecture my answer—that I would enter into no engagements whatever. To be thus approached by a gentleman of Mr. Buchanan's high character and standing, with an apology proffered at the time for what he was about to remark to me; one who, as I understood, had always to that moment been on familiar and friendly terms with Mr. Clay, assuring me that on certain terms and conditions being assented to on my part, then, by a union of Mr. Clay and his friends, they would put an end to the Presidential contest in one hour, what other conclusion or inference was to be made than that he spoke by authority either of Mr. Clay himself, or some of his confidential friends? The character of Mr. Buchanan with me forbids the idea that he was acting on his own responsibility, or that, under any circumstances, he could have been induced to propose an arrangement unless he possessed of satisfactory assurances that, if accepted, it would be carried fully into effect. A weak mind would seldom or ever be thus disposed to act—an intelligent one never. Under all the circumstances appearing at the time, I did not resist the impression that Mr. Buchanan had approached me on the cautiously submitted proposition of some authorized person; and, therefore, in giving him my answer, did so, requesting him to say 'to say to Mr. Clay and his friends,' what that answer had been," &c.

Observe what Mr. Buchanan says in his letter of explanation, August 8, 1827:

"After I had finished, the General [Jackson] declared he had not the least objection to answer my question. That he thought well of Mr. Adams, but had never said or intimated that he would or that he would not appoint him Secretary of State. That these were secrets he would keep to himself; he would conceal them from the very hairs of his head. That if he believed his right hand then knew what his left would do upon the subject of appointments to office, he would cut it off and cast it into the fire. That if ever he should be elected President, it should be without solicitation and without intrigue," &c.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to expose contradictions, or to defend those against whom these charges were made. But I call up these scenes that the world may compare the mock sentiments of affected purity then expressed, with the conduct and notorious facts of the present day. And I here take occasion to say that, if it be true, as the President says, that he was approached in January, 1825, with such propositions from a gentleman who declared to him "that he thought it was right to fight such intriguers with their own weapons"—I say, if this be true, it proclaims that he who could avoid so base and infamous a sentiment was utterly destitute of all true conceptions of private honor or public integrity.

If the President, in 1825, had such a high sense of honor and respect "for the unbiased will of the people" as to refuse to let it be known—not that he would appoint any particular individual, but that he would not appoint a certain gentleman Secretary of State—where was his honor, where was his delicacy, in 1834, when he proposed to Judge White and "his friends" to regulate and control the whole election by a Ruckered convention, and through "BARGAIN and CORRUPTION" to produce acquiescence by offering himself the first office in the Republic to one, and reconciling another with the second office? Little did he think that, in 1825, he was uttering denunciations against his own course in 1834; little did he think, when he penned these declarations in 1827, that he was writing epithets to be called up, like burning letters, over his own conduct and character in 1836.

Mr. P. continued. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pain and reluctance that I am compelled to speak of these transactions as I feel that I ought. Nothing could induce me to do so at present but the solemn conviction that I believe they are deeply identified with the liberties of this country. I speak of the President as officially connected with the institutions of freedom. I scorn to excuse him, and to hold up his minions and understrappers for responsibility and denunciations. No, sir! I disdain to use moderate language. I shall take his own epithets here, then, charge that the President has wilfully and openly interfered to appoint his successor, and that he has endeavored to accomplish his object by shameless "bargain and corruption." He has succeeded, and now, standing on the defaced and spurned Constitution, waves aloft the unrestrained sceptre of empire over a deceived and betrayed country. Let us be rich and prosperous; let us be happy and free from personal restraint; let us retain all the forms of a Republic, yet are we slaves, and history will hold up our infamy and degradation, if we acquiesce and submit to this lawless dictation. Rome still retained the forms of a republic, long after her conquering generals from devastated provinces brought in the plunder of sacked cities, to be divided amongst those who were styled "Roman citizens." Her people still nominally elected their tribunes, long after the very sources of power had been corrupted and polluted by the bribery and profligacy of capivating chiefs and abandoned demagogues. These tribunes, who were at first elected to defend, as they nobly did, popular rights, afterwards became prostituted, and, although ostensibly appointed still by the people, yet they knew the hand of their master, and prostrated the liberties of their country before his will. They were arranged and appointed beforehand by those who held the power of the Republic. We, too, may still boast the forms of a free people, and long preserve them. We have seen the nomination and appointment of a successor to the chief Executive; we have witnessed the success of that appointment. All the popularity and influence of the President, with his hundred thousand dependants; all the weight and power, and influence of the Government, in all its vast and extensive ramifications, have been brought to bear upon the appointment of a successor. And I ask, sir, if we confirm, by re-election, this fraudulent appointment, will not posterity say we too, are free men in name? Our country has been foully deceived; we have been basely deluded by all the arts of "intrigue, bargain, and corruption." Let it not be said that these charges are of no importance; that they have no effect upon practical liberty. Look to their consequences in the future. In physics, in morals, and in politics, those causes are at first small which produce the most tremendous effects upon the destiny of man. The collection of a few shillings of ship-money brought the head of a monarch to the block and changed, for a time, the Government of Great Britain. Go into the far West, and trace out, if you can, the origin of the vast Mississippi itself; you will find a bubble at the foot of perhaps some nameless hill, from which runs a stream, at the ripple of whose waters not a living creature turns aside; but follow it to the valley below, and it swells, and it deepens, and it widens, until the wealth of a nation floats on its surface, and at the angry voice of whose stormy wave the hardy mariner trembles. I need not say that this is a full illustration of the history and progress of political affairs; that from apparently a small beginning the most tremendous results are produced; that one step over the great landmarks of the Constitution will lead to the overthrow of all law, to the prostration of liberty, and the abandoned reign of arbitrary power. A drop of water, oozing through the dykes of Holland, if unnoticed, would desolate the fairest regions, and spread terror through a ruined country. If now, in the infancy of our Government, the President has it in his power to nominate and appoint his successor, the day is not far distant when we shall live under a power more odious than hereditary monarchy, because it will be exercised under the deceitful name and habiliments of a Republic.

We are told that the South is to be "reconciled by the successor falling into southern principles," and that it is policy to acquiesce in the appointment. Sir, there may be at heart traitors in the South, but it will be treason to the Constitution and to the country to submit to the dictation. No! never, never. We have been foully betrayed, and against the principles of the succession we declare uncompromising, unextinguishable war, "war to the knife." It may be that we shall be few in numbers; it may be that our flag-staff shall be shattered and broken, but we will nail the flag to the gunwale, and conquer or perish under it.

Let not gentlemen suppose that the present state of things is to last for ever—let them not suppose that the dominant party of to-day is to be the dominant party of to-morrow—let them not, in the arrogance of power, for ever forget right. These things they may not perhaps feel in their day and generation, but their children may live to see the day when they shall curse, in the bitterness and deep anguish of their hearts, the memory of their fathers, for having brought down upon them degradation and ruin. Even Robespierre himself would have paused in his bloody career of ambition, if he could have foreseen that the same guillotine, which he raised over the neck of Danton, was so soon to be brought down with a just vengeance upon his own. And the Duke of Orleans, unprincipled as he was, when he sat in that infamous assembly which voted the death of Louis XVI, would have trembled with horror, as he gave his vote for the death of his own blood cousin, if he could have known that, under the despotism he was aiding to raise, his property was so soon to be confiscated, and his dripping head held up by the executioner to the vengeance of a lawless mob.

How can the South acquiesce under an administration, the head of which has admitted that this Government has the constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia? I tell gentlemen they will yet be brought to quail and tremble under the tremendous power of this doctrine. We will yet see the lightning flash, and feel the earthquake's heave. The issue will be made, and we must be prepared to meet it like men, or to crave mercy from one who is against us in sentiment and in feeling.

The coming administration has elements of weakness which it will be difficult to recover from. The opposition can never be satisfied with the corrupt and profligate principles under which it has been dictated. Look around and see the strength that is to be put forth. Where is old Massachusetts? There she is, firm as her granite and everlasting hills, ready for another contest. Look to those people on both sides of the Ohio, who have raised their flag over their country's ramparts, and have so nobly defended themselves against the mercenary bands of power; look to those intrepid people, through whose bosom run the waters of the Tennessee and the Cumberland—where are they all? Ready and eager to step forward in the breach that has been made over the barriers thrown around the freedom of the elective franchise. Look to those people on both sides of the Savannah, and where are they? United in feeling and in sentiment, with one banner streaming aloft in the breeze—that banner under which the Constitution was made—the banner under which Jefferson fought his way to victory and to fame—the only banner under which this Government can be reformed—the noble banner of free trade and State rights, under which defeat is no disgrace, and victory is redemption and liberty.

We may be defeated, but not conquered; we have yet the undying spirit of freemen. Then let us come to the rally, and the Republic may yet be safe.

Mr. PICKENS then concluded by moving the adoption of the original resolution.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

PROTEST OF MR. WEBSTER, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, Monday, January 16, 1837.—The debate on the Expunging resolution having closed, and the question being about to be taken—

Mr. WEBSTER rose and addressed the Senate as follows: Mr. President: Upon the truth and justice of the original resolution of the Senate, and upon the authority of the Senate to pass that resolution, I had an opportunity to express my opinions at a subsequent period, when the President's protest was before us. Those opinions remain altogether unchanged.

And now, had the Constitution secured the privilege of entering a PROTEST on the journal, I should not say one word on this occasion; although, if what is now proposed shall be accomplished, I know not what would have been the value of such a provision, however formally or carefully it might have been inserted in the body of that instrument.

But as there is no such constitutional privilege, I can only effect my purpose by thus addressing the Senate; and I rise, therefore, to make that PROTEST in this manner, in the face of the Senate, and in the face of the country, which I cannot present in any other form.

I speak in my own behalf, and in behalf of my colleague; we both speak as Senators from the State of Massachusetts, and, as such, we solemnly PROTEST against this whole proceeding.

We deny that Senators from other States have any power or authority to expunge: my vote or votes which we have given here, and which we have recorded, agreeably to the express provision of the Constitution.

We have a high personal interest, and the State whose representatives we are, has also a high interest, in the entire preservation of every part and parcel of the record of our conduct, as members of the Senate.

This record the Constitution solemnly declares shall be kept; but the resolution before the Senate declares that this record shall be expunged.

Whether subterfuge and evasion, and, as it appears to us, the degrading mockery of drawing black lines upon the journal, shall or shall not leave our names and our votes legible, when this violation of the record shall have been completed, still the terms "to expunge" and the terms "to keep," when applied to a record, import ideas exactly contradictory; as much so as the terms "to preserve" and the terms "to destroy."

A record which is expunged is not a record which is kept, any more than a record which is destroyed can be a record which is preserved. The part expunged is no longer part of the record; it has no longer a legal existence. It cannot be certified as a part of the proceeding of the Senate for any purpose of proof or evidence.

The object of the provision in the Constitution, as we think, most obviously is, that the proceedings of the Senate shall be preserved in writing, not for the present only, not until published only, because a copy of the printed journal is not regular legal evidence; but preserved indefinitely: preserved, as other records are preserved, till destroyed by time or accident.

Every one must see that matters of the highest importance depend on the permanent preservation of the journals of the two Houses. What but the journals show that bills have been regularly passed into law, through the several stages; what but the journals show who are members, or who is President, or Speaker, or Secretary, or Clerk of the body? What but the journal contains the proof, necessary for the justification of those who act under our authority, and who, without the power of producing such proof, must stand as trespassers? What but the journals show who is appointed, and who rejected, by us, on the President's nomination; or who is acquitted, or who convicted, in trials on impeachment? In short, is there, at any time, any other regular and legal proof of any act done by the Senate than the journal itself?

The idea, therefore, that the Senate is bound to preserve its journal only until it is published, and then may alter, mutilate, or destroy it at pleasure, appears to us one of the most extraordinary sentiments ever advanced.

We are deeply grateful to those friends who have shown, with so much clearness, that all the precedents relied on to justify or to excuse this proceeding, are either not to the purpose, or, from the times and circumstances at and under which they happened, are no way entitled to respect in a free Government, existing under a written Constitution. But, for ourselves, we stand on the plain words of that Constitution itself. A thousand precedents elsewhere made, whether ancient or modern, can neither rescind, nor control, nor explain away these words.

The words are, that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings." No gloss, no ingenuity, no specious interpretation, and much less can any fair or just reasoning, reconcile the process of expunging with the plain meaning of these words, to the satisfaction of the common sense and honest understanding of mankind.

If the Senate may now expunge one part of the journal of a former session, it may, with equal authority, expunge another part, or the whole. It may expunge the entire record of any one session, or of all sessions.

It seems to us inconceivable how any men can regard such a power, and its exercise at pleasure, as consistent with the integrity of the Constitution. It can make no difference what is the completeness or incompleteness of the act of expunging, or by what means done; whether by erasure, obliteration, or defacement; if by defacement, as here proposed, whether one word, or many words are written on the face of the record; whether little ink or much ink is shed on the paper, or whether some part, or the whole, of the original written journal may yet by possibility be traced. If the act done be an act to expunge, to blot out, to obliterate, to erase the record, then the record is expunged, blotted out, obliterated, and erased. And mutilation and alteration violate the record as much as obliteration or erasure. A record, subsequently altered, is not the original record. It no longer gives a just account of the proceedings of the Senate. It is no longer true. It is, in short, no journal of the real and actual proceedings of the Senate, such as the Constitution says each House shall keep.

The Constitution, therefore, is, in our deliberate judgment, violated by this proceeding in the most plain and open manner.

The Constitution, moreover, provides that the yeas and nays on any question shall, at the request of one fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. This provision, most manifestly gives a personal right to those members who may demand it, to the entry and preservation of their votes on the record of the proceedings of the body, not for one day or one year only, but for all time. There the yeas and nays are to stand, for ever, as permanent and lasting proof of the manner in which members have voted on great and important questions before them.

But it is now insisted that the votes of members, taken by yeas and yeas, and thus entered on the journal, as matter of right, may still be expunged; so that that which it requires more than four-fifths of the Senators to prevent from being put on the journal, may nevertheless be struck off and erased the next morning, or at any period afterwards, by the will of a mere majority, or, if this be not admitted, then the absurdity is adopted of maintaining that this provision of the Constitution is fulfilled by merely preserving the yeas and nays on the journal, after having expunged and obliterated the very resolution, or the very question, on which they were given, and to which alone they refer; leaving the yeas and nays thus a mere list of names connected with no subject, no question, no vote. We put it to the impartial judgment of mankind, if this proceeding be not, in this respect also, directly and palpably inconsistent with the Constitution.

We protest, in the most solemn manner, that other Senators have no authority to deprive us of our personal rights, secured to us by the Constitution, either by expunging, or oblitterating, or mutilating, or defacing, the record of our votes, duly entered by yeas and nays; or by expunging and oblitterating the resolutions or questions on which those votes were given and recorded.

We have seen, with deep and sincere pain, the Legislatures of respectable States instructing the Senators of those States to vote for and support this violation of the journal of the Senate; and this pain is infinitely increased by our full belief, and entire conviction, that most, if not all these proceedings of States had their origin in promptings from Washington; that they have been urgently requested and insisted on as being necessary to the accomplishment of the intended purpose; and that it is nothing else but the influence and power of the Executive branch of this Government which has brought the Legislatures of so many of these States of this Union to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties for the purpose of co-operating to accomplish a measure, in our judgment, so unconstitutional, so derogatory to the character of the Senate, and marked with so broad an impression of compliance with power.

But this resolution is to pass. We expect it. That cause, which has been powerful enough to influence so many State Legislatures, will show itself powerful enough, especially with such aids, to secure the passage of the resolution here.

We make up our minds to behold the spectacle which is to ensue.

We collect ourselves to look on, in silence, while a scene is exhibited which, if we did not regard it as a ruthless violation of a sacred instrument, would appear to us to be little elevated above the characters of a contumacious force.

This scene we shall behold, and hundreds of American citizens, as many as may crowd into these lobbies and galleries, will behold it also: and with what feelings! Do not undertake to say.

But we protest, we most solemnly protest, against the substance and against the manner of this proceeding, against its object, against its form, and against its effect. We tell you that you have no right to mar or mutilate the record of our votes given here, and recorded according to the Constitution; we tell you that you may as well erase the yeas and nays on any other question or resolution, or on all questions and resolutions, as on this; we tell you that you have just as much right to falsify the record, by so altering it as to make us appear to have voted on any question, as we did not vote, as you have to erase a record, and make that page a blank, in which our votes, as they were actually given and recorded, now stand. The one proceeding, as it appears to us, is as much a falsification of the record as the other.

Having made this PROTEST, our duty is performed. We rescue our own names, character, and honor from all participation in this matter; and whatever the wayward character of the times, the headlong and plunging spirit of party devotion, or the fear or the love of power, may have been able to bring about elsewhere, we desire to thank God that they have not, as yet, overcome the love of Liberty, fidelity to true republican principles, and a sacred regard for the Constitution, in that State whose soil was drenched, to a mire, by the first and best blood of the Revolution. Massachusetts, as yet, has not been conquered; and while we have the honor to hold seats here as her Senators, we shall never consent to a sacrifice either of her rights, or our own; we shall never fail to oppose what we regard as a plain and open violation of the Constitution of the country; and we should have thought ourselves wholly unworthy of her if we had not, with all the solemnity and earnestness in our power, protested against the adoption of the resolution now before the Senate.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

SPEECH OF MR. BAYARD, OF DELAWARE.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, Jan. 16, 1837.—On the Expunging Resolution.

MR. BAYARD said that, notwithstanding he had not before had an opportunity of expressing his opinion on the subject now under discussion, yet he should have been unwilling at this late hour to have prepassed on the time and attention of the Senate, had he not felt it to be a duty which he owed to himself and to his immediate constituents, to contend and protest against a measure which he believed to be a violation of the Constitution. I say, sir, constituents, for, in my theory of this Government, we are all the representatives of the people, though chosen after a different manner. Every infraction of the Constitution, however unimportant it may appear in its immediate consequences, tends to diminish the general confidence in the stability of our Government, and the general attachment to it; and as the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent are devotedly attached to that instrument and feel that their political existence is incorporated with it, that in it they live, and move, and have their being as a political community, I say, sir, it is a duty which I owe to them to contend to the utmost of my ability against whatever thus incidentally affects them. It is a duty, too, which I owe to myself, as I have a personal interest in whatever affects the character and honor of this body, of which I am a humble member.

I have no intention, Mr. President, to inquire into the motives which may lead gentlemen to the adoption of this resolution. The motives of every man are his individual property; and, as his action here in relation to this matter is under the sanction of an oath, they involve a responsibility only to his conscience and his God. I cannot say, sir, that the act which is now required to be done is a sacrifice to the Moloch of party spirit. I cannot say that it is a homage to an idol resembling that which the Chinese pays to his household god when he burns before it a little piece of gilt paper as the humble offering of his piety and adoration. Nor can I say, sir, that it is intended to smooth the mane and calm the roar of the lion. All these views belong to the class of motives with which I have nothing to do. But, sir, I have something to say and something to do with the doctrines advanced and the acts done here, which become part of the common stock. If it seems from the nature of the act done, and from the intrinsic evil of the reasons given for it, to be an act of homage to the false idol of executive power, I have, then, a personal interest in the matter, which not only justifies my doing so, but makes it a matter of duty to express my opinions as well as to record my vote. And, sir, it becomes the more necessary and proper to express those opinions, since, if this principle of expunction be adopted, I have no security that the record of that vote may not be destroyed, if hereafter it should become expedient to give to the resolution the appearance of unanimous approbation.

What is it, sir, we are called upon to do? A man may do wrong unwittingly, and we must take care to have a clear and precise idea of the act to be done. In words, sir, we are called upon to expunge from the journal a certain resolution, but, in fact and in truth, to falsify a record. The same mind which might contemplate the one proposition with indifference, would regard the other with horror. To a mind reckless of consequences, which has no future, which looks only to the present, and views every act as an insulated event, having no relation to what has preceded, and no influence on what is to follow, to expunge from a journal may seem a very harmless act. But, sir, even such a mind might be brought to revolt with disgust from the same measure when it imparted the suppression of the truth, or the assertion of a falsehood. The approaches of crime are stealthy and mysterious; the assassin wears his mask; vice pays to virtue the homage of assuming her form; the knave puts on the cloak of religion; the demagogue becomes the friend of the people. It becomes, then, my purpose to show that to expunge from the journal is to falsify a record.

Let me now draw the attention of the Senate to the terms of the resolution. It professes to set forth the act to be done, and the reasons for doing it. And first, sir, as to the act itself. It is described in these terms:

Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the journal, and for that purpose that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript journal of the session of 1833-4, into the Senate, and in the presence of the Senate draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: Expunged by order of the Senate this—day of—, in the year of our Lord 1836.

Nothing can be more explicit in its terms. The act to be done is to expunge. The first member of the sentence conveys the whole idea, and if the resolution had stopped there, with the simple assertion that an expunction should take place, there cannot be a doubt that the Secretary would have been authorized to blot out or erase from the journal the objectionable passage. The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) has gone into a critical examination of the meaning of the term ex- punge, and has given us various instances of its use in a metaphorical sense, and concludes that, because the word may be used metaphorically, it is in this instance a harmless metaphor. In all its uses, whether literal or metaphorical, it imports destruction; and the beauty and force of the metaphor in every instance depends on the precise meaning of its literal acceptation. The term expunge means literally to wipe out, which imports destruction; or, in other words, it imports that something which has an existence shall cease to exist. Whether the term is at any time used literally or metaphorically, will depend on the subject matter to which it is applied. Thus, in some of the instances given by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as in the one "to expunge our sins," no doubt the word is used metaphorically; but does not the whole force and value of the expression depend on its literal meaning, and import that those sins shall cease to have a moral existence as reasons for the Divine vengeance? And when used as applicable to a section of a bill, which is another instance given by the Senator, does it not mean that such section shall cease to have existence?

The Senator asks whether, if a resolution passed that a section of a bill should be expunged, the Secretary would proceed to obliterate it? I answer that from the method of our proceedings it is not necessary for him to erase every word, because the purpose is effectually answered by drawing his black lines across it, or simply writing upon its face the word expunged, for in effect it becomes so, by ceasing to have any legal existence, and if such bill were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, the section thus expunged would be omitted in the engrossment, as if it had never existed. But the authority conferred upon him by such a resolution is literally to erase every word of the section. Such, also, is the case when the word is used in relation to a part of the journal, and it becomes his duty to blot out or obliterate from its face the passage ordered to be expunged. But it is said that the present resolution does not contemplate an actual expunction or obliteration of the passage, but merely a typical one. And Senators seek to reconcile themselves to this measure by such a play upon words. A typical expunction! To get rid of the sophistry at once, let me ask whether a journal is not the evidence of a fact, as, for instance, the passage of a particular resolution, and whether to expunge from the journal that resolution, is not to destroy the evidence of the fact that such a resolution had been adopted? If then, you have the right to expunge, and do actually declare that a passage shall be expunged, does it not for all legal purposes suppress the evidence of the fact, no matter what the manner of expunction may be, whether by erasing, by blotting out, or by writing the word expunged over its face? Could the Secretary truly, after the adoption of the expunging resolution, that such a passage existed on the journal? If he were called upon to publish a new edition of the journal, would he have a right to insert the passage expunged? It is in vain that the assertion is made that the printed volumes would be evidence of the fact. The printed volumes are only prima facie evidence, and admitted for convenience, but could never stand against a sworn copy of the journal. There is, then, for all the purposes for which a journal is kept, namely, as evidence of a particular transaction, no difference between an actual and a typical expunction. That in the present instance no grave and immediate consequence affecting individual rights is to follow, does not alter the case. The principle asserted in the resolution is, that the right to expunge exists; the mode of doing it is of no consequence; and I will show presently that the exercise of such a power is not only unconstitutional, but may be attended with the most important and direct influence on the personal rights of individuals. The natural import and the necessary legal effect of the phrase "expunge from the journal," is to destroy the evidence of the fact expunged, whether it be used literally or metaphorically.

Having thus ascertained the meaning of the word expunge, and the effect of any mode of expunction, the question arises whether the Senate possesses any such power over its journal. Has it the right to destroy the evidence of a particular transaction for the journal is not only the highest evidence, but the only evidence of the fact. A journal is a daily record, as contradistinguished from a temporary memorandum. But it is contended that though a record, it is not a permanent one, being of value only until it is published; after which, it becomes mere waste paper. Is this proposition true? For if it be, then so far as this particular case is concerned, there is an end of the question.

The language of the Constitution is "that each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same." Resort has been had to the meaning of the word keep, as importing preservation, to show that the Constitution contemplated a permanent, and not a temporary record. But I submit that the word keep does not necessarily imply permanent preservation; it may mean preservation for a temporary purpose. The word keep, like every other word in the language, must depend for its meaning on the manner in which it is used, on the subject matter to which it is applied. Words are but signs of ideas, and it is one of the imperfections of language that it often expresses too much or too little, while felicity in its use consists in the choice of those terms which convey either the simple or complex idea with precision. A word, too, may stand for a whole sentence, for a class of ideas, as in the familiar use of this very one. Thus, to keep a horse may merely mean that he is fed, and corried, and stabled, but that he is rode; as, where the conversation being about the personal habit of any one in relation to exercise, it should be remarked of him he keeps a horse; the term imports both preservation and use. So in the phrase keep a cow; the use for which she is kept is implied, as if a house-keeper were asked "Do you buy your milk?" and should reply, "No, I keep a cow;" it imports not only that she is fed and taken care of, but that she is milked, and her milk consumed by the family. So, keep a carriage does not merely mean that a carriage is locked up in the house, but that it is used. Keephouse, imports the burden of household duties; as keep tavern imports the duty of receiving and attending to guests. There cannot be a doubt that the phrase "keep a journal," means to make and preserve for publication. But still the question arises as to the length of that preservation; and it is contended that the subsequent injunction to publish indicates at once the purpose and length of preservation. Is this true? The words are keep and publish, not keep in order to publish. But waiving all verbal criticism, let me remark that a constitution is merely a collection of principles; and in order to ascertain the force and meaning of any term, it is necessary to attend to the object of the provision, and the principle connected with it. What then, sir, are the purposes for which a journal is to be kept? I do not pretend to give them all, but some of them, as drawn from the Constitution it self, and it will then be seen whether such purposes are of a temporary or permanent character, and by consequence whether the journal is intended to be a permanent or temporary record. In the first place, it is intended to record the day on which a bill has been presented to the President for his approbation, and the day on which Congress adjourned, for on these two facts may depend the validity of a law. Thus, in the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it originated, &c. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case, it shall not be a law."

Here is one permanent purpose as enduring as the law itself.

In the second place, it is intended to record the fact of membership in this body, the Senate being the judge, and settling the question of membership in cases of contested election, by the express provision of the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution. And this was done in the case of the venerable and distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Robinson.) Has not he, and has not his State, a permanent interest in that decision, and in the evidence by which it is established? And is not the journal the highest and the only evidence of that fact? Suppose, sir, it should become expedient at any time to expunge such a decision, what would become of the rights of the Senator from Rhode Island, if a competitor were to present himself here for his seat, with fresh credentials from his State?

In the third place, it is intended to record the presence of a quorum at the opening of each session of Congress, as well as to ascertain the fact that Congress did assemble on the constitutional day for its meeting. The journal always opens with a statement of the names of those who assembled when it is once ascertained that a quorum is present; it is afterwards taken for granted that they perform their duty, and are always present, unless the contrary is made to appear. But if it so happened that no quorum was present, or that Congress had assembled before it had a legal right to do so, the laws passed under such circumstances would be merely void. This certainly is a matter of permanent importance.

In the fourth place, it is intended to record the action of this body on the conduct of its members, as in the instance of the punishment of any of them for disorderly behavior. Suppose the case of the expulsion of a member; will not the right of the State from which he comes to send a successor, depend on the fact of expulsion? And could you, by expunging the resolution of expulsion, restore him to his seat? And yet, if you destroy the evidence of the expulsion, is there any thing to invalidate his rights as established by his credentials when he first took his seat? Suppose he was elected for six years, and you expel him at the expiration of the second, and then expunge the resolution of expulsion, how would it be possible to contest his right to a seat for the remaining four years?

In the fifth place, it is intended to ascertain the fact of your organization as a court of impeachment, and the judgment passed on the offender. That judgment may extend to a removal from office, and a disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, which in its nature is perpetual, and is excepted out of the pardoning power which is given to the President in all other cases.

In the sixth and last place which I mean to advert to, it is intended to record the votes of members on matters of moment, that they may be held to their responsibility for pernicious measures. And hence it is expressly provided in the fifth section of the first article, "that the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." Has not every individual a personal and permanent interest in the record for good or for evil? This last purpose has reference to the great principle on which republican government is founded—the responsibility of the representative to his constituents.

From a consideration, then, of the purposes for which a journal is to be kept, it is apparent that it is intended to be a permanent and not a temporary record. None of those purposes would be effectually answered by the mere publication of the journal. They are matters of fact of which the journal, I mean the manuscript journal, is the highest evidence, and the only evidence where recourse is had to it, for any legal purpose.

To expunge this record is to destroy the evidence of a fact; to falsify history, and verify the remark of the satirical Frenchman, that history is nothing but conventional tables. Let me add, in relation to this matter, that the suppression veri differs nothing in point of morality from the allegatio falsi, and that it would be as hard to maintain that you have a right to suppress the evidence of a fact which had occurred in your proceedings, as to maintain that you have the right to assert a fact upon your journal which never had any existence. But it has been contended by some that, because we have the custody of the journal, we have the right to do with it what we please. And does custody import the right of destruction? Will it be contended that the Secretary of State, who has the custody of your laws and treaties, and even of the Constitution itself, has, from that circumstance, the right to blot out sections from your laws, articles from your treaties, and paragraphs from your Constitution; that he has the right to mutilate and destroy the records of the nation? In considering this right of expunction, the question is not whether the substance of the resolution proposed to be expunged is true, but whether such a resolution was adopted; that is the point of history. The existence on the journal of the resolution is no evidence of the truth of its allegation, but simply of its adoption; and the future historian, looking to the whole transactions of the time, would decide upon the truth or error of its allegation without giving to it any greater weight than is due to the mere expression of an opinion. Every Senator who voted for the original resolution has a personal interest in the record.

If it is true that to pass such a resolution was illegal and unconstitutional, and a flagrant wrong done to the President of the United States, then his friends should not desire to have it expunged, but, on the contrary, to preserve it as a monument of reproach to those who participated in the measure. In this view of the subject, it should be preserved as a matter of satisfaction on the part of his friends, and of disgrace and shame on the part of his adversaries. And, on the other hand, if the right existed to pass the resolution, and its allegation was true in point of fact, those who sustained it by their vote have an interest in the violence of their opinion, while those who thought otherwise have the benefit and satisfaction of being able to establish their dissent. In neither view of the case have the friends of the President any fair reason to desire that the evidence of the proceeding should be destroyed. The Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) may glory in the vote he gave on the occasion; the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) may do the same; neither has the right to deprive the other of the evidence of his course in relation to it. Those who voted for the resolution alone hazard any thing in preserving that evidence. If they were wrong, then it is for their shame; if they were right, it is the mere expression of an opinion from which others might rightfully and sincerely differ. If the allegations of the friends of the President are true, that the adoption of that resolution was a breach of the Constitution, and a most flagrant wrong to him, would it not be more natural that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) should come here to ask us to expunge it, than that he might conceal his participation in the matter? Is it not extraordinary that the Senator from Missouri, who takes great credit to himself for resisting the measure, should seek not only to conceal his own glory in opposing it, but the shame of his adversaries in supporting it? What is the purpose to be answered by expunging the resolution? The fact that such a resolution was adopted cannot now be concealed from the eye of history. The journal is only evidence of that fact, and not of the truth of the allegation contained in it. What valuable end, then, is to be accomplished by the expunction? I fear, sir, that the future historian, looking over the whole ground of the controversy, will say, from the nature of the act, that it was a sacrifice, a peace-offering at the altar of Executive power. In this view, we have all an interest in the record of the proceedings of this day, for good or for evil report.

But, sir, I come now to consider the reasons which are offered for the adoption of this expunging resolution. They are set forth in the preamble, and I presume they are the best that can be offered. They have been well weighed and considered, and no doubt the ability of the Senator from Missouri has been taxed to the utmost to present the case in the strongest possible point of view. His reasons are eight in number, and the first of them is in these words:

"And whereas the said resolve was irregularly, illegally, and unconstitutionally adopted by the Senate in violation of the rights of defence which belong to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice; because President Jackson was thereby adjudged, and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him as a violator of his oath of office, and of the Laws and Constitution, which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing him the benefits of a trial, or the means of defence."

Is this true in point of fact? The proceeding of which this reason professes to be descriptive was this: On the 28th day of March, 1834, the Senate, in its usual course of business, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Is this first reason, then, a true description of the subject to which it refers? If the Senate had organized itself into a Court of Impeachment, called in the Chief Justice to preside, as required by the Constitution, and then proceeded to try the President without hearing him, and to pronounce judgment upon him of removal from office, more could not have been said; no stronger language would be required to describe so wanton a violation of constitutional law. Is there no difference between the cases? Can a stronger case of the perversion and abuse of language be put than this, which would represent a simple resolution of a deliberative assembly, expressing merely an opinion which has no legal effect whatever on the rights of the individual, as the judgment of a court which acts directly and immediately upon those rights? The proceeding referred to has neither the form nor substance of a judgment. Nor is the slightest guilt imputed in the opinion as expressed by the resolution. It states a fact, "that the President has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution," but is silent as to the motives and intention with which that fact was accompanied, the corrupt and wilful character of which alone could give to the proceeding the attribute of guilt. But suppose, for a moment, that the Senate had, losing sight of the principles of law and justice, formed itself into a Court of Impeachment, and proceeded, without a hearing, to pass judgment on the individual: would that be a reason for expunging the record, for suppressing the evidence of so monstrous a proceeding? On the contrary, sir, it should stand as a monument of disgrace and dishonor to the men who participated in it. Its legal effect would be nothing; its moral influence would recoil on their own heads, and they should be held to that responsibility to public opinion, to secure which it was provided that the yeas and nays should be entered on the journal. In this view of the subject, the hollowness and fallacy of the reason assigned is manifested by the fact that those who seek to suppress the evidence are not those who advocated, but those who opposed, the resolution. But, sir, it is the fate of a false position to embody the principles of its own destruction. If this reason be a true description of the resolution of 28th March, 1834, and sufficient for its expunction, is it not perceived that this very expunging resolution and its preamble is open to the same objection, as pronouncing judgment on those Senators who supported the former, as guilty of an impeachable offence and violators of their oaths of office, without the benefit of a trial? It should, then, in its turn, be expunged; and if I were called upon to draw up a preamble upon the strength of this precedent, I should use the same language, as being as fair and legitimate a description of the present resolution and its preamble as this reason is descriptive of the resolution of March 28, 1834. It is absolutely suicidal.

The second reason is as follows:

"And whereas the said resolve, in all its shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and therefore unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unconstitutional; because the said President Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as himself, in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the removing of the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then, or can now be specified under the vague and ambiguous terms of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation tion of the laws and Constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people."

The substance of this reason is, that the resolution was erroneous in point of fact. Is that a reason for expunging it? It might form a very good reason for a counter-resolution. The subject is one on which a difference of opinion might fairly exist, and that difference was expressed at the time, both in debate and on the journal; but surely that difference of opinion is no reason for destroying the evidence that such an opinion was expressed.

The third reason is, that

"The said resolve, as adopted, is uncertain and ambiguous, containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and Constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, without specifying," &c.

This reason conflicts with both the others, implying that, if the resolve were detailed and specific, it ought not to be expunged. If all these are reasons for the same act, they should not be antagonistic to each other, but should harmoniously tend to the same conclusion. But want of detail can be no reason for suppressing the evidence that such a resolution was adopted.

The fourth reason is merely an amplification of the third.

The fifth reason is as follows:

"And whereas the Senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President, when charged by the House of Representatives with offences against the laws and Constitution, the adoption of the said resolve before any impeachment preferred by the House was a breach of the privileges of the House; a violation of the Constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the Senate; and a disqualification of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the President should thereafter be regularly impeached by the House of Representatives for the same offence."

The same answer may be given to this reason as is given to the first, that it is not a fair and true description of the case. It treats the resolution of 1834 as if it were a judgment of the Senate in judicial capacity as a court of impeachment, when in truth it is nothing more than the expression of an opinion in its character of a deliberative assembly. It is no breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives, since it neither anticipates nor precludes an impeachment. It is no prejudication of any question which might come before the Senate as a court of impeachment, since such question must be one of guilt, and nothing of the kind is imputed in the resolution. But again: if all this were true, it would be no reason for expunging, or, in other words, destroying the evidence of the fact that such a resolution was adopted.

But, sir, we come now to the sixth reason, which is perhaps the true motive, though not a justification for this extraordinary proceeding, and a gleam of light is thrown upon the subject, which gives it color and complexion. The substance of this reason is, that the President's protest was rejected, and not permitted to be entered upon the journal, while memorials and petitions against him were duly and honorably received. Here is another instance of that conflict with other reasons, which was remarked upon in adverting to the third. It implies that, if the protest had been received, then the resolve should not be expunged. But, with that confusion of ideas which seems to characterize the whole preamble, it places the protest of the President on the same footing with petitions from the people. The President demanded that his protest should be spread upon the journal, which he had no right to do. But, supposing for a moment that he had, is the refusal a reason for expunging the resolution to which the protest has reference? The people have an undoubted right to express their opinions and wishes, in the form of petitions and memorials, but the President, as such, has no right to notice the proceedings of any other branch of the Government in the form of a protest. It is no part of the functions or privileges of Executive power to review and rebuke the proceedings of the legislative or judicial branches of the Government. The aspect which the whole subject assumes, in contemplating this reason, is that of retaliation. It looks like offering an indignity to this body by way of compensating the slight of Executive power.

The seventh and eighth reasons may be classed together, and resolve themselves into the general allegation that the said resolve was inopportune, of evil example, and dangerous precedent. All of which, being a mere matter of opinion, about which a fair difference might arise, could furnish no reason for expunging the resolve, however it might be urged as a reason for passing a counter-resolution. We have thus, sir, gone through them all, and do not find one which justifies the conclusion that the resolution should be expunged. And if they do not singly support that conclusion, they cannot do it collectively. A thousand bad reasons have no more force than one. We may say, then, of this preamble, what was said of Gratiano's reasoning: "Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice; his reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them; and when you have them they are not worth the search."

But it is said the Senate had no right to pass such a resolution; that it cannot be justified as the fair exercise of any one of its powers. Still it may be answered, it is a fact that such a resolution was adopted, and the objection involves a mere difference of opinion, which cannot be a reason for destroying the evidence of the fact. But as to the right itself, I think there can be no doubt of its existence, when the subject is fully understood. The Senate, under the Constitution, has various powers, legislative, judicial, and executive. The error lies in attempting to discover and explain the right to pass such a resolution in the exercise of any of these powers.

The object of all these powers is the modification of some social or political right. But the Senate is a deliberative body, and, as such, must have opinions, and express them. It is the inherent right and property of every deliberative assembly to have and express opinions, which can only be done by resolution. A resolution of thanks cannot be traced to any one of these powers, neither can a resolution of condolence; and yet no one ever doubted the right to pass either the one or the other. If it were necessary to resort to the Constitution for any express or implied authority, it might be found in the seventh section of the fourth article, which, in its last paragraph, supposes that there are other resolutions than legislative acts, or such as require the concurrence of both Houses. But the very institution of a deliberative assembly, in the nature of things, supposes and involves the existence of opinions and the right of expressing them. The powers of such an assembly, or, in other words, the control which it may exercise over the social or political rights of others, is a very different matter, and depends on the provisions of the Constitution which gives it existence. But is it not somewhat remarkable that those who make the objection do not perceive that this very expunging resolution which they advocate presupposes the right? If the Senate has no right to pass any resolution but such as can be traced to one of those powers, what right has it to pass this expunging resolution? Into such absurdities, sir, will men fall when they seek to sustain, by reasoning, a false position. The right, then, to pass such a resolution I take to be unquestionable, and the exercise of it may be, at times, highly expedient, as a check or caution to the wantonness or heedlessness of Executive power, and as a measure short of impeachment. But, sir, what is impeachment? A farce, a nullity! It is, like the case of the electoral colleges, an abortion. There is little danger to be apprehended but from a popular President; and the very fact of his being such, under the party organization of this country, supports the fact that he is sustained and supported by a majority of the body in whom the impeaching power resides. I might here, sir, conclude what I wished to say in relation to the matter now depending before the Senate, having, as I think, established two propositions, which cover the whole ground: first, that the Senate, as a deliberative assembly, had the right to pass the resolution of March 28, 1834; and, secondly, that, whether true or not in point of fact, we have no right to expunge it, because the Journal is, by the Constitution, a PERMANENT RECORD. I will further incidentally remark that, if the right of expunction exists, and is to be established by this precedent, then a subsequent Senate may expunge this expunging resolution; and so, in all time to come, these successive expunctions may serve to indicate the triumph or defeat of the respective political parties of the country. But an attempt has been made to sustain this measure by a resort to precedents. Sir, precedents are of no authority when opposed to a clear, ascertained, settled principle. They are resorted to in doubtful cases, and often to avoid the force of principle. It is easier, at all times, to follow precedents than to reason. But, sir, above all things, precedents drawn from a period of revolution, such as that referred to by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives), are of no weight in a time of profound tranquillity, when security and leisure give opportunity for reflection. It may be very expedient, in a moment of unsettled government and of violence, to suppress the evidence of a particular proceeding; but one could scarcely rely upon such authority for a warrant to corrupt a constitutional record in moments of security and regular government. And yet such is the character of the Senator's domestic precedent. As to his English precedents, they are of no value on a question like this, which does not depend on general parliamentary practice, but on the express provisions of a written Constitution, which has directed the keeping of a journal, and contemplates that journal as a permanent record.

I am warned by the fateness of the hour that it is time to take leave of the subject; but, sir, before I take my seat, I cannot forbear to offer a few remarks on some of the opinions and sentiments expressed by the Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) and others. We have been told by that Senator that the Senate is an aristocratical feature of the Government; that it is the citadel of that aristocratical spirit which seeks to ride on the necks of the people. What purpose, sir, is this sentiment to answer? Is it to break down the Senate? To bring it into contempt and odium with the people? But, first, sir, let us inquire into the fact. Aristocracy in America! Where are its elements, where its means and appliances? Here, sir, where the wheel of fortune is perpetually revolving; where the poor man of to-day becomes the rich man of to-morrow, and no one can tell, whatever his present actual property, that his grandson may not be compelled to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; where political rights are equal, and the avenues to wealth and honor open to every man; where the laws and customs of the country guard no man's inheritance in a settled course of descent, but break up, and distribute in various rivulets, that wealth which may have been dammed up in the course of temporary accumulation; I say, sir, here, and under such circumstances, to talk of aristocracy is an insult to the common sense of the community. I see, sir, a practicable refutation of this sentiment in the persons of the distinguished men by whom I am surrounded. To what patronage were they indebted for the honorable distinction which they have attained? To what do they owe their elevation and the high consideration in which they are held by the whole country, but to the unaided efforts of their own abilities? Why, sir, you find in the person of your Chief Magistrate another striking proof of its error. A poor boy, forso I believe the story runs, cuffed during the revolutionary war by a British officer for not performing some menial office, wins his way to the highest honors of the republic, and comes to preside over the destinies of a great people; "bids the Romans mark him, and write his speeches in their books." Sir, the terms is a mere catchword, or, to use the metaphor of the Senator from South Carolina, "a mere tinkling bell to bring together a rabble of ideas which overwhelm all reasoning."

One of the strongest objections I have had to the course of the present administration, has been its constant effort to array the different portions of society against each other, and its habit of appealing for support to the worst passions and prejudices of our nature. When I heard the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) a few days since, in the debate on the Treasury circular, declare that he did not belong to that class of politicians who divided society horizontally, but rather perpendicularly, into classes who mutually sustained and supported each other, I thought I perceived the dawn of a better state of things, and I felt grateful to him, sir, for the sentiment; but alas! sir, I fear that it was but a temporary impulse of sound feeling, that must subside before the policy of the party.

To test the soundness of this opinion, let us for a moment consider the nature of this Government. It is emphatically a Government as contradistinguished from a confederacy, limited in its powers, though supreme in its sphere; the legislative powers being vested in a Congress, composed of the Senate and House of Representatives. The people, being the source of all power, elect, either immediately or mediately, their representatives; immediately in the instance of the House of Representatives, mediately in the instance of the Senate. We are all, sir, the representatives of the people, though chosen after a different manner. I claim, sir, to be not the immediate but the general representative of the State of Virginia, as I hold that Senator to be the general representative of Delaware; and I, for one, thank Virginia for having sent so able and distinguished a representative of our common interests. The more permanent character of the representation in this body is a check imposed by the people themselves on their own action. The whole system is one of checks and balances. The two Houses of Congress are mutual checks on each other. The Senate may fairly be presumed to be the more grave and sedate body, from the general fact of possessing less of youth and its attributes, although, sir, to be sure, there are some veterans in the other House, as well as some youthful aspirants in this. The ancient Germans, sir, who carried among the nations whom they conquered their notions of civil polity, were in the habit of arguing every question twice, once at their carousals, probably drunk, and once sober, that there might be in their councils a due degree of vivacity and deliberation. The same idea may be supposed to be carried out in our institutions, though the requisite attributes may not be insured by the same means. In claiming, sir, for this body the attribute of deliberation, I do not mean to say that we are by contradistinction the sober body.

The Constitution which has established this system of government was the peaceable and deliberate work of the people. It was not, sir, the result of accident, or of a struggle for political power between different orders of society. To find fault, then, with the Senate, is to impeach the wisdom and intelligence of the people themselves. It is they, who, in adopting the Federal Constitution, have said that the Senate shall be organized as we find it, have prescribed the mode of its election, and given to it the character of greater permanency. But, sir, I ask again, what is the meaning of this sentiment? Are we to be prepared for reducing the Government to a unit, as we have been told that the cabinet should be one? Is it intended to blot out the component parts of this system, and reduce the Government to the simple relation of the President and the people? In the message of 1832, the Supreme Court was assailed, and its authority, as the interpreter of the Constitution, denied; and now, sir, we are told by the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) that the President has corrected and repeated the decision of that court in relation to the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, and that, in his opinion, all that remains to be done is to issue an audita querella to ascertain the fact, have it entered on the record, and the judgment reversed. Here is at once a new attribute of power, and a most extraordinary mode of proceeding. On the other hand, we are told by the Senator from Virginia that the Senate is the citadel of that aristocratical spirit which seeks to ride on the necks of the people. If the Senator merely means that this language is descriptive of himself and his friends, be it so. I cannot quarrel with what he may deem just and proper as to them, though I should have been backward myself in so characterizing them; but, sir, I utterly deny its justice and propriety as applicable to myself, or those with whom I have the honor and the happiness to act. In relation to this Government, I and my immediate constituents, and I believe a great majority of the American people, are conservatives. We go for the Government as it is. We wish to preserve the system of Federal and State Governments as it was established by the wisdom of our ancestors. "We ask no change, and, least of all, such changes as they would bring us." In this system we live, and move, and have our being; and as we were the first to adopt the Constitution, we shall be the last to abandon it. We have heard much about the policy of the Executive, and have even been advised to look to that source for the initiative of certain measures. To my mind, all this is a piece with that exaggerated and false conception of Executive power and consequence, which has characterized the present Chief Magistrate and his advisers. The executive power which represents the common force of society is, in every just theory, and in the nature of things, inferior to the legislative power, which is the representative of the common intelligence and the common will, and that, too, precisely in the degree in which brute force is inferior to reason. It is the business of the President to execute the laws, not to make them. The policy of the Executive! Who charged the President with the care of the general welfare? What business has he with any policy distinct from the policy of the law? The prosperity of a great and civilized people depends on the laws, and not on the will of the Executive. Sir, I regret to hear such opinions expressed. I trust in God they will not prevail in this country; for, to my mind, they are in direct hostility with that tone of manly and independent feeling which should characterize a nation of freemen.

In opening the subject of this expunging resolution, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) has seen fit to entertain us with a magnificent eulogy on the merits of the President. This, no doubt, was a very fit introduction to the measure which is proposed, and may perhaps serve to indicate its ultimate aim and purpose. He has been described at one time as teaching the saucy Britons a lesson of humility from behind the cotton bags of New Orleans, and at another rebuking with the thunder of American cannon the savages of the Pacific ocean, "besurrounding the narrow world like a Colossus." Not content with this plenitude of military fame, he has been endowed with all civic virtues and superhuman sagacity. While listening to this strain of adulation, every sober-minded individual must have involuntarily exclaimed with Cassius, "Now in the names of all the gods at once, upon what mean doth this our Caesar feed that he is grown so great?" Sir, I am not disposed to deny his real merits, or to withhold my gratitude for his real services. He has, sir, rendered good service to his country, and well has that country repaid him for it. But that service was in a military, not in a civil capacity.

Much has, as usual, been said about the people, and the people's friends; and an impression is attempted to be given that those who support this administration are alone the friends of the people. Who are they that thus arrogantly talk about the people as if they belonged to some superior order? The people's friends, indeed! The people, sir, stand in need of no friends; they are the sovereigns; it is they who dispense their smiles and their favors; and it would be much more becoming and seemly to speak of the people as being one's friend (than of oneself as being the friend of the people). There is, to be sure, one point of view in which the supporters of this administration, I mean those in office, may be considered the friends of the people. It is the same in which the Lieutenant in Gil Blas is termed and considered himself the friend of the poor, and who proved his friendship by consuming their revenues.

The aid of public opinion has been invoked in relation to this measure, and we are told by the Senator from Missouri that the people have rendered their verdict, and he demands judgment and execution. When and how, sir, was the issue made up? The resolution of March, 1834, was adopted after the last Presidential election; but this notion of a verdict is gathered from the fact of the continued ascendancy of the party, and the resolves of some State Legislatures. Can any thing be more preposterous than the assumption that a majority of the people, liking the man, in yielding to him their support, are to be understood as approving of every thing that he says and does, and disapproving of every thing that is said or done against him? As well might it be contended, on the same ground, that because General Jackson smokes a pipe, the verdict of the people has established that it is right and proper to use tobacco, and that the legitimate mode of doing so is by smoking it in an earthen pipe.

But all this, sir, is apart from the main question. We are called upon to expunge a resolution from our journal, to suppress the evidence of a fact, to falsify a record! If the right to do so were a matter of doubt merely, it would be the part of a prudent and conscientious man to pause. Let not, I pray, sir, the excitement of party spirit hurry this body to an act which is a clear infraction of the Constitution; be satisfied with a corrected resolution, expressing in as strong terms as you please your approbation of the President's conduct, and your repugnance to the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, but do not let us inflict another wound upon the greater charter of the Union. Rely upon it, sir, that if the frenzy of party spirit, or any other motive, shall lead you to do this deed, you will find yourselves in the condition of a homicide, who, having exhausted his malice in a deed of violence, recoils with horror and remorse from the victim of his passion.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

[As reported by the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, Thursday, January 5.—Mr. GARNSEY, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, having moved that the bill to admit the State of Michigan into the Union be now read a third time—

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

I have (said Mr. C.) been connected with this Government more than half its existence, in various capacities, and during that long period I have looked on its action with attention, and have endeavored to make myself acquainted with the principles and character of our political institutions, and I can truly say that within that time no measure has received the sanction of Congress which has appeared to me more unconstitutional and dangerous than the present. It assails our political system in its crucial point, and where, at this time, it most requires defence.

The great and leading objections to the bill rest mainly on the ground that Michigan is a State. They have been felt by its friends to have so much weight, that its advocates have been compelled to deny the fact, as the only way of meeting the objections. Here, then, is the main point at issue between the friends and the opponents of the bill. It turns on a fact, and that fact presents the question—is Michigan a State?

If (said Mr. C.) there ever was a party committed on a fact—if there ever was one estopped from denying it—that party is the present majority in the Senate, and that fact, that Michigan is a State. It is the very party who urged through this body, at the last session, a bill for the admission of the State of Michigan, which accepted her Constitution, and declared in the most explicit and strongest terms that she was a State. I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading this solemn declaration. It has frequently been read during this debate, and is familiar to all who hear me, and has not been questioned or denied. But it has been said there is a condition annexed to the declaration, with which she must comply, before she can become a State. There is, indeed, a condition, but it has been shown by my colleague and others from the plain wording of the act, that the condition is not attached to the acceptance of the Constitution, nor the declaration that she is a State, but simply to her admission into the Union. I will not repeat the argument, but, in order to place the subject beyond controversy, I shall recall to memory the history of the last session, as connected with the admission of Michigan. The facts need but to be referred to, in order to revive their recollection.

There were two points proposed to be effected by the friends of the bill at the last session. The first was to settle the controversy, as to boundary, between Michigan and Ohio, and it was that object alone which imposed the condition that Michigan should assent to the boundary prescribed by the act as the condition of her admission. But there was another object to be accomplished. Two respectable gentlemen, who had been elected by the State as Senators, were then waiting to take their seats on this floor; and the other object of the bill was to provide for their taking their seats as Senators on the admission of the State, and for this purpose it was necessary to make the positive and unconditional declaration that Michigan was a State, as a State only could choose Senators, by an express provision of the Constitution; and hence the admission was made conditional, and the declaration that she was a State was made absolute, in order to effect both objects. To show that I am correct, I will ask the Secretary to read the third section of the bill.

[The section was read accordingly as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission contained in the last preceding section of this act, the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as in that section described, declared, and established, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required; and as soon as the assent herein required shall be given, the President of the United States shall announce the same, by proclamation; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be considered as complete, and the Senators and Representatives who have been elected by the said State as its representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives respectively, without further delay."

Mr. CALHOUN then asked—Does not every Senator see the two objects—the one to settle the boundary, and the other to admit her Senators to a seat in this body; and that the section is so worded as to effect both, in the manner I have stated? If this needed confirmation, it would find it in the debate on the passage of the bill, when the ground was openly taken by the present majority, that Michigan had a right to form her constitution, under the ordinance of 1787, without our consent; and that she was of right, and in fact, a State, beyond our control.

I will (said Mr. C.) explain my own views on this point, in order that the consistency of my course at the last and present session may be clearly seen.

My opinion was, and still is, that the movement of the people of Michigan in forming for themselves a State Constitution, without waiting for the assent of Congress, was revolutionary, as it threw off the authority of the United States over the Territory; and that we were left at liberty to treat the proceedings as revolutionary, and to remand her to her territorial condition, or to waive the irregularity, and to recognise what was done as rightfully done, as our authority alone was concerned.

My impression was, that the former was the proper course; but I also thought that the act remaining her back should contain our assent in the usual manner for her to form a Constitution, and thus to leave her free to become a State. This, however, was overruled. The opposite opinion prevailed, that she had a perfect right to do what she had done, and that she was, as I have stated, a State both in fact and right, and that we had no control over her; and our act accordingly recognised her as a State, from the time she had adopted her constitution, and admitted her into the Union on the condition of her assenting to the prescribed boundaries. Having thus solemnly recognised her as a State, we cannot now undo what was then done. There were, in fact, many irregularities in the proceedings, all of which were urged in vain against its passage; but the Presidential election was then pending, and the vote of Michigan was considered of sufficient weight to overrule all objections, and correct all irregularities. They were all accordingly overruled, and we cannot now go back.

Such was the course, and such the acts of the majority at the last session. A few short months have since passed. Other objects are now to be effected, and all is forgotten as completely as if they had never existed. The very Senators who then forced the act through, on the ground that Michigan was a State, have wheeled completely round, to serve the present purpose, and taken directly the opposite ground! We live in strange and inconsistent times. Opinions are taken up and laid down as suits the occasion, without hesitation, or the slightest regard to principles or consistency. It indicates an unsound state of the public mind, pregnant with future disasters.

I turn to the position now assumed by the majority to suit the present occasion; and, if I mistake not, it will be found as false in fact, and as erroneous in principle, as it is inconsistent with that maintained at the last session. They now take the ground that Michigan is not a State, and cannot, in fact, be a State till she is admitted into the Union; and this on the broad principle that a Territory cannot become a State till admitted. Such is the position distinctly taken by several of the friends of this bill, and implied in the arguments of a party all who have spoken in its favor. In fact, its advocates had no choice. As untenable as it is, they were forced on this desperate position. They had no other which they could occupy.

I have shown that it is directly in the face of the law of the last session, and that it denies the recorded acts of those who now maintain the position. I now go further, and assert that it is in direct opposition to plain and unquestionable matter of fact. There is no fact more certain than that Michigan is a State. She is in the full exercise of sovereign authority, with a Legislature and a Chief Magistrate. She passes laws; she executes them; she regulates fisheries, and even takes away life—all on her own authority. Ours has entirely ceased over her; and yet there are those who can deny, with all these facts before them, that she is a State. They might as well deny the existence of this Hall! We have long since assumed unlimited control over the Constitution, to twist, and turn, and deny it as it suited our purpose. And it would seem that we are presumptuously attempting to assume like supremacy over facts themselves, as if their existence or non-existence depended on our volition. I speak freely. The occasion demands that the truth should be boldly uttered.

But those who may not regard their own recorded acts, nor the plain facts of the case, may possibly feel the awkward condition in which coming events may shortly place them. The admission of Michigan is not the only point involved in the passage of this bill. A question will follow, which may be presented to the Senate in a very few days, as to the right of Mr. Norvell and Mr. Lyon, the two respectable gentlemen who have been elected Senators by Michigan, to take their seats in this Hall. The decision of this question will require a more sound facing about than has been yet witnessed. It required seven or eight months for the majority to wheel about from the position maintained at the last session to that taken at this, but there may not be allowed them now as many days to wheel back to the old position. These gentlemen cannot be refused their seats after the admission of the State by those gentlemen who passed the act of the last session. It provides for the case. I now put it to the friends of this bill, and I ask them to weigh the question deliberately—to bring it home to their bosom and conscience before they answer—can a Territory elect Senators to Congress? The Constitution is express: States only can choose Senators. Were not these gentlemen chosen long before the admission of Michigan; before the Ann Arbor meeting, and while Michigan was, according to the doctrines of the friends of this bill, a Territory? Will they, in the face of the Constitution, which they are sworn to support, admit as Senators on this floor those who, by their own statement, were elected by a Territory? These questions may soon be presented for decision. The majority, who are forcing this bill through, are already committed by the act of the last session, and I leave them to reconcile, as they can, the ground they now take with the vote they must give when the question of their right to take their seats is presented for decision.

A total disregard of all principle and consistency has so entangled this subject, that there is but one mode left of extricating ourselves without trampling the Constitution in the dust, and that is to return back to where we stood when the question was first presented; to acquiesce in the right of Michigan to form a Constitution, and erect herself into a State, under the ordinance of 1787; and to repeat so much of the act of the last session as prescribed the condition on which she was to be admitted. This was the object of the amendment that I offered last evening, in order to relieve the Senate from its present dilemma. The amendment involved the merits of the whole case. It was too late in the day for discussion, and I asked for indulgence till today, that I might have an opportunity of presenting my views. The friends of the present majority, the indulgence was refused, and the bill ordered to its third reading; and I have been thus compelled to address the Senate when it is too late to amend the bill, and after a majority have committed themselves both as to its principles and details. New as such proceedings are in this body, I complain not. I, as one of the minority, ask no favors. All I ask is, that the Constitution be not violated. Held it sacred, and I shall be the last to complain.

I now return to the assumption that a Territory cannot become a State till admitted into the Union, which is now relied on with so much confidence to prove that Michigan is not a State. I reverse the position. I assert the opposite, that a Territory cannot be admitted till she becomes a State; and in this, I stand on the authority of the Constitution itself, which expressly limits the power of Congress to admitting new States into the Union. But, if the Constitution had been silent, he would indeed be ignorant of the character of our political system, who did not see that States, sovereign and independent communities, and not Territories, can only be admitted. Ours is a Union of States, a Federal Republic. States and not Territories, form its component parts, bound together by a solemn league, in the form of a constitutional compact. In coming into the Union, the State pledges its faith to this sacred compact; an act which none but a sovereign and independent community is competent to perform, and, of course, a Territory must first be raised to that condition before she can take her stand among the confederated States of our Union. How can a Territory pledge its faith to the Constitution? It has no will of its own. You give it all its powers, and you can at pleasure overrule all her actions. If she enters as a Territory, the act is yours, not hers. Her consent is nothing without your authority and sanction. Can you, can Congress, become a party to the constitutional compact? How absurd!

But I am told, if this be so, if a Territory must become a State before it can be admitted, it would follow that she might refuse to enter the Union after she had acquired the right of acting for herself. Certainly she may. A State cannot be forced into the Union. She must come in by her own free assent, given in her highest sovereign capacity, through a convention of the people of the State. Such is the constitutional provision; and those who make the objection must overlook both the Constitution and the elementary principles of our Government, of which the right of self-government is the first; the right of every people to form their own government, and to determine their political condition. This is the doctrine on which our fathers acted in our glorious revolution, which has done more for the cause of liberty throughout the world, than any event within the record of history; and on which the Government has acted from the first, as regards all that portion of our extensive territory that lies beyond the limits of the original States. Read the ordinance of 1787, and the various acts for the admission of new States, and you will find the principle invariably recognised and acted on, to the present unhappy instance, without a departure from it, except in the case of Missouri. The admission of Michigan is destined, I fear, to mark a great change in the history of the admission of new States, a total departure from the old usage, and the noble principle of self-government on which that usage was founded. Every thing thus far, has been irregular and monstrous connected with her admission. I trust it is no ominous. Surrounded by lakes within her natural limits (which ought not to have been departed from,) possessed of fertile soil and genial climate, with every prospect of wealth, power, and influence, who but must regret that she should be ushered into the Union in a manner so irregular and unworthy of her future destiny.

But I will waive these objections, constitutional and all. I will suppose, with the advocates of the bill, that a Territory cannot become a State till admitted into the Union. Assuming all this, I ask them to explain to me how the mere act of admission can transmute a Territory into a State? By whose authority would she be made a State? By ours? How can we make a State? We can form a Territory; we can admit States into the Union; but, I repeat the question, how can we make a State? I ha! supposed this Government was the creature of the States—formed by their authority, and dependent on their will for their existence. Can the creature form the creator? If not by our authority, then by whose? Not by her own: that would be absurd. The very act of admission makes her a member of the Confederacy, with no other or greater power than is possessed by all the others; all of whom, united, cannot create a State. By what process, then, by what authority, can a Territory become a State, if not one before admitted? Who can explain? How full of difficulties, compared to the long-established, simple, and noble process which has prevailed to the present instant. According to old usage, the General Government first with-laws its authority over a certain portion of its territory, as soon as it has a sufficient population to constitute a State. They are thus left to themselves freely to form a Constitution, and to exercise the noble right of self-government. They then present their Constitution to Congress, and ask the privilege (for one it is of the highest character) to become a member of this glorious confederacy of States. The Constitution is examined, and, if republican, as required by the Federal Constitution, she is admitted, with no other condition, except such as may be necessary to secure the authority of Congress over the public domain within her limits. This is the old, the established form, instituted by our ancestors of the revolution, who so well understood the great principles of liberty and self-government. How simple! how sublime! What a contrast to the doctrines of the present day, and the precedent which, I fear, we are about to establish! And shall we, so long as these sound principles are observed, that a State will reject this high privilege—will refuse to enter this Union? No; she will rush into your embrace, so long as your institutions are worth preserving. When the advantages of the Union shall have become a matter of calculation and doubt; when new States shall pause to determine whether the Union is a curse or blessing, the question which now agitates us will cease to have any importance.

Having now, I trust, established beyond all controversy that Michigan is a State, I come to the great point at issue, to the decision of which all that has been said is but preparatory, had the self-created assembly which met at Ann Arbor the authority to speak in the name of the people of Michigan; to assent to the conditions contained in the act of the last session; to assent to a portion of the Constitution of the State, and to overrule the dissent of the convention of the people, regularly called by the constituted authorities of the State, to the condition of admission! I shall not repeat what I said when I first addressed the Senate on this bill. We all, by this time, know the character of that assemblage; that it met without the sanction of the authorities of the State, and that it did not pretend to represent one third of the people. We all know that the State had regularly convened a convention of her people, expressly to take into consideration the condition on which it was proposed to admit her into the Union, and that the convention, after full deliberation, had declined to give its assent by a considerable majority. With a knowledge of all these facts, I put the question, had the assembly a right to act for the State? Was it a convention of the people of Michigan in the true, legal, and constitutional sense of that term? Is there one within the limits of my voice, that can lay his hand on his breast, and honestly say it was? Is there one that does not feel that it was neither more nor less than a mere caucus; nothing but a party caucus, of which we have the strongest evidence in the perfect unanimity of those who assembled? Not a vote was given against admission. Can there be stronger proof that it was a meeting got up by party machinery, for party purposes?

But I go further. It was not only a party caucus, for party purpose, but a criminal meeting, a meeting to subvert the authority of the State, and to assume its sovereignty. I know not whether Michigan has yet passed laws to guard her sovereignty. It may be that she has not had time to enact laws for this purpose, which no community is long without; but I do aver, if there be such an act, or if the common law be in force in the State, the actors in that meeting might be indicted, tried, and punished for the very act on which it is now proposed to admit the State into the Union. If such a meeting as this were to undertake to speak in the name of South Carolina, we would speedily teach its authors what they owed to the authority and dignity of the State. The act was not only in contempt of the authority of the State of Michigan, but a direct insult on this Government. Here is a self-created meeting, convened for a criminal object, which has dared to present to this Government an act of theirs, and to expect that we are to receive this irregular and criminal act as a fulfillment of the condition which we had prescribed for the admission of the State! Yet I fear, forgetting our own dignity, and the rights of Michigan, that we are about to recognise the validity of the act, and quietly to submit to the insult.

The year 1835 (said Mr. C.) is destined to mark the most remarkable change in our political institutions, since the adoption of the Constitution. The events of the year have made a deeper innovation on the principles of the Constitution, and evinced a stronger tendency to revolution, than any which have occurred from its adoption to the present day. Sir, (said Mr. C.) addressing the Vice President) duty compels me to speak of facts intimately connected with yourself. In deference to your feelings as presiding officer of the body, I shall speak of them with all possible reserve, much more reserve than I should otherwise have done if you did not occupy that seat. Among the first of these events which I shall notice, is the caucus of Baltimore; that too, like the Ann Arbor caucus, has been dignified with the name of the Convention of the People. This caucus was got up under the countenance and express authority of the President himself; and its edict, appointing you his successor, has been sustained, not only by the whole patronage and power of the Government, but by his active personal influence and exertion. Through its instrumentality he has succeeded in controlling the voice of the people, and for the first time the President has appointed his successor; and thus the first great step of converting our Government into monarchy has been achieved. These are solemn and ominous facts. No one who has examined the result of the last election can doubt their truth. It is now certain that you are not the free and unbiased choice of the people of these United States. If left to your own popularity, without the active and direct influence of the President, and the power and patronage of the Government, acting through a mock convention of the people, instead of the highest, you would in all probability have been the lowest of the candidates.

During the same year, the State in which this ill-omened caucus convened has been agitated by revolutionary movements of the most alarming character. Assuming the dangerous doctrines that they were not bound to obey the injunctions of the Constitution because it did not place the powers of the State in the hands of an unchecked numerical majority, the electors belonging to the party of the Baltimore caucus who had been chosen to appoint the State Senators, refused to perform the functions for which they had been elected, with the deliberate intention to subvert the Government of the State, and reduce her to the territorial condition, till a new Government could be formed. And now we have before us a measure, not less revolutionary, but of an opposite character. In the case of Maryland, those who undertook, without the authority of law, or Constitution, to speak and act in the name of the people of the State, proposed to place her out of the Union by reducing her from a State to a Territory; but in this, those who in like manner undertook to act for Michigan, have assumed the authority to bring her into the Union without her consent, on the very condition which she had rejected by a convention of the people convened under the authority of the State. If we shall sanction the authority of the Michigan caucus, to force a State into the Union without its assent, why might we not here sanction a similar caucus in Maryland, if one had been called to place the State out of the Union?

These occurrences, which have distinguished the past year, mark the commencement of no ordinary change in our political system. They announce the ascendancy of the caucus system over the regularly constituted authorities of the country. I have long anticipated this event. In early life my attention was attracted to the working of the caucus system. It was my fortune to spend five or six years of my youth in the northern portion of the Union, where unfortunately the system has so long prevailed. Though young, I was old enough to take interest in public affairs, and to notice the working of this odious party machine; and after reflection, with the experience then acquired, has long satisfied me, that, in the course of time, the edicts of the caucus would eventually supersede the authority of law and Constitution. We have at last arrived at the commencement of this great change, which is destined to go on till it has consummated itself in the entire overthrow of all legal and constitutional authority, unless speedily and effectually resisted. The reason is obvious: for obedience and disobedience to the edicts of the caucuses, where the system is firmly established, are more certainly and effectually rewarded and punished, than to the laws and Constitution. Disobedience to the former is sure to be followed by complete political disfranchisement. It deprives the unfortunate individual who falls under its vengeance, of all public honors and emoluments, and consigns him, if dependent on the Government, to poverty and obscurity; while he who bows down before its mandates, it matters not how monstrous, secures to himself the honors of the State—becomes rich, and distinguished, and powerful. Offices, jobs, and contracts, flow on him and his connections. But to obey the law and respect the Constitution, for the most part, brings little except the approbation of conscience—a reward indeed high and noble, and prized by the virtuous above all others; but, unfortunately, little valued by the mass of mankind. It is easy to see what must be the end, unless, indeed, an effective remedy be applied. Are we so blind as not to see in this, why it is that the advocates of this bill—the friends of the system, are so tenacious on the point that Michigan should be admitted on the authority of the Anti Slavery caucus, and on no other? Do we not see why the amendment proposed by myself to admit her by rescinding the condition imposed at the last session should be so strenuously opposed? Why, even the preamble would not be surrendered, though many of our friends were willing to vote for the bill on that slight concession, in their anxiety to admit the State.

And here let me say that I listened with attention to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Crittenden.) I know the clearness of his understanding, and the soundness of his heart, and I am persuaded, in declaring that his objection to the bill was confined to the preamble, that he has not investigated the subject with the attention it deserves. I feel the objections to the preamble are not without some weight; but the true and insuperable objections lie far deeper in the facts of the case, which would still exist were the preamble expunged. It is these which render it impossible to pass this bill without trampling under foot the rights of the States, and subverting the first principles of our Government. It would require but a few steps more to effect a complete revolution; and the Senator from North Carolina has taken the first. I will explain. If you wish to mark the first indications of a revolution, the commencement of those profound changes in the character of a people which are working beneath, before a ripple appears on the surface, look to the change of language; you will first notice it in the altered meaning of important words, and which, as it indicates a change in the feelings and principles of the people, become in turn a powerful instrument in accelerating the change, till an entire revolution is effected. The remarks of the Senator will illustrate what I have said. He told us that the terms "convention of the people" were of very uncertain meaning, and difficult to be defined, but that their true meaning was, any meeting of the people in their individual and primary character for political purpose. I know it is difficult to define complex terms; that is, to enumerate all the ideas that belong to them, and exclude all that do not; but there is always, in the most complex, some prominent idea which marks the meaning of the term, and in relation to which there is usually no disagreement. Thus, according to the old meaning, (and which I had still supposed was its legal and constitutional meaning,) a convention of the people invariably implied a meeting of the people, either by themselves, or by delegates expressly chosen for the purpose, in their high sovereign authority, in expressed contradistinction to such assemblies of individuals in their private character, or having only derivative authority. It is, in a word, a meeting of the people in the majesty of their power—in that in which they may rightfully make or abolish Constitutions, and put up or put down Governments at their pleasure. Such was the august conception which formerly entered the mind of every American when the terms "convention of the people" were used. But now, according to the ideas of the dominant party, as we are told on the authority of the Senator from North Carolina, it means any meeting of individuals for political purposes, and, of course, applies to the meeting at Ann Arbor, or any other party caucus for party purposes, which the leaders choose to designate as a convention of the people. It is thus the highest authority known to our laws and Constitution is gradually sinking to the level of those meetings which regulate the operation of political parties, and through which the edicts of their leaders are announced, and their authority enforced; or, rather, to speak more correctly, the latter are gradually rising to the authority of the former. When they come to be completely confounded; when the distinction between a caucus and the convention of the people shall be completely obliterated, which the definition of the Senator, and the acts of this body on this bill, would lead us to believe is not far distant, this far political fabric of ours, erected by the wisdom and patriotism of our ancestors, and once the gaze and admiration of the world, will topple to the ground in ruins.

It has, perhaps, been too much my habit to look more to the future and less to the present, than is wise; but such is the constitution of mind, that when I see before me the indications of causes calculated to effect important changes in our political condition, I am led irresistibly to trace them to their sources, and follow them out in their consequences. Language has been held in this discussion, which is clearly revolutionary in its character and tendency, and which warns us of the approach of the period when the struggle will be between the conservatives and the destructives. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) as holding language countenancing the principle that the will of a mere numerical majority is paramount to the authority of law and constitution. He did not indeed distinctly announce this principle, but it might be fairly inferred from what he said; for he told us the people of a State, where the constitution gives the same weight to a smaller as to a greater number, might take the remedy into their own hand, meaning, as I understood him, that a mere majority might, at their pleasure, subvert the constitution and Government of a State, which he seemed to think was the essence of democracy. Our little State has a constitution that could not stand a day against such doctrines, and yet we glory in it as the best in the Union. It is a constitution which respects all the great interests of the State, giving to each a separate and distinct voice in the management of its political affairs, by means of which the feeble interests are protected against the preponderance of the greater. We call our State a republic—a commonwealth, not a democracy; and let me tell the Senator it is a far more popular Government than if I had been based on the same principle of the numerical majority. It takes more voices to put the machine of Government in motion, than in those that the Senator would consider more popular. It represents all the interests of the State, and is in fact the Government of the people, in the true sense of the term, and not that of the mere majority, or the dominant interests.

I am not familiar with the Constitution of Maryland, to which the Senator alluded, and cannot therefore speak of its structure with confidence; but I believe it to be somewhat similar in its character to our own. That it is a Government not without its excellences, we need no better proof than the fact that though within the shadow of executive influence, it has nobly and successfully resisted all the seductions by which a corrupt and artful administration, with almost boundless patronage, has tempted to seduce her into its ranks.

Looking, then, to the approaching struggle, I take my stand immovably. I am a conservative in its broadest and fullest sense, and such I shall ever remain, unless, indeed, the Government shall become so corrupt and disordered that nothing short of revolution can reform it. I solemnly believe that our political system is, in its purity, not only the best that ever was formed, but the best possible that can be devised for us. It is the only one by which free States, so populous and wealthy, and occupying so vast an extent of territory, can preserve their liberty. This thinking, I cannot hope for a better. Having no hope of a better, I am a conservative; and because I am a conservative, I am a States rights man. I believe that in the rights of the States are to be found the only effectual means of checking the overaction of this Government; to resist its tendencies to concentrate all power here, and to prevent a departure from the Constitution; or, in case of one, to restore the Government to its original simplicity and purity. State intervention, or, to express it more fully, the right of a State to interpose her sovereign voice as one of the parties to our constitutional compact, against the encroachments of this Government, is the only means of sufficient potency to effect all this; and I am, therefore, its advocate. I rejoiced to hear the Senators from North Carolina (Mr. Brown) and from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) do us the justice to distinguish between nullification and the anarchical and revolutionary movements in Maryland and Pennsylvania. I know they did not intend it as a compliment; but I regard it as the highest. They are right. Day and night are not more different—more unlike in every thing. They are unlike in their principles, their objects, and their consequences.

I shall not stop to make good this assertion, as I might easily do. The occasion does not call for it. As a conservative, and a States rights man, or, if you will have it, a nullifier, I have, and shall resist all encroachments on the Constitution, whether it be the encroachment of this Government on the States, or the opposite; the Executive on Congress, or Congress on the Executive. My creed is to hold both Governments, and all the departments of each, to their proper sphere, and to maintain the authority of the laws and the Constitution against all revolutionary movements. I believe the means which our system furnishes to preserve itself are ample, if fairly understood and applied, and I shall resort to them, however corrupt and disordered the times, so long as there is hope of reforming the Government. The result is in the hands of the Disposer of events. It is my part to do my duty. Yet, while I thus openly avow myself a conservative, God forbid I should ever deny the glorious right of rebellion and revolution. Should corruption and oppression become intolerable, and cannot otherwise be thrown off, if I am not a patriot, or the Government be overthrown, I would not hesitate, at the hazard of life, to resort to revolution, and to tear down a corrupt Government that could neither be reformed nor borne by freemen; but I trust in God things will never come to that pass. I trust never to see such fearful times; for fearful, indeed, they would be, if they should ever befall us. It is the last experiment, and not to be thought of till common sense and the voice of mankind would justify the resort.

Before I resume my seat, I feel called on to make a few brief remarks on a doctrine of fearful import, which has been broached in the course of this debate—the right to repeal laws granting bank charters, and of course, of railroads, turnpikes, and joint stock companies. It is a doctrine of fearful import, and calculated to do infinite mischief. There are countless millions vested in such stocks, and it is a description of property of the most delicate character. To touch it is almost to destroy it. But, while I enter my protest against all such doctrines, I have been greatly alarmed with the thoughtless precipitancy (not to use a stronger phrase) with which the most extensive and dangerous privileges have been granted of late. It can end in no good, and I fear, may be the cause of convulsions hereafter. We already feel the effects on the currency, which no one competent of judging but must see is in an unsound condition. I must say (for truth compels me) I have ever distrusted the banking system, at least in its present form, both in this country and Great Britain. It will not stand the test of time; but I trust that all shocks, or sudden revolutions, may be avoided, and that it may gradually give way, before some sounder and better regulated system of credit, which the growing intelligence of the age may devise. That a better may be substituted I cannot doubt, but of what it shall consist, and how it shall finally supersede the present uncertain and fluctuating currency, time alone can determine. All I can see is, that the present must, one day or another, come to an end, or be greatly modified, if that, indeed, can save it from an entire overthrow. It has within itself the seeds of its own destruction.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

SPEECH OF MR. EWING, OF OHIO.

(As reported in the National Intelligencer.)

In Senate, January 15, 1837.—On the resolution to expunge a part of the Journal for the session of 1833-34.

MR. EWING addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: Since the first presentation of this resolution, it has always been my purpose to say something upon it, before it should be brought to a final decision; but I was aware, from indications not to be mistaken, both at the time it was first presented, and at each subsequent session when it was brought forward, that the mover did not design to bring it then to the issue. Indeed, I well knew that it was deemed necessary, as a pending measure to agitate and excite the country. Every movement with reference to it showed that such was its purpose; and hence, after several months' discussion last year, when there was a clear administration majority in the Senate, and when the long session gave ample time for deliberation and decision, it was permitted to expire on the table, though a vote upon it was challenged by its opponents. But now, now at this moment, its power being expended—every thing being effected by it which can be expected or hoped from it—now it must come, and at once, to a final vote. And gentlemen upon this side of the House, who have been called upon to discuss it—who, because they would not, heretofore, when they saw that it was but a farce, discuss it—are denied a single day—nay, they are not allowed one hour, of which it is in the power of a fixed and determined majority to deprive them. No courtesy to individuals, which has been usual with this body, or, rather, a part of its very constitution and nature, can procure the slightest relaxation of the iron rule which seems to be laid down for us; the small favor of a day to deliberate, or a night to rest, is denied; if we ask for an adjournment, even at this late hour, when all occupation should be suspended, and all labor cease, we hear the cry of "No, no," and "The yeas and nays," coming from a quarter which, however it may be respected, is never disobeyed. Gentlemen have their reasons, doubtless. I leave them to weigh the importance of those reasons, and to estimate the propriety of their course. And, subject to all the disadvantages under which I labor, the extreme lateness of the hour, great bodily fatigue, and a want of time to arrange my thoughts, and cast them into form, and give them coherence, I proceed, rather than sit by in silence—I proceed to the discussion of this deeply exciting question.

I will not enter again fully into a consideration of the reasons that sustain the resolution of the Senate of the 28th day of March, 1834, which it is now proposed to expunge from the journals of the Senate. At the time when those resolutions were under discussion, I gave reasons, so far as my action was concerned, fully, and in detail. I have re-examined those reasons since, when any excitement to which the occasion may be supposed to have given rise had subsided, and I find nothing to retract, nothing to alter; time has made no change in my convictions, unless it be to strengthen and confirm them. It would, therefore, be unnecessary for me to touch again that branch of the subject, were it not that the arguments upon the other side have, year after year, been reiterated and reinforced; the subject which had been thus considered, discussed, decided, and laid aside, is thus revived from time to time, and the arguments upon the one side, with a perseverance worthy of a better cause, are again and again shown up before the public, while those which sustained that resolution, having once been triumphant, are now permitted to sleep. I feel the impolicy of our course in this, for hence impressions have taken root, and opinions have grown up in society, which constant vigilance and constant effort, and constantly uniting at all times, and pressing the contest, would have kept down; but it was a natural course; it arose from the repugnance which we all feel to turn to a subject on which the mind has exerted its powers, and retraced the path which we have already trodden, after it is divested of the charm of novelty and the freshness of original thought. But let gentlemen be assured, once for all, and let the country be assured, that we abandon no ground which we have assumed and heretofore sustained. Yet, though I will not go fully into the subject now, I will attempt a brief analysis of the arguments which, on a former occasion, I presented at large to the Senate.

It is perhaps necessary, in the first place, to say something of the character of the resolution of 1834, and to define as nearly as possible what we understood it to import. Gentlemen say that in its terms it conveyed censure of the act of the President, and pains are taken to show that its words imported censure. Now, sir, this argument was wholly unnecessary; this declaration useless; a simple inquiry would have settled the fact; for so far as I was concerned in this matter, and in this I believe I differed but little from those with whom I acted, I intended no praise—no laudation of the President or his executive act; that was not my object in voting for the resolution. I thought the President, in that act, had broken the laws and violated the Constitution of our country, and I intended to say so. I meant to speak the language of an American Senator, and a free American citizen; and the same language which I uttered then, I now reiterate, and would, on a like occasion, again embody it in the form of a resolution. It has also been said that this resolution attributes evil motives to the President in the performance of this act, and that the act charged against the Constitution, joined with the motive imputed, forms the subject of impeachment. This is wholly unfounded in fact. The resolution attributes no motive whatever. It speaks in the decorous, and, at the same time, dignified, language in which one of the legislative branches of our Government may properly speak of the executive or of the co-ordinate branch. We believed that the legislative rights and powers of the Senate had been encroached upon by the President, and that we who exercised those powers for the time being, as trustees of the people, were called upon to defend, or at least to assert them. This body could speak in that matter only by resolution; and by that means, and in that way, we did assert its rights under the Constitution, and we declared that those rights had been violated; but we charged no motive. Gentlemen insist that there is impeachable matter charged in the face of this resolution, and when we deny it, because no motive is charged, they turn and say we have abandoned our ground; that we soften down and palliate, to avoid the effect of our own act. This also is putting a false face upon the whole matter. I, for one, personally, never said, and never believed that the President was actuated in this matter by those high motives of public interest which ought to govern the Executive of a great nation. I never thought so; I never said so; and I have not wavered in my opinion; but that opinion, which was my own, was never incorporated into the resolution, either in language or in substance. Then let the resolution stand for itself, and speak its own language; and let the opinions of each of those who supported it be their own. be they strong or weak, firm or wavering; but let those private and individual opinions be kept distinct from the resolution, and let us be met in the argument fairly, not misrepresented.

I presume it will be admitted that it is in the power of Congress and the President, conjointly, by a law, to place the public treasure in such a situation that it will not be in the direct and immediate possession and control of the President. Perhaps I ask too much, by way of concession, considering the temper and character of the present times; but the time has been, and, I trust, will be again, when it would strike any American statesman as a self-evident proposition. The Constitution declares that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury, except upon appropriations made by law; and, if the Executive be a unit, as has been sometimes contended; and if the keeping of the treasure be necessarily an executive office; and if the drawing of money from the Treasury be also an executive office, the keeping of the treasure and the drawing from the Treasury be both done by the same hand, then have the framers of our Constitution failed, miserably failed, in their attempt to adjust its checks and balances—in their attempt to place the sword and the purse of the nation in separate and distinct hands. To say that money shall not be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriations made by law, and yet place the whole treasure of the nation in the hands of the Executive, who is (according to the political creed of gentlemen) the disbursing officer also, would be an excess of weakness almost approaching to idiocy.

If, then, it were in the power of Congress to place the public treasure out of the immediate control of the President, it was done in the law chartering the late Bank of the United States. The public moneys were placed in deposit in that bank by law; the bank, therefore, became the Treasury; for that is the Treasury where the public treasure is deposited and kept. The Constitution declares that money shall not be drawn from this Treasury except by appropriations made pursuant to law, and the law provides that the deposits (or, in other words, the treasure) shall remain in that bank, unless removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, (not by the President,) and for reasons which he (the Secretary) shall make known to Congress. So stand, or rather so stood, the Constitution and the law—as the safeguards of the public treasure. Could the President touch—could he possess himself of that treasure, without an infraction of the law and a violation of the Constitution? Could he, by a straightforward, direct act, in his own name, and by his own power, unaided by any instrument which he might fashion for himself, or which the Constitution had placed in his hands for other purposes? If he could not, is the act the less illegal or unconstitutional when done by indirection? All admit that a direct order from the President would not have touched public funds, and that the immediate keepers of those funds would not have been bound to obey, or even have been justified in obeying, such order. But the law placed in the hands of the President an instrument with which it could be done, and with which it was done; and I shall now show that it was done by putting a lawful instrument to an unlawful use.

The Constitution places the collection of the revenues of the United States in Congress; and the spirit of that provision, coupled with the other provision which requires a law of Congress to draw money from the Treasury, clearly fixes the custody of those revenues, when collected, in the same hands; and the several laws passed shortly after the adoption of the Constitution, separating our Government into departments, and appointing their heads, recognize and keep up this principle. In those acts the Department of State is called an "executive department." So with the Department of War; and both communicate directly with the President, and not with Congress; while the Treasury Department is not styled executive, and is made to communicate directly with Congress. Thus is explained the intent of the framers of the Constitution, and the understanding which a contemporaneous Congress had of its provisions.

But gentlemen here seize upon general terms used in that instrument, and would make them overturn its most particular and express provisions. The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Strange) says that, by the express language of the Constitution, "all executive power is vested in the President." The Senator has interpolated a word, and an important one. The Constitution does not say "all;" its letter does not, its spirit does not. The language of the Constitution is, "the executive power;" &c. but gentlemen, assuming that ALL executive power is granted, then exercise their ingenuity to find how many of the powers of our Government may be called executive, and all that can be included within that sweeping and undefined term they attribute to the President. But the Constitution does not say "all;" and if it did, the term, as it is elsewhere limited, would not justify their conclusions. Another clause in the Constitution does grant "ALL the legislative powers" to Congress; and yet, the same instrument, in another of its articles, confers a large and important portion of those powers upon the President. The judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court of the United States, and such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time appoint, and yet the same instrument vests in the Senate of the United States an important portion of those judicial powers—the trial of impeachments. It vests in the President "the executive power," and in another article gives to the Senate of the United States the most important share in that executive power. Gentlemen who contend that all power, executive in its nature, must follow this general grant, and who go for the exact separation, by distinct lines, of the three great powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, and their investment in three separate, uncontrolled, irresponsible branches, seem to me, with all deference, to misunderstand little of the nature of government. If those powers were exactly separated, so that each stood entirely unchecked and alone, the executive power, being the stronger—indeed, the only power capable of action—having drawn to itself, and according to gentlemen, being entitled to, the custody of the treasure of the nation, would be independent of all others, and above them all, and all must be absorbed and swallowed up in its vortex.

I have said that the executive act, which the resolution of March, 1834, condemns, was, in the language of that resolution, in derogation of both the Constitution and law. This I shall attempt to establish.

It was against law. The act of Congress incorporating the Bank of the United States was a law containing in itself a contract as soon as accepted by the bank, and it was a contract for a good and valuable consideration; this contract was violated in its spirit and intent, (and the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Strange) will not, I presume, deny that this contract had a spirit as well as letter, if the Constitution have now.) It was violated in its spirit, and so violated that, as between individuals in a parallel case, an action of law could have been sustained and damages recovered. This contract was, that the public money should be deposited in the bank, and should be continued there in deposit, until removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for reasons which he was required to lay before Congress. For this, among other things, the bank agreed to transmit the public funds, wheresoever wanted, free of charge, and it paid in cash a large bonus to the Government. Under this contract, it seems to me perfectly obvious, and even self-evident, that the public deposits could not be removed unless there were some just financial cause for removal. It could not be done to try experiments, nor to test its effect upon the public mind, but for some fiscal reason, of which the Secretary of the Treasury had official cognizance, and which he as the fiscal agent could make known to Congress. The removal too must, in order to conform to this law, be an act of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, his own official act, his own reason approving, and his own will moving him to its execution. It must have been likewise a Secretary, the regular officer of the Government appointed to perform the general duties of that office, and to whose duties this was but incidental and additional; not an officer appointed for the sole and only purpose of doing this act, and pledged, or committed to the act before his appointment. If this were not the case, the reference to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the requirement of his reasons, were but a mockery, a criminal evasion of right and justice, which would stamp fraud upon any private contract. I have thus shown what ought to have been done according to a fair and just construction of this law and contract; I will now show what was in fact done.

Just after the adjournment of Congress, and but a few weeks after an inquiry in the House of Representatives, and a decision that the public deposits were safe in the Bank of the United States, the President set on foot negotiations with the State banks, with a view to the removal of the deposits; this without the consent or concurrence of the then Secretary of the Treasury to the removal, but with his known and avowed opinion against the propriety as well as the legality of the act. I speak now of Secretary McLane, who was consulted by the President, and required to do the deed. He would not lend himself to be the instrument for any such purpose; he refused, and was removed from that office, to a higher it is true, but removed so that he was out of the way, and could not prevent the measure. He was of opinion that the deposits could not legally be removed without a reason, and that the reasons alleged as existing were unfounded or insufficient. Now, I contend that, according to any fair construction of the law, the bank had a right to the judgment of Mr. McLane, then Secretary of State, on that subject, and was entitled to all the benefit of his judgment and his volition; and it was a breach, or worse, a dishonest evasion of that contract to put that Secretary out of the way, his opinion having been taken, and because his opinion was taken, and put another in his place in order to try the experiment upon and by that other, especially as the then Secretary was not even accused of the slightest impropriety in his judgment or in his acts. His promotion to a superior office shows that he had not lost the confidence of the Executive. Mr. McLane was removed, and Mr. Duane appointed specially to perform the act. He was approached on the subject immediately after his appointment, in a manner which touched his spirit and wounded his pride, and by an individual from whose communion he shrunk with disgust. He was pressed by the President himself, but at last refused, because the reasons for the act were insufficient, and he was removed; and so far as Executive disappointment and party slander could do it, he was disgraced. The President then called in a third Secretary, who had pronounced an opinion before his appointment, and by the President, through him, the act was done. Now, I say that, if in a parallel case between individuals this course had been pursued by one party towards the other, any court or jury would decide, any honest community would declare, that the contract was violated—shamefully violated.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan,) in his zeal to vindicate the acts of the President, and testify his gratitude to him, has done injustice to some of his own constituents—to men in all the relations of life, social and official, as correct and honorable as himself. The gentleman said that the directors of the Bank of the United States, for political effect, for the purpose of operating upon the elections, and compelling a recharter of the bank, first threw out a large amount of bank paper, and created a delusive prosperity, then suddenly contracted their issues, in order to distress the community, and make them cry out for a recharter. This, sir, is not true in the connection and the manner in which it is stated; it is not true in fact, to say nothing about motive. The bank did not contract its issues until it had received notice, unofficial, it is true, but not until it had received notice that the deposits would be withdrawn, and that the Executive power and influence would be directed against the institution, to discredit and destroy it. The documents laid upon our table during that agitating session, conclusively show this fact. The public prints of the day on the side of the administration show it. The speeches of Senators in this body at that time show it. By all these the bank was declared to be insolvent, and unworthy of credit. The public deposits were said to be unsafe in its vaults, in consequence of that insolvency; and the agent appointed by the President to settle the preliminaries of a contract with some of the State banks, declares that he will bring the Bank of the United States, as a rupture, to the feet of the Executive. Then, with all this Executive power and executive influence directed against it; with this large amount of public deposits to be suddenly and capriciously withdrawn, while at the same time the party press resounded through the Union the approaching prostration and destruction of the bank; while the institution was assailed on all sides, and unadvised of the point at which the next attack was to be made, I ask you, sir, and I ask every candid man, whether the men who managed the affairs of that institution, whose public and whose private characters also were in a high degree involved in making good its defence, I ask whether they can be censured, with any show or color of justice, for using all the lawful means which were placed in their hands to sustain and support the credit of the institution.

Sir, not only their duty to themselves, but their duty to the public at large, required it. If that bank had fallen beneath the weight of the Executive arm, it would have dragged down with it most of the banks in the Union, and it would have caused much individual distress, bankruptcy, and ruin. Hence every principle of self-preservation, every motive of patriotism and of duty, united to impel those men to use every means so to guard and fortify and defend their institution so that it would stand the shock. And they did guard it, and defend it so that it withstood a power before which the Bank of England would have fallen, even in its most palmy days. Perhaps they fortified their fortress more strongly than actual necessity required; perhaps they overrated the strength of the enemy, and were not fully conscious of their own; perhaps they remained in their entrenchments after the siege was raised, or the power of the assailants had become exhausted; but if they erred, it was on the side not of danger but of duty, and their success has conferred a lasting benefit on the country. This much I do not think proper to say in behalf of those gentlemen with whom I have some acquaintance, but no connection of any kind, and I say it as an act of common justice towards them, who have been attacked, and whose acts have been misrepresented on this floor.

The Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Strange,) in the abundance of his charity, declares that he does not accuse Senators of taking bribes of the Bank of the United States. He acquits them of the foul charge, as he really believes they were not bribed. The Senate are much indebted to the honorable member for his decree of acquittal, especially as they never constituted him their judge. But what right has he, or what right has any man who is not himself shameless, in the presence of this body or elsewhere, to entertain the infamous proposition for a moment; to speak of it in terms of either denial or belief; to refer to it at all, except to consign the base slanderers who invented and who uttered it, to the depth of infamy which their atrocious falsehoods have merited? But there are bounds to the liberality of the Senator from North Carolina. He thinks, if I have comprehended him, that gentlemen here, who were counsel for the Bank of the United States may have been warped in their feelings and judgment from that cause, to form opinions which no unbiassed and intelligent man could form, and to do acts which no honest man having an intellect much above idiocy could do. The Senator has not told us where or how, or among whom, he has formed his opinion of the bar, especially of those who are admitted to be among its best and most honorable and most enlightened members.

[MR. STRANGE explained: did not say that gentlemen who were counsel for the bank were biassed from that cause, but that they were warped by political excitement.]

I am happy (said Mr. E.) to receive the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina, and yet I am at a loss to comprehend how he used the fact of the employment of some gentlemen as legal counsel for the bank, and the statements of that bank following, with a "but," the general acquittal of direct and naked bribery. But however these engagements may have been supposed by him or others to operate on the minds of gentlemen with whom they were made, they certainly never affected mine, as I never was in any case the counsel of that institution. Still I know not but the same influence may be brought equally home to me, for I in several cases profited by the litigation of the bank by engagements on the opposite side, which engagements I should never have had, if there had been no bank to bring suits against those who employed me to defend them. So that, on the whole, I believe I must even share with my friends here, whom I have sometimes met in the hall below, where justice is still administered, and where truth and reason and law are not yet outraged or spurned. I must even content myself to share with them in the imputation of that bias which counsellors at law are supposed to feel in behalf of those through whose means they obtain a cause in a court of justice.

But I do not admit that the Senator's charge, as explained, approaches nearer to the truth than that which I had mistaken for it, and which he has just corrected. I for one was not moved in this matter by political interest or political excitement. It was a subject for cool deliberation and sober judgment, and I brought the powers of my mind calmly and patiently to act upon it; and when full conviction followed investigation, and my opinion was fixed, I acted in obedience to the dictates of that judgment, not under excitement—unless, indeed, a strong feeling of attachment to those abstractions called law and right, which at some times, and in some minds, warms and kindles, and glows to enthusiasm, is to be called by that name.

I have said, and have attempted to show, that the act of the President, in the removal of the deposits, was illegal. The Senator from North Carolina cannot conceive it possible that any man can hold such an opinion, but he tells us that he was himself startled at the boldness of the act; he feared the people would not sustain it. And permit me, with all deference, to say to that gentleman, that if the people had not sustained it, he would then have been startled at its illegality. I thought it illegal: so thought twenty-six out of the forty-eight Senators in this body: so thought McLane, Secretary of the Treasury: so thought Mr. Duane, who was made Secretary for the mere purpose of doing the act. And when they thought so, their political feelings and their personal predilections were all on the side of those doing the act which their judgments condemned. This same act, sir, which startled the Senator from North Carolina in his private retreat, startled, also, the nation; and the sensation did not subside until they and he had become used and reconciled to new and extravagant acts of Executive power. There are other gentlemen now on this floor who condemned this act in the strongest terms, until they knew that the popular voice would sustain it. The Senator from Virginia near me, (Mr. Rives,) at the close of the last session, in a speech which, I am sorry to say, has never found its way into the public papers, declared that in this act he thought the Executive had gone to the very verge of the Constitution, but that he had not overstepped it. I differed from the Senator from Virginia in this only: I thought he had not only gone to the verge of the constitutional boundary, but that he had broken over it. That gentleman and myself were separated in opinion by a mere mathematical line—length, without breadth or thickness; for he thought, and so stated on the occasion I have referred to, that the custody of the public treasure belonged, by the Constitution, to the representatives of the States and of the people, and that almost any sacrifice ought to be made, in order to restore it to their hands. But the Senator from North Carolina, whose opinion, since he has recovered from the first surprise that the Executive act occasioned, is, on this subject especially, entitled to very great weight, thinks that no man, possessing both honesty and sense, could vote for the resolution which passed the Senate.

MR. STRANGE.—I did not say so. I said they could not, unless under strong previous bias.

MR. EWING.—The explanation amounts to but little. A bias which destroyed the honesty or obscured the sense, is now introduced and attributed, to lighten the odium of the charge which his unqualified language, as I understood it cast upon the former majority of this body. And now, the Senator from Virginia, who believed the President had gone to the very verge of the Constitution, and had then possessed himself of the treasure which, by that Constitution, belonged to the representatives of the people, and the Senator from North Carolina, who was, in private, "startled" by the boldness of the act, until he found that the people sustained it, are ready to vote censure and obloquy upon those Senators who ventured to express an opinion, before they knew whether that opinion would be sustained by the popular voice or not. For one, I respect not their opinions, so elicited and so expressed; and I scorn their censure and their reproach. When men use language harsh or vindictive, or utter degrading charges against others at least as honorable as themselves, they seize a two-edged sword, which often wounds the hand that wields it. I am willing to stand in the ranks in which I then stood, and now stand, and receive their onset, no matter how fierce and how furious. I am willing to risk the character of the major-city which passed that resolution for integrity and intelligence, and independence of thought and of action, against this majority, who is now the instrument of its infamy. And if, in connection with the pregnant incidents of the times, the names of those who have taken part in the moving scenes should descend, and pass in review before posterity, I feel that I have well chosen the rank in which my humble name shall stand to receive the judgment of that august tribunal.

I find that I am desultory and diffuse in my course of discussion, but time was not allowed me to prepare to be connected and brief. I have shown that the removal of the deposits was in violation of a contract, and against law. I shall now endeavor to make good the position that it was in violation of the Constitution. For this a few words will suffice; for it flows as a consequence from the illegality of the act of removal, and the conceded point that the Legislature and not the Executive is the constitutional keeper and guardian of the public treasure. The President, if he had seized that treasure by an act of open and direct violence, and become himself the keeper, in defiance of legislative authority, would by the concurrent opinion of all here, have violated that Constitution which made the Legislature its keeper. But if, through the exercise of a power which the law (not the Constitution) placed in his hands for other purposes, he did by lawful means effect this unconstitutional object, does it vary the case, or make the violation of the Constitution less certain? The President had by law a right to remove the Secretary of the Treasury, though he had no right to seize the public treasure; but, through the exercise of that power of removal, exerted for that distinct and avowed purpose, and that purpose only, he did seize upon the public treasure, and dispose of it according to his will. He used a lawful weapon to do an illegal and constitutional act. This is not difficult to be comprehended. A man has a legal right to use his own walking-stick, yet it is easy to conceive how he may use it illegally. The Senator from Virginia admits that the President almost violated the Constitution. "He marched to its verge," I say he overstepped it.

These are my reasons for thinking and for voting that the executive act of the President in the case referred to was not in accordance with the Constitution and law, but in violation of both; and I care not how lightly the Senator from North Carolina may speak of either the sense or honesty which dictated that opinion and that vote. Language such as his on this occasion falls harmless to the ground, or recoils on him who utters it.

Having proved the statement in the resolution, then the next inquiry is as to our right to spread it on the record. Gentlemen on the side of the administration heap upon the act, in this aspect of it, the terms "shameful," "disgraceful," "flagrant impropriety," all the epithets of detestation and abhorrence which these diligent gentlemen have been able to collect and amass from our whole vocabulary. But let this pass; it amounts to little. Reproach and violence from those who profess to pass judgment, leaves an intelligent public (to whom is the final inquiry impressed with the conviction that the discretion of the Judge was lost in his own passion. They probably will not stop to inquire what has become of his propriety. On the one hand, towards the former majority of the Senate we have vituperation and reproach fit to be cast only on a tenant of Newgate, by a felon like himself; and towards the President tirade upon tirade of fulsome flattery, which would make even a coquette turn sick. Let all this go to the country; a discerning public will see what I see—motives not to be named or avowed, lying deep in the breasts of those who say and do these things—deep, but not hidden, and prompting them, or rather goading them, on to the act. As the deed is to be done, I am glad it comes in the form and is pressed in the spirit and temper which here discloses itself; for, being so done, it will be repudiated as authority, either as to opinion or fact, by every honest and candid mind.

Why was it improper or indelicate to pass this resolution, if the facts and opinions set forth in it be true and correct? Gentlemen say we may not express our opinion of the act, because we may possibly be the triers of the actor. The President might, by possibility, be impeached, and we, as a Senate, would be called upon to try him; therefore, it was indelicate and improper to give an opinion beforehand which might influence our decision hereafter. Now, my answer to this is, that the question of delicacy and propriety here put is merely of a personal nature, and addresses itself to each individual member, rather than to the whole body, for the Senate, as a body, was not committed to any thing by that resolution. Suppose, then, at the time these resolutions passed, with the full knowledge that all of us had of the power of the Executive, and the state of parties in the other House; suppose any one here, being asked privately his opinion on the subject, had declined, as a matter of delicacy, to give it, lest he should be committed in case of an impeachment preferred against the President; which would you have considered it, a serious scruple, or rather an idle jest? The truth is, there is nothing in the point, nor am I able to convince myself that any man ("except under strong political bias") can believe there is any thing in it. As for myself, I knew there was to be no impeachment, and no trial; and my own opinion of propriety and right was then, as it is now, the guide of my own actions. The President had done an act violatory of the Constitution, and especially affecting the powers and rights of this body as one of the legislative branches of the Government. What was to be done to reassert the Constitution and the rights of the Senate by law? The executive veto was ready to give a quietus to every law which you might have attempted to pass. He had possessed himself of the public treasure, and you could pass no law to wrest it from his hands. What was to be done? Be calm, say gentlemen; be quiet; make no disturbance; it is quite startling; say nothing; the country can stand it; and perhaps, if you are silent and patient under this, the President may commit no more acts of violence; but, if you irritate, he may do still worse things. They therefore would have recommended silence and submission.

The Senate, as a legislative body, has the right to assert its own powers by virtue of that first of nature's laws, self-preservation. A body composed of numerous members can speak only by some prescribed form, such as an order or a resolution; and as in this case their constitutional powers were assailed, and as it was their duty, their solemn duty, to reassert them, that the invasion might not stand without objection or contradiction, and thus become a binding precedent in future times.

The resolution of the Senate is also objected to as one couched in terms of censure against the President; it is said to be reproachful in its language and its import. Believing that I have established the position that the resolution is true in point of fact and opinion, and that it was due to the rights of this body, which we were delegated by the States, for the time being, to guard and protect, that we should, in a resolution couched in some language, assert those rights. I now ask any candid man, whether a partisan of the President or not, if he can devise any language, conveying the substance and sense of that resolution, which shall be more decorous and more courteous than that? Can you, sir, convey the idea in milder, more dignified, and more appropriate language? It is true it contains no compliment, no adulation. This the Senator from Pennsylvania has discovered, and therefore condemns it. That gentleman, in reference to the President, uses the word "immaculate," which I never before heard applied to but one created being, and that in worship. This resolution contains no such term as applied to the President, and I think I would not now, if it were again before the Senate, move to insert the word, even if that would gain for it the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

In England, from which we derive our free institutions, and to which we still refer for precedent of parliamentary independence, (God knows how long those examples may be endured in England,) it is not deemed the duty of Parliament to address the King, or to answer his address in terms only of acquiescence and praise. The British Parliament represents a free people, and they have not forgotten to speak the language of freemen; and did any one ever hear of an attempt in that body to cast reproach upon itself or any of its members because they ventured in such address to move or to express disapprobation of the acts of their monarch, or to assert their own rights or the rights of the people? It certainly has not been deemed a cause for expunging their journals that they contain something disagreeable to majesty. There was a time, it is true, as late as the reign of Charles the First, when the King sent into the House of Commons his warrant to arrest and imprison members for words uttered on the floor of Parliament; but that time has gone by. Great Britain, moving in the direction towards freedom and the perfecting of free institutions, has long since passed that point, and we, tending as rapidly towards despotic power, have not yet quite reached it. When we look at British precedents and refer to British history, we ought not to forget that they and we have started at different points, and are moving in different directions. They, beginning with an irregular and almost despotic monarchy, with undefined powers, checked only by the strength of the feudal aristocracy, have marched onward slowly but steadily, step by step, towards the perfection of a free and representative Government; and perhaps they are still moving onward. We, commencing with a pure constitutional representative Government, with justly balanced powers, have rushed onward with a velocity almost inconceivable towards despotism, if it be decorous to call that despotism which concentrates all the powers of the Government in a single man, and makes his will the law. If, in our different course, we should meet our great archetype, and find, at some one moment of our history, our Government to be what hers is or was, we are not to suppose that our career is then forward to be the same. If we meet, we pass with the swiftness of moving engines, so that we can scarcely catch a glance of that which we have met, and from which we are passing.

Mr. President, every thing intrinsic and extrinsic—all that can catch the popular ear, or enlist one vulgar passion, no matter how low and base, is resorted to by gentlemen who ought to be, and who are, honorable, to sustain them in the commission of this act. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives,) could you credit it, sir, says that this Senate, which is one of the constitutional departments of our Government, and without which the form, as well as the essence, of our Government could not exist; that this Senate, of which he himself is a member, and which a common, but very homely, proverb might teach him he could not dishonor without self degradation; this Senate, he says, is essentially an aristocratic body, riding upon the backs of the people. Do we hear that here, and from such a source, or was I deceived? Who are they that compose the aristocracy of this body? Men elected by the States to discharge, for a time, an important trust; and who, when that trust is discharged, and the period of their service ended, return again to the common mass from which they were taken. Aristocracy! Where is the danger, where is the possibility of an aristocratic order rising up in this Union? Look about you every where: men who hold the highest stations, and wield the greatest influence, and even wealth, spring from the common ranks of the people. Their power and their influence they cannot transmit; and as to their wealth, when the hand that gathered and the hand which holds it shall moulder in the dust, it is scattered to the four winds of heaven; it goes to build up and enrich the son of the hard-handed yeoman; and the children's children of him who counted his gold by millions become, not beggars, but common laborers in our streets. Where, then, is the danger of aristocracy in America? There is one source from which it may flow in upon us, and one only. When our public offices become transmissible by the will of the incumbent to his successor; when the men who hold station can direct the line through which the succession to that station shall descend, whether by birth to the son, or by appointment to the favorite, we have, in substance, a monarchy, and we have an aristocracy. In the classic language of the Senator, "riding on the backs of the people," say, we have worse, a shameful, corrupt, and corrupting oligarchy.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) says that the Senate is merely called upon to rejudge its own justice; in other words, to determine whether the opinion it expressed was correct or not. But is this true? Is that the act to which the majority of the Senate is now proceeding? If so, it were but an expression of opinion adverse to opinions heretofore expressed by a former majority, and entirely consistent with gentlemanly intercourse and feeling. But no such thing. No: it is placed, and it is pressed, as a vote of censure and opprobrium upon the former majority. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, it seems, once intended it should assume a form consistent with the courtesy and propriety of legislative bodies. He promised the striking out of the obnoxious word "expunge," and so the resolution was to have passed; and what strong motive, or strong offence, could have induced the Senator to abandon his conciliatory course, and again poison the resolution with insult and reproach? What, think you, could have so driven him from his propriety? Why, truly, a Senator from Massachusetts, some two years since, moved to lay the expunging resolution, when so amended, on the table; that was the insult; a motion to lay a resolution on the table is the mighty insult which swells the hearts of gentlemen almost to bursting with patriotic indignation, and which justifies all this harsh and ruthless violence. Hence the word "expunge" in the body of the resolution. Hence a recital charged with as harsh and injurious imputation as gentlemen can use towards each other, if not more harsh and more injurious. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he wished to be saved the necessity of compelling the Senate to vote this straw, upon themselves. Who, I ask, gave him, and those with whom he acts, power, and who gave them impunity, to fix stigmas, or compel stigmas, upon men, in all things honorable, their equals at least? Who cares for their stigma or their censure? I, for one, cast them to the winds. I despise, I trample upon them. Sir, since it has been determined that a resolution in any form inconsistent with the resolution of March 1834, should pass; and since there is at least a majority in the Senate ready to obey the mandate, I am glad once again that it contains substance, and has assumed a form, which will forever destroy it as authority for the future; and when it comes to an issue such as this, veracity, and honor, and character brought into collision, I fear not the issue of the contest, and I care not with what weapons it is waged. All at last results in an appeal to the country, and to future times. And if this resolution had been couched in language of decent sobriety; if it had been in its terms calm, dispassionate, and strong; it would, by virtue of the names which support it, have carried with it much weight and authority; but now there is no danger of this; the resolution itself, and the speeches with which it is ushered in, show the spirit by which it is moved. Sir Edward Coke, at a time when he was himself a sycophant, called Sir Walter Raleigh "a spider of hell," because Raleigh was unhappily out of favor with his sovereign; yet, no one at this day esteems Coke the more, or Raleigh the less, for this outpouring of malignity. Edmund Saunders, in the report of one of his cases at law, says, in Twysden (Justice) gave judgment in furore, and he adds, in his quiet manner, "note, reader, this judgment was clearly wrong;" and such has been the universal opinion of the profession; and such will be the opinion, a priori, of mankind, as to every judicial decision, and every act of a deliberative body, which is the result of passion rather than reason and judgment.

The majority of the Senate, who are moving on, or perhaps, more properly speaking, moved on, to the destruction of the journals, ought to consider well the act which they are about to perform. The Constitution, which we and they are sworn to support, requires that the Senate shall keep a journal of their proceedings; much useless learning was expended upon this word at the last session. We know its meaning without consulting our dictionaries; its popular sense is its true sense. The framers of the Constitution did not search books for the definition of the word, but understood it and used it in its plain and obvious sense; and they would have been astonished if it had been told them that that word could ever become the subject of cavil. That it has so, and that it is now the doctrine of the majority, that the destruction of the record is no infraction of the Constitution, which requires that it shall be kept, is a touchstone by which the value of their judgment against the former majority of the Senate may be used. It is a matter that every man of plain common sense can understand and decide as well as the most learned and most wise; and they can, from this specimen, determine how much weight is due to the opinions of men who hold that to erase, to blot out, to expunge, is not inconsistent with the command "to keep," to which command we all have sworn obedience. I will not touch the miserable sophistry by which gentlemen attempt to evade the meaning and wrest the sense of this provision of the Constitution; it does not merit a reply.

The Constitution of Pennsylvania is substantially copied in this particular from the Constitution of the United States; like that, it contains a provision that both Houses shall keep a journal. The Senator from Pennsylvania, many years ago, while a member of one branch of that Legislature, moved a resolution declaring that it was a violation of the Constitution to expunge any thing from the journal once entered there. He is of the same opinion still; and he proposes to be consistent, and yet vote for expunging what is entered on the journals of this body under a precisely similar constitutional provision. Could any man who had not heard him conjecture how this could be done? The word expunge has, he says, a literal, and it has also a metaphorical meaning, and the records of the Senate are to be expunged metaphorically. What a farce, if its arbitrariness would permit us to look upon it as a subject of ridicule. But who could avoid smiling, even in the midst of bitterness, to see the array of authorities which the erudite Senator adduced to show that the word "expunge" is used metaphorically in cases where it cannot have a literal application? He has shown us examples in which good writers speak of expunging forms of government, systems of religion, and vices of men—all clearly metaphorical, and known at once to be so, because they are not susceptible of the literal and physical application of the term. You cannot draw a black line over, nor can you draw black lines round, a "form of government," for you cannot touch it or handle it, though you may mar its symmetry and destroy its strength; nor can you take physical, tangible hold of systems of religion or of human vices; hence the terms you apply to them are necessarily metaphorical, whether you expunge, uproot, or demolish them. But if you expunge a writing, which is on paper, or uproot a tree or shrub, or demolish a building, the words then have their literal meaning, capable only of literal, physical application; and he who pretends to use it under those circumstances metaphorically, wrests the word from its true use, and gives it a false application. Expunge metaphorically! The disquisition of the learned gentleman reminds me of the death of two doughty heroes in a fatal battle, commemorated in the "Rape of the Lock:"—

"One died in metaphor, and one in song."

It will be seen at once that the thought is much better in a burlesque poem, than in grave debate on the floor of the Senate.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania has spread cheering prospects before us; a bright vista, opening amid the surrounding gloom to delight our vision. This, he says, is the last exciting subject that is to agitate our councils; we are to have a balmy season; all is to be, henceforth, quiet, and kindness, and peace. But he has not told us how these things are to be brought to pass; whether this is the last act of violence that is to be perpetrated by the majority against the Constitution of their country, and the rights of this body; or whether he supposes that, by this, the spirit of liberty is to be crushed, and we are to be averted to silence and submission. I will suppose the first, as it better accords with the kindness which he still entertains for those whose rights and feelings he has most outraged; and if so, his language may be rendered into brief, plain English, thus: Gentlemen, be quiet and be calm; meet us with no arguments, and cast on us no reproaches; the President must be gratified, because he is immaculate; and you must be stigmatized, because you have offended him. We may be somewhat harsh and unscrupulous, but excuse us, for we are very much excited; but this is the last time we will do an act of lawless violence against you; all shall be, henceforth, justice and peace.

I should be gratified to know that the Senator from Pennsylvania has that power over the political elements which he seems to claim, in giving us this strong assurance of their future quiet. Would that we could rely upon his promise, or his prediction; but no, he is deceived. Those who have abandoned the standard of the Constitution and the law, cannot, when they choose, rear it again, and rally their hosts around it, and repel their fears, and reanimate their confidence. They cannot lay their hands upon the institutions of their country, and pull down and destroy until they themselves shall be satisfied, and then bid the work of mischief cease. When the ocean is lashed into a rage, no matter who are the spirits of the storm, they cannot say to it, thus far shalt thou go, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed. No, he is deceived; there are other powers in motion below and around him which he wists not of, and whose might he can neither direct nor resist. I have stood upon the borders of this mighty ocean, and noted the precursors of the coming storm. I have heard the moan of the waves in the caverns of the deep; and seen the upheaving of the billows, which will rise, and rage, and toss, as foam from their crest, him and those who are now his trust and his strength.

Mr. President, I envy not the principle of him, who has pressed forward these resolutions against the opinions, and the feelings, and the consciences of those whom he has found means to compel to their support—resolutions which he has urged on with passions, fierce, vindictive, furious. Still less do I envy the condition of those who are compelled to go onward, against all those feelings and motives which should direct the actions of the legislator and the man. Why do I see around me so many pale features and downcast eyes, unless it be that repentance goes hand-in-hand with the perpetration of the deed? I had rather stand with the minority; yes, I would rather, a thousand times, stand alone, powerless but conscience-free, than to wield the strength of an empire, on the hard conditions on which it is placed in their hands.

But this scene is passing, and will soon have passed not to be recalled—the deed is to be done, and you and we must submit our acts to an enlightened public, whose judgment will be a foretaste of the judgment of posterity. To these I bow with submission and hope, but not with unwavering confidence of the future. The fame of those who have joined in this struggle for the Constitution depends upon the final success of constitutional Government. If that prevail and endure; if the clouds that overshadow its prospects pass away, and it be restored to what it once was, in all its freshness and beauty, every thing that we could desire for ourselves and our country is attained. But if we still move on in the downward course; if the cataract only be passed, and we are to glide on in the smooth but rapid current into the gulf to which we have been tending, and are never to return, these struggles will be referred to hereafter as scenes in which the country was disturbed by violent and factious spirits, and the names of those who stood for the Constitution amid these stormy scenes will be mentioned only with censure and reproach. So it has been in times past. When the last spark of Roman liberty was extinguished, and a monarch's court and council occupied the forum and the senate chamber; when no voice but that of Augustus was heard, and no power but his was known, the venal flatterers of his court vied with each other in heaping praise on him, and censure and reproach on those firm spirits who stood for their country to the last, and were at last buried in its ruins. Caesar, by his power and clemency, had subjugated a wild; all but the dark and unrelenting soul of Cato. In an event such as this, (which Heaven avert!) let the little band to which it is my pride to belong share in the reproach as they share in the spirit of the last of the Romans—that spirit which scorns to bow before any earthly power, save that of their country and its laws.

REDUCTION OF THE REVENUE.

SPEECH OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

[As reported for the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, Thursday, February 23, 1837.—The motion of Mr. Davis to strike from the bill "common salt" being then pending before the Senate—

Mr. DAVIS rose and said, that as the motion had, on a former day, called forth much discussion in opposition, he felt bound to justify himself in proposing it; and he would here take the occasion to say that he was gratified that this bill, instead of sleeping on the files, had been brought under discussion, for two reasons:

First. The revenue was greater than the demands of the United States required, and therefore ought to be reduced, and as he approved of most of this bill, he was anxious to give it his support. He should do so, if it received some modifications, so as to save a large body of the citizens of Massachusetts from a sudden, unexpected, and probably a great reverse in their affairs.

Second. If the bill passed in another form, it would be a distinct declaration to the country that the policy of the coming administration would be to agitate this subject, and to revive the struggles of the opposing sections of the country, which had for a time subsided. If this was to be the policy, he was gratified to have it thus early announced; for those who had spread their canvass to catch the breeze, could reef or take in sail before the political storm reached them. It was better to be advised of its approach than to be suddenly overwhelmed by its violence. He had nothing to regret in seeing this subject under consideration, though he should press for some amendments which he deemed important. He should not, in his remarks, touch upon the general subject of protecting the great industry of the country, but should confine himself to the matter in hand, and would show distinctly that common salt had long been manufactured in the United States; that it had on several occasions been countenanced by the Federal Government; that a large capital was employed in it; that the duty was now more than twenty per cent; that it falls within the provisions of the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act, and consequently cannot be retained in this bill without modifying the terms of that act, which some gentlemen at least affirm to be sacred. If he proved all this, he felt well assured that this bill, if it became a law, making common salt free of duty, must be held by the country as a declaration which could not be misunderstood, that the tariff of duties was to be the subject of political agitation at future sessions as well as at this.

The time was when it was deemed high and patriotic service to the country to promote the manufacture of salt. All admit it to be an article of the first necessity, as it enters into the consumption of man and beast, and of universal necessity, for the laws of our nature make it almost as indispensable to our existence as the air we breathe. This was early urged as a reason why we should not rely upon the uncertain supplies afforded from foreign countries by commerce, which is liable at all times to be interrupted by wars and restrictions, but should have supplies afforded from our own production, which would be certain and unfailing in all contingencies.

This matter was brought to the test in the revolutionary war. Commerce was broken up, and the supplies so utterly failed that the privation and distress was great, as the journal of the Congress during that period will prove.

The price became so great that even the Government could not obtain it for the army, and I need state no other fact to show that it was out of the reach of the poor, who were obliged to yield to the distressing privation.

In July, 1775, Congress raised a committee of thirteen to inquire into the easiest and cheapest method of making salt in the colonies.

In December, 1775, "Resolved, That as the importation of any universally necessary commodity, and the exportation of our produce to purchase the same, must give a proportionally greater opportunity to our enemies of making depredations on the property of the inhabitants of these colonies, and of occasionally distressing them by intercepting such commodities, it is earnestly recommended to the several assemblies or conventions immediately to promote by sufficient public encouragement the making salt in their respective colonies."

In June 3d, 1777, "Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to devise ways and means for supplying the United States with salt."

June 13, 1777, "Resolved, That it be recommended to the several States to offer such liberal encouragement to persons importing salt as they shall judge will be effectual," &c.

"That it be recommended to the several States to erect and encourage in the most liberal and effectual manner proper works for the making of salt."

These are some of the resolves of that distinguished body, which indicate the grievous scarcity of that article, and the privation and suffering both in and out of the army in consequence of it.

In response to this public demand he said he was informed that the works upon Cape Cod, in Massachusetts, were commenced, and have been continued from thence down to this time. They, therefore, had this early origin in an appeal to the patriotic to meliorate the sufferings of their countrymen.

When the Federal Government went into operation in 1789, under the Constitution, the first work of Congress, after providing the forms of the oaths necessary to organization, was to pass that memorable act with this preamble: "Whereas it is necessary, for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement of manufactures; that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Be it enacted," &c. This act imposed a duty on salt of six cents a bushel. The duty, therefore, which the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) has condemned as odious, and assigned it to the administration of Mr. Adams, as if that cast upon it additional infamy, was the first act of the first Congress under George Washington. In 1790 it was raised to twelve cents, and in 1797 to twenty cents. Odious as it was represented to be, it was continued until 1807, the last year of Mr. Jefferson's administration, when it was all removed, and salt was imported free of duty. Twenty-five years had then elapsed since the revolutionary war, and the privations and distress of that period had faded out of the memories of men, and with this oblivion of the past they forgot the occasion which had excited the public to encourage home production. The country passed on till 1813, when the duty of twenty cents a bushel was restored, and so continued till 1830. The embargo, the non-intercourse acts, and the late war brought a new pressure upon the country, and fresh suffering, which again reminded the people that salt was an article indispensable to their comfort, and that the supplies by commerce were uncertain and liable to interruptions. The article rose to an extravagant price, selling in many parts of the country at more than five dollars the bushel, (as he had been well informed, here and elsewhere,) and at five and a half dollars the sack in the cities, as a document before him testified. This fresh experience restored men to their senses, and brought them back to the policy of the revolution; consequently, when the double duties after the war were repealed, that upon salt was left in full force, doubtless to encourage the production.

Fifteen years elapsed, scarcity and high prices were again forgotten, and the necessity of domestic production was again overwhelmed by the very argument used to enforce its expediency. The manufacture was urged, because salt was necessary, under all circumstances, and stood upon the same footing as lead, powder, ordnance, arms, and all things necessary to the defence of the country. These, it was said, we should produce ourselves, and rest our dependence upon no foreign nation for supply, as it would be manifestly unwise to trust to the uncertain resources of commerce for the means to defend our country against invasion. Equally unwise was it considered to rely upon a source which had, and doubtless would again, fail us, when commerce should be interrupted from any cause, for an article so necessary as salt. While, therefore, the duty was imposed because the article was one of prime necessity, it was repealed, in part, in 1830, for precisely the same reason. It was then urged, as it now is, that, because all must use it, it ought not to be taxed, but to come in free, though it should destroy the manufactures which had been reared up at a great outlay of capital, and in obedience to the urgent call of the Government itself. The act of 1830 reduced the duty five cents in that year, and five cents in the succeeding year, bringing it down to ten cents, where it stood when the act of 1835 passed, and then it fell under the reducing process of that act. The duty is now eight cents, and next December will fall to seven and a very small fraction.

Such is the history of legislation here upon salt. It proves conclusively that the manufacture is of long standing, and has had the countenance of the Government as deserving protection.

He would now prove its magnitude, as far as he could, by such evidence as he could find on the files here, for he had had no opportunity to hear from those interested, who were at work peaceably at home, and unconscious of the efforts suddenly made here to overthrow them.

The consumption of the country in 1831 was ascertained to be about 10,000,000 bushels, five and a half of which were imported, and the residue, four and a half, produced. The consumption now must be nearly, if not quite, 12,000,000; but the imports for the year ending September, 1835, rise a little above 5,000,000, and, consequently, the domestic production is equal to about 7,000,000 bushels. The capital in 1831 was estimated at about 8,000,000; and, as the production has nearly doubled, the capital now employed doubtless equals 10 or 12,000,000. The chairman of the committee estimates the duty at eighty per cent. In this I think he is mistaken, as it is manifestly less; but this is not material, as it is admitted on all hands to be more than twenty per cent, and is therefore strictly embraced as a protected article by the terms of the compromise act; and the question is, shall it be abandoned? Is it the purpose of those who go for this measure, to disregard that act? If so, then we understand your policy, and, for one, I am happy to see it disclosed.

But is the country prepared for this step? The idea has gone extensively abroad that the compromise act was to be regarded as disposing of these matters for some years to come. The President, in his message, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, have both so viewed the matter, and so proclaimed to the nation. The public is therefore at this moment reposing in tranquillity, not anticipating this action, and not prepared to meet it. Is it just, under these circumstances, to affect deeply an interest which has been maturing for more than half a century, and now affords you the best article of the kind in the country? Shall the people engaged in the business be condemned unheard? Will you not let them have an opportunity to prove that they are entitled to your forbearance? I said he ask it in their behalf, and, in fairness, it ought to be extended to them. But, reasonable as this request is, I foresee that it will be overruled, and this measure will go through this body. It requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell that an important consequence will follow it. The repeal of the law giving a bounty to those engaged in the cod fishery will follow. This is an old policy, almost coeval with the Government, but it stands on two foundations—on two legs—and, if you cut away one, the superstructure will fall. It rests on the desire of this Government to create a nursery of seamen, by encouraging them to pursue the fishery, and the bounty is further justified, on the ground that the duty on salt ought to be reimbursed.

The manufacture of salt and the cod fishery are carried on by the same population, and at the same ports and places; not that the same individuals are engaged in both branches, but having a soil naturally unproductive, they draw their living from the resources of the sea. It is, as I am informed, the business upon which many mariners who have spent the most vigorous period of their lives in hard and perilous service, retire, and employ their capital, to enable them to live comfortably.

Now, sir, I seen enough of things here to satisfy my mind that, if the duty on salt is taken away, the bounty will follow; for those who have sympathy with the fishermen will claim this as a matter of right.

Such, sir, is the selfishness of our natures that, when we are interested to forget the gallant deeds, the heroic achievements, the privations and sufferings of those who have saved the country from dishonor, and won for it an imperishable name, are obliterated from the mind. Why do you wish for seamen? Why desire to increase their number? Because, in the hour of national peril, they stand on the frontier, and interpose their shield between us and the conflict. They are a living wall along the Atlantic, behind which we take shelter. On them it has been our policy to rely; to them we confide our honor, and at no time have they abused the great trust.

Must we break down this policy? Has the period arrived when the people are so imbued with the spirit of avarice, that we wradge this little pittance to the gallant tars of our country? You have taken from them all the little navigating privileges which they had. You have narrowed, by the last treaty, their fishing ground, and this, and this alone, remains to them. If it must be sacrificed also, be it so. Go on with your policy; take away this 250,000 dollars, or whatever the sum is; take it from the sailors, and give it to your ostentatious fleet fitting out to explore unknown regions; take the bread from them, and bestow it upon those who are sent out in pursuit of glory! And, while you do this, to make your injustice the more manifest, carry your land bill through the other House, and bestow upon favored individuals your public lands, worth three or four hundred millions of dollars. Do it, and, unjust and ungenerous as it is, the lofty spirited sailor will scorn to entreat any favor at your hands. He will leave this to those who have smoother tongues and more pliant knees.

But, whatever you do, do not invoke the interests of the poor to aid your course, or to justify your measures. The poor desire no such measures, for they have no such contemptible spirit. Their sympathies are all with the sailor; they glory in his generous spirit, his noble achievements, his patriotic devotion, his disinterested benevolence, his lofty American character; for the sailor is poor, and labors for the bread he eats. The poor demand no sacrifice of his rights in their name or for their benefit. The poor only ask of you that you would pursue towards them an American policy—a policy which will give them good wages for their labor—and they will take care of themselves. They entreat of you not to degrade them into the deplorable condition of the miserable population of foreign countries, by reducing their wages to the same standard. Can any truth be more apparent than that, where wages are lowest, there is the most poverty and there the most suffering? The whole history of man proves this. What makes the condition of the laborer so eminently prosperous here? How is it that he enjoys not only great physical, but moral comforts and blessings, to an extent surpassing that of the laborer in any other country whatever? It is because he is better paid. Now, sir, if you would degrade this population; if you would assimilate it to that of Ireland, then reduce its wages to the same standard, and you will accomplish your object. Break down the business in which it is employed, by subjecting it to direct competition with foreign pauperism; lessen the demand for labor, by introducing foreign productions instead of our own, and the causes will produce like effects. You will then have as poor and wretched a population as that against which it will, in such circumstances, contend for bread. But I will not here pursue the subject. The laborers, I trust, know their interests, and will take care of them. They shall, at all times, have my most hearty co-operation.

But what is this boon which the Senator from Missouri proposes to give to the poor at the expense of the sailor? The whole revenue derived from salt is rather less than half a million of dollars. Now, divide this among the whole population of the country, rich and poor, equally, and what is it, if every soul should pay an equal sum? Less than three cents a head. And does he seriously believe the poor to be so selfish as to desire this, when such a result is to follow? If he thinks the poor are mean-spirited or avaricious, he mistakes their character; they are not to be tempted to be instrumental in perpetrating a wrong, under such a delusion as this. He mistakes their character and sentiments, and does them great injustice. They ask no such favors, and are the advocates of no such measures. Nothing can be farther removed from my views of a wise policy than to tax the poor. I desire no such thing, and they shall have every effort of mine to relieve them from all burdens, as far as it lies in my power. But I would not take from them an ounce, to lay upon them the greater weight of a pound. I would not relieve them from an annual tax of three or four cents, and thereby introduce a policy that would soon call for the sacrifice of half their earnings. I can have no desire but that of their prosperity; no interst that is not theirs also. If they suffer, I must suffer with them; if they prosper, I may hope to participate in it; for a common prosperity is felt by all the community.

If this sacrifice must be made, forbear, I entreat you, to wrong the poor so much as to do it in their name. Strike at the protection of the salt works; take away the bounty on the fisheries, if your policy requires it; leave no proofs behind you that you respect the character or the occupation of the sailor, and still he has a manly spirit that will triumph over it all; he will live without it; and, I doubt not, the patriotic ardor of his honest heart will remain unquenched.

But this is not the only thing this bill aims at, as I stated yesterday, when I moved to strike from it olive oil.

We have another great fishery which employs a vast capital, and about 12,000 seamen. There are now, as I am informed by one engaged in the business, 505 ships afloat in the whaling business, estimated to be worth about $15,000,000, and their returns estimated at the probable value of from twenty-two to twenty-five millions. This, like the cod fishery, is carried on as a partnership, each sailor being interested in the voyage. The fishermen have thought the duty on olive oil to be useful to them, as it comes in competition with theirs. They have thought it reasonable that it should be kept on, as our oil is subjected to very heavy duties in Europe. Of the extent of this advantage I am not able to judge, as I have had no opportunity since this bill came before the Senate to learn the views of those interested. It is, however, enough for me to know, they have heretofore thought it important. It is all they ask, and the whole revenue derived from it is $23,000. It may affect them injuriously, and therefore it seems to me unwise to take it off. Is it not most judicious first to learn the facts? The men engaged in this business are high-minded and honorable, and, if they cannot make out the propriety of the course, they will not ask you to adhere to it. But I must be permitted to ask why these two navigating interests are selected from all the branches of industry for this experiment? Are they the least worthy of regard—the least important—the least meritorious? Your legislation has long been tending towards subjecting the navigation of the country to the severest possible competition. One privilege after another has been removed until we have now reached the last, and there seems to be an impatience to tear them away. With what justice can you call on the navigator to pay duties on duck, on iron, and many other articles which he consumes largely, and take from him these little compensations? If they must be removed, be it so. Let the decree go forth, but I hope some reason will be assigned for it.

I know it is said, and said truly, that we have too much revenue. And while I admit it ought to be reduced, and am as anxious as any gentleman on this floor to accomplish it by this bill, still I cannot resist the conviction that there ought to be something like reciprocal justice in the policy; and, if certain interests are selected, while others are left, there ought to be some reason for it. The system of protection embraces the whole industry. It is an entire thing for the benefit of all; and when you lose sight of that view, it becomes partial and unjust. It contains in itself a compensating principle that is designed to do justice to all; and if you take that away, you cannot fail to create discord, and to weaken the interests which are not attached. There is no more sure way of reducing wages than to assault each branch of industry in detail, and by that policy bring those who ought to be united to war one upon another. Those who produce iron claim protection; but with what propriety can they ask for the countenance of the navigators who consume it largely, if they take away what goes to protect and foster the navigating interest? The laborers, and by laborers I mean all who work, must stand together and protect one another, or they will be made the victims of a policy that will bring them to a level with those who struggle for existence in Europe. They must not be deluded by little promised advantages to adopt a course that will be ruinous.

I have been looking forward to the time when this great matter would be disentangled from politics and politicians; when the fervor of excitement would subside, and the public mind become tranquil; when the two great contending parties would see what is undeniably true, and one alone, can never meet with public approbation; when this great subject would be approached in a spirit of mutual concession and forbearance, and the southern and northern industries be all placed upon a footing that would secure to it a stable and enduring prosperity. I thought I saw the dawning of such an era, a gradual conviction gaining upon the public mind that the prosperity of the North and the South might exist in harmony. When a proper time comes, as I trust it may be permitted to, I hope this adjustment will take place, and public harmony follow upon it, giving to the Union new strength and vigor. With feelings and sentiments of this kind, it seems to me the North has nothine to disturb or to complain of the compromise act, but have acquiesced thus far in its provisions. They are, in no respect, responsible for this movement.

The proposition now is to make salt free. This is not a modification, but a total abandonment of the interest. We have in Massachusetts a capital of about two millions of dollars invested in a great number of works, exposed as much as capital can be in any part of the country to all the fluctuations of price arising from heavy importations. You are about to remove all protection, and leave it to its fate. This is what Great Britain dare not do with her strongest interests. She does not venture upon such a measure with articles which she exports to a vast amount, for the plain reason that a state of things may exist in other countries, from an excess of production, or from pecuniary distress or embarrassment, which may induce them to export at a loss. If such goods or merchandise can come in free in large quantities even for a short period, prices are greatly reduced, and ruin follows without any permanent benefit, for prices go back after the mischief is done, and the causes which created it have subsided. It can never, therefore, be wise, when you mean to give stability to business, to suffer it to be thus exposed to all the fluctuations of foreign distress and embarrassment. Let your own citizens have the benefit of some protection, even if it be small, to enable them to withstand such contingent shocks which constantly occur in commerce. From sixty per cent. to nothing is a long, and, I fear, a hazardous stride as well as bad policy. All goods can never be free unless the mode of raising revenue is changed. Why should the policy be reversed as to salt? Has it been unwise? Look at the prices since the reduction of duty, and see whether any such great advantages are predicted will follow. If the works here are destroyed, I will hazard the opinion that the average price of salt will be fully equal to what it has been.

I am aware, however, that the works on the seacoast are in a very different condition from the great works of the interior. The latter have all the benefit of a long and extensive transportation, which is equivalent to a strong protection against the foreign article. The manufacturers, therefore, of the interior, have comparatively little cause to complain or to be alarmed, and probably this is the reason why our interest is so little regarded.

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) expressed himself highly gratified at what he described as the unexpected magnanimity of New York, and the patriotic sacrifice made by her of her great interest in this manufacture, for the public good. It seems that his venerable friend (Mr. Macon, of North Carolina) had on some former occasion despaired of ever throwing off this duty because of the great interest of the Empire State. When this bill was brought in, the Senator from Missouri took an early occasion to congratulate his friend upon such signal disinterestedness. Now, if the Senator and his venerable friend had looked into this matter and better informed themselves, they would have spared me the trouble of proving that this matter affords little occasion for compliment or the high commendation bestowed upon it. The works of New York are far interior upon and near her great canal. She holds in her own hand the key that unlocks the gates of this highway, and exacts a toll upon all foreign salt, which so entirely prohibits it from entering the country that it is utterly excluded, and New York secures to her works not only a complete monopoly of the market of her great interior West, but of the vast country on the lakes, extending thousands of miles. If this information, which I derive from sources that may be relied on, is incorrect, the Senator from that State can inform the Senate. This monopoly is so exclusive that the State levies an excise of six cents a bushel on the manufactured article at her own works, and puts the money into her treasury. This bill does not, therefore, touch the works of New York, or affect the interest of her citizens in the slightest degree. She can, therefore, very well afford to make such sacrifices, in which she gets commendation for her magnanimity, while we are the victims. The Senate and the country will now understand how to appreciate this magnanimity.

The Senator from Missouri has offered another reason in support of this measure, which I will also notice for its singular character. He says the business is in the hands of regraters, a term, though not unknown, yet nearly so in commerce. Regraters are traders, persons who buy and sell; and the Senator thinks this would be broken up if the duty should be repealed. I know not what his expectations are, nor what his ideas in regard to trade are, but he must have come near to the conclusion that it is criminal to buy and sell. What does the Senator desire? What does he aim at? Are people to be deprived of the liberty of traffic? Must they seek permission to do ordinary business? If a man is engaged in the common pursuits of life, is he to be denounced and condemned, if he is not one of the first and highest principles of public liberty that all persons may engage in lawful pursuits? Where is this intermeddling with private concerns to end? Is this Government to pry into individual concerns, to ascertain how much and in what way men do business? To give this man permission to go on, that to enlarge, and order another to diminish? No people of spirit could for a moment bear this arbitrary interference.

But suppose it is true that there are regraters, speculators who buy and sell, and the public are craftily played upon by their artificial contrivances, how will removing the duty remedy this evil? Will the power of regrating be taken away or impaired? What is to hinder their operating upon salt free of duty as effectually as upon that subject to duty? Let the Senator assign a reason if he can. The proposition shows at once that none can be assigned. This remedy for such an evil may therefore be set down as extraordinary.

Again, that Senator has taken much pains to speak of the low price of salt in foreign countries, showing that it may be purchased in some places at three cents a bushel. But while he stated this, he omitted to state another fact, that we import no salt, or substantially none, that costs so small a sum. The tables of imports which lie before me settle this matter. The importation of 1835 may be taken as a sample of all other periods. The amount was 5,375,000 bushels; of this 3,800,000 came from England and her dependencies; of the remaining million and a half, about one million from Portugal. By far the larger portion of salt comes direct from Liverpool, and is estimated to cost there, in the document before me from the Treasury, fifteen cents. It is as every body knows, an inferior article to the salt of Cape Cod, which is made by solar evaporation. The reason of this is manifest. Our great exporting trade goes to England, and the homeward freights are comparatively cheap, and the price of salt will always depend much upon the activity of that trade, and the consequent occasional vessels have for ballast or homeward cargoes. The statement of the Senator, therefore, if taken without explanation or qualification, would mislead the public mind.

Sir, twelve cents of the duty has been removed; and although the three last years have been very great exporting years, and consequently very favorable to a strong reduction of price, yet no reduction has been experienced approaching to the predictions made when the law of 1830 was passed. This has probably served to perplex the Senator. If this bill should affect, as it probably will, the manufacture here injuriously, the trade will only be more fluctuating than it has been, while little or nothing will be gained in the average price.

I have, sir, felt it to be my duty to say thus much in vindication of the interests of a portion of my constituents, and of the principles which guide me in voting here; and I repeat that I am anxiously desirous to throw no unnecessary obstacle in the way of this bill. I approve of nearly the whole of it, and hope it will take a form that I can vote for it. I cannot, however, be reconciled to an act which selects our interests, and especially our navigation, for experiments. Let us have equal and exact justice, and we are content for we ask for no local or special privileges. If I do not mistake the facts, I think I have proved all I proposed to establish; and with this vindication of our rights, I leave the matter to the judgment of the Senate.

[After Mr. Benton rose, and went into an argument at some length in reply, to prove that the bounty on the cod fishery rested wholly on the duty upon salt, and that there would be no ground for continuing it after the duty was repealed.]

Mr. DAVIS observed that he was gratified with the frankness of the Senator, for some discredited him when he said the repeal of the bounty law would follow this act. He thought he did not misunderstand the hints which were thrown out, and he now had the best evidence that he did not. He would, however, on a proper occasion, show that the bounty was for other purposes besides reimbursing the duty on salt. He could establish this; but he feared it would avail the fishermen nothing.

On a subsequent day—

Mr. DAVIS, in reply to Mr. RIVES, said he was anxious to obtain the floor last evening, to set the honorable gentleman from Virginia and some others right in regard to his and their course here. He had listened to the reminiscences of the gentlemen from South Carolina and New York (Messrs. Calhoun and Wright) with some satisfaction, as to the history of the tariff of 1828, which had been denominated a bill of abominations. He, too, had a lively remembrance of what occurred. It is now said by those who ought to know about the matter, for they were parties in the transaction, that there was a political bargain made between the South and the Jackson party of the Middle and West, to frame a bill in such a manner as to force the New Englanders to vote against it, and then to throw on them the odium of defeating a measure of protection. The bill of 1828 was the fruit of this extraordinary compact. He was rejoiced to have this fact published from this place, that the country may be well assured of what it has hitherto hesitated to believe.

In 1827 the manufacturers of woollens found that they had lost a large portion of the advantage given to them, and designed to be secured by the act of 1824, by an act of the British Parliament reducing the duty on wool; and the business declining under this unexpected state of things, they came here and requested Congress to place them on as good a footing as it was their purpose to, by the act of '24. This was all that was prayed for, and this was the only interest which asked for relief. Nothing was murmured in 1827, and, therefore, they came with the same request, in 1828. This year began a new Congress, in which was a Jackson majority. It was composed of all interests, tariff, and anti-tariff, and the question was, how should such a majority co-operate harmoniously? It was the public duty of some to advocate, and others to oppose an increase of duty on woollens. The Senator from Carolina, who concurred with that majority, now publishes as history what then was conjectured. We looked on with surprise and astonishment. The Senator from New York was one of the Committee on Manufactures, and assisted to report that memorable bill. It came in loaded with duties on hemp, iron, steel, duck, ardent spirits, lead, molasses, grain, and many other articles; while woollens, though they had a nominal increase of duty, were left relatively in a worse condition than before they were touched, by imposing a heavy duty on wool. We were the more surprised, because nobody asked for increased duties on iron, steel, hemp, duck, ardent spirits, or any of the other articles, for they had most ample and liberal protection before, and the manufacturers appeared to be prosperous and happy; and while this was apparent, the suffering interest was neglected. The manufacturers of woollens asked for bread, and the committee offered them a stone.

But our eyes began to open, and to be filled with light, when we saw the anti-tariff members of the South resist at every step all propositions to reduce these high and unnecessary duties; when we saw the singular anomaly of such persons recording their votes in favor of these extravagant rates; and when we saw the authors of this bill, and the persons who demanded its provisions, because they avowed themselves the warm friends of protection, resisting every proposition to place the woollens upon any better foundation. We must have been worse than blind if we had failed to see that the design of all this was to compel us of the East, by the singular and obviously unjust and injurious provisions of the bill, to vote against it, and thus expose ourselves to be denounced by the press as the enemies of protection. We did see and understand that we were selected for political victims. The intrigue was too apparent not to be comprehended, and I am heartily rejoiced that the Senator from South Carolina from this day forth makes it a part of the history of the country. The bill was to be defeated, he says, and by our votes. It was made for that purpose. The navigation interest, in its iron, cordage, and duck, was loaded with duties to attain that object. The woollens, for the same reason, were neglected. The South, to administer this unpalatable drug, voted to keep it as it was reported, believing we should be compelled, by the injustice to our interests, to vote against it, and then should be overwhelmed by the indignation of those sections of the country.

Believing such to be the character and objects of the measure, our friends began to inquire whether it was not wiser to defeat the supposed intrigue by voting for this bill, and thus carrying it for the power to do this in their hands. The Middle and West must vote for it, and the South against it. Our votes added to either side made a majority. For one, I did not see as the Senator from Carolina says it was designed I should vote against the bill, because upon every measure reflecting I considered its provisions highly objectionable, because of the extravagancies which marked its character, and I could not reconcile it with my views of public duty to support it. But enough of my friends differed from me to carry it, and I well remember the disappointment of the South at this unexpected result. I well remember that it was then openly said by some members, that they had been deceived and misled, for the bill was to be defeated if kept in the form in which it was reported. The conjectures, as well as the declarations at that time, corresponded exactly with the disclosures of the Senator.

Sir, I have adverted to this extraordinary piece of history for two reasons: first, to show that, while I have been the steady friend of American industry, I am for no exclusive policy, no unjust or extravagant measures. It has, in truth, been urged against me that, in the votes which I have given here, I have been found in bad company, because I stood on the record with the anti-tariff interest. The same accusation has been made against me that the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Brown,) now makes against the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) because he votes with us, and I suppose with about the same measure of justice.

Second. To prove to you that when political expediency calls for a victim we are uniformly sacrificed. It was so in 1823, in 1832, and is now: we are not regarded as belonging to the great American family, unless our interests spread beyond our territory; what is local, or nearly so, may be traded away as emergencies require.

The injustice of the bill of 1832 was not so glaringly manifested as that of 1823, but it was so strongly marked that I could not support it.

I hope this piece of history will be borne in mind, and be an admonition that contracts marked by injustice, and recommended only as political expedients, may fall of their purpose, and bring down the injury designed for others upon the authors of the injustice.

I will here dismiss this subject, and call the attention of the Senate to another matter, which it was my chief object to notice.

Much has been said in this debate of the compromise act, and its obligations. My course or remarks here can never be very important, and therefore may well be forgotten; and I certainly would not allude to them, if I had not been personally appealed to in more than one instance, and reminded that this side of the House had given no pledges that it would adhere to that act. This had been put forth almost in the language of taunt, as if we were not frank and manly.

Whoever has or will give himself the trouble to inquire, will find that my sentiments are not concealed. My vote upon that act is recorded, and my sentiments then delivered are in print among the debates of the day. I was among those who differed from the distinguished Senator from Kentucky; and while I have made no profession of a change of opinion, I have so far acquiesced in the provisions of the law, as to yield to its provisions as the sense of the country. I am not aware of having given countenance, by acts or opinions, to any disposition to disturb it, nor have those who usually co-operated with me. We are not, therefore, chargeable with bad faith in any point of view. We yield our obedience to the work of others, leaving the measure to work out all the good it may. It has thus far produced tranquillity, and raised hopes of a steady course of legislation, which in itself is one of the great elements of prosperity.

We make no complaints—no movement for change—and give countenance to none. Why, then, are we called upon for pledges? Are not our acts satisfactory? Have we made any declarations in conflict with them? If so, let them be pointed out. But who is it that demands pledges? The Senator from Georgia (Mr. Cuthbert) has repeatedly observed that he bears no pledges from this side of the House. The Senator from Virginia turns to me and to the chair of my colleague, (Mr. W. who was not in,) and says he bears none. The Senator from Georgia is one of the committee who reported this bill, acknowledges the propriety, and gives it a warm and zealous support here. The Senator from Virginia told us, in his place, that it had his approbation and support. The chairman (Mr. Wright) and another member (Mr. Benton) have distinctly avowed that they wholly disregard the compromise. They tell us also, what we should know without their declarations, that this bill does violate the compromise in the most explicit and unequivocal terms. Nothing can be plainer than the truth of this declaration, as I fully proved the other day.

How stands the matter then? We observe the law—make no propositions to alter it—express no dissatisfaction—while those who ask for pledges have come to the deliberate determination to disregard and violate its provisions, and bring forward a bill for that avowed purpose, giving it a zealous support. What do these gentlemen want of pledges? Are they anxious to have us pledge ourselves to support a law which they wish to prostrate? Are they so absurd as to ask for pledges to a course the opposite of their own sentiments? Do they desire to array opposition to a bill they approve? Do they demand pledges of us to observe the compromise act, while they declare here, in the face of the country, that nobody is bound by it? If such be the object of demanding pledges, the gentlemen are singularly absurd and inconsistent with themselves. If they turn their reflections upon their own conduct and opinions, they cannot be insensible as to the position in which they place themselves. They voted for the bill, I against it; when I propose to violate it, let gentlemen make their arraignment. That will be seasonably enough. But, sir, I have another answer to this demand for pledges. I have no power or authority to pledge Massachusetts to any course of policy which is prospective. She does not send me here to make bargains to dispose of her great interests for a term of years. She holds herself at liberty to approve or disapprove of my acts as she may deem them wise or unwise; and if I were to make pledges, she would hold herself in no respect bound by them. In addition to this, I knew her Legislature had this subject under consideration, and that the sentiments of that numerous body just elected from the people would probably be expunged. Under such circumstances, it would be singular assumption in me to attempt to speak for the State; and even if I had seen a propriety in sending in pledges under other circumstances, I should have felt myself restrained while the subject was agitated in the Legislature.

Since the adjournment of last evening, I have received an official copy of the doings of that body in the form of a protest, which, at a proper time, I shall present to the Senate, and Massachusetts shall speak for herself.

My colleague can speak for himself in this matter. I have deemed it my duty to repel this demand of pledges, and to inform the Senate and the country of the circumstances which belong to it, and I entertain no doubt that we shall hear no more of the matter, for I have nothing to disguise, or conceal, or retract. There is no want of the most explicit frankness. If it be the pleasure of gentlemen to violate that act, let them not seek an apology in my opinions. They have taken their own course independent of me. I am not answerable for this act, or the principles it involves. Its paternity is certain, and those who ask for pledges have made their minds up to carry it forward without regard to us. Their course is in no respect influenced by my conduct, and if I were now to give pledges of adhering to the compromise act, not one of them would change his course, or make his opinions dependent on mine. Let them not seek to find an apology for their course in my not giving in pledges. If they are willing to be governed by my opinion, let them say so; but no one places the matter on that ground; no one says he will stand by the pledges, but, on the contrary, all avow the purpose of sustaining the bill.

SPECIE CIRCULAR.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY, OF KENTUCKY.

In Senate, Wednesday, January 11, 1837—On the Specie Circular.

The Senate having again proceeded to the order of the day, which was the consideration of the resolution heretofore moved by Mr. Ewing of Ohio, concerning the Treasury Circular, with the substitute therefor proposed by Mr. Rives—

Mr. CLAY said that he took great pleasure in tendering to the Senate his respectful thanks for the indulgence which had yesterday been accorded to him at the instance of the Senator from North Carolina. And he should esteem himself most happy if on the present occasion he should be so successful as to say what should occasion no regret to any for having conferred upon him that indulgence.

In the State (said Mr. C.) of which I am a citizen, I had lately occasion to express my opinion in regard to that Treasury order which it is proposed in the resolution offered by my friend from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing) to rescind. What I said on that occasion appeared in the prints of the day; and a degree of unexpected notoriety has since been given to it during the present session.

What I uttered I sincerely believed. I believed it then, I believe it now; and I testify it with all sincerity here in my place, as my settled opinion. Before, however, I proceed to state the grounds on which it rests, I shall take some notice of the able speech with which we were yesterday favored by the honorable Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives). Though that speech was any thing but a justification of the legality of the Treasury order, it was ingenious, plausible, often eloquent. The speech throughout its whole tenor was indeed directly adverse to the order. The Treasury order proceeds on the principle of requiring specie only in payment for one of the most important branches of the public revenue; but the Senator from Virginia is in favor of receiving in payment a mixed currency. The order proceeds on the principle of exhibiting partiality toward certain particular classes in their payment of the public dues; the Senator from Virginia is for a rule which shall operate alike and equally on all, and shall extend to every branch of the public revenue. In a great deal, indeed, in most of what was so well said by that Senator, I entirely concur. There are, however, some points of difference which I shall presently notice. I regret that, while the country generally, while the Senator himself, and while we all are so deeply interested in knowing what is to be the real policy of the administration on the question of the currency, we are left as much in the dark as ever. On one side of the Senate by one friend of the administration it is said that the precious metals alone are to form the currency, and that all paper is to be driven out of use; gradually, indeed, but surely. The Senator from Virginia on this side says that the policy about to prevail seeks to establish a mixed currency, consisting in part of specie, and in part of the notes of specie-paying banks. Which of these friends of the administration are we to credit? I must confess, that so far as past experience is to be looked to on such a subject, it seems to favor a metallic system more than a mixed currency.

At the last session of Congress, a proposition was introduced into the Senate, requiring the payment of specie in all cases by the purchasers of our public lands. That proposition was, however, put down by an almost unanimous vote; for, although no call was made for yeas and nays, I think I am fully authorized in saying, that had such a call been made, there would not have been more than one or two votes in favor of the measure. Yet, on the 11th of July, almost immediately on the rising of Congress, we find this very proposition embodied in a Treasury order, which requires the payment of specie in regard to our most important branch of the public revenue. This fact would seem to indicate that the policy of a mixed currency, for which the Senator from Virginia has contended, was not then the policy of the administration, and that not his, but another's influence, was predominant in the Cabinet. In the preamble to this order, in which the reasons for it are set forth, we find not only that specie is required from all purchasers of the public land, but that that other element of the currency which the Senator would retain, is denounced as "paper money." And even in regard to the messages of the President himself, did time permit, and were it necessary to do so, it would be easy to show from all of them, so far as they relate to this subject of currency, that although President Jackson commenced his administration by recommending a mixed currency, yet that he gradually departed more and more from that ground, until in the message of 1833, referred to by the Senator from Virginia, he speaks of getting back to the "constitutional medium;" evidently alluding to an exclusive specie circulation. You will therefore agree that the uncertainty of which I have spoken is not feigned, but real; and I entreat the two divisions of the friends of the administration speedily to settle between themselves the controverted question what the policy to be pursued actually is, and forthwith to state it to the country, so that all our business men may have an eye to it, and regulate themselves accordingly in their moneyed transactions.

The Senator from Virginia tells us that he is in favor of an enlargement of the metallic foundation of the currency. And who is not? Is the idea a new one with the Senator from Virginia? Did it not originate, or was it not at least first pressed by my friends who were endeavoring to guard the currency of the country from the dangers which beset it? Was not the principle of restricting issues of bank notes below prescribed denominations, first introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, who sits near me, (Mr. Webster,) as one provision in the renewed charter of the Bank of the United States in 1832? And while I am very sure that the Senator from Virginia did not take from the speech of my friend on that occasion the anecdote which he introduced into his own of the message sent by Mr. Burke to Mr. Pitt, warning him that if he permitted the issue of one pound notes, he would never again see a guinea in England, yet it does so happen that that very anecdote was related by the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech before the Senate in 1832, and was used by him expressly in support of the idea of increasing and strengthening the metallic basis of our paper currency.

But whilst both gentlemen concur in the propriety of imposing some limitation on our paper circulation, yet there is a wide difference between them as to the mode in which that desirable object is to be effected. The Senator from Virginia would rely on the voluntary action of a thousand banks, and of twenty-six State sovereignties operating on those banks. We of the opposition, on the contrary, thought it wisest to rely on a remedy within our own power, to trust to our own laws, and to look to that which we could effect by our own energies, and the exertion of our own constitutional authority. We considered this a practical and efficacious means. The Senator from Virginia relies on what I consider wholly inefficient. His reliance, it seems, is on the enlightened patriotism of the States and of the banks; the enlightened patriotism of nine hundred or a thousand banks, created for the sole purpose of making money! But, sir, have we no lessons from experience in our own past history, as to the degree of reliance which may safely be placed on the mere voluntary action of any community, however enlightened and patriotic it may be? What was the state of things during our own revolution, when we were contending in the most glorious cause that ever animated the hearts, or nerved the arms of men? The reliance was then on the voluntary payment of the quotas, not of twenty-six, but of thirteen States, indispensable to the success of that cause and to our soldiers, who, unfed and unclad, were enduring every suffering to which humanity can be possibly exposed. Let me ask the honorable Senator, in view of what then took place, whether reliance on the patriotism even of enlightened States, much less that of banking corporations, is safe and secure.

It is now four or five years since the policy was first announced on our side, and was afterwards taken up by a portion of the friends of the administration, to widen the metallic foundation of the currency by a prohibition of small bank notes; and what has been the result? How many States has enlightened patriotism induced to adopt the policy? The Senator from Virginia mentioned Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, to which he might have added Kentucky, and possibly one or two others as having imposed the desired restriction; but they did it either prior to, or without any sort of reference to the announcement of the policy from Washington. Of all the twenty-six States, he believed New York and Maine only had conformed their legislation to the recommendation sent forth from this city. And it is remarkable, with respect to Maine, as he had understood, that, after the restriction was imposed, a supply of the prohibited notes below five dollars was sent for to Massachusetts, for small change in the transaction of business.

No, sir; no man has a higher opinion of the patriotism of the country than I have. There is no one who entertains a higher opinion of the patriotism of the States, or is more disposed to place a due and proper degree of reliance upon it; but I consider it sound policy not exclusively to depend upon it, but to add to that security the salutary vigor of the law. Hence we supposed that it had been demonstrated by all experience in this country that a national bank, created by, and under the proper control of, this Government, was a fit and necessary instrument to guard the paper system of the country against its tendency to run into excessive issues, and ultimately into utter disorder; that such a bank would at least retard that deplorable state of things; and that, if it could not finally prevent it, when the notes of the local banks had lost all confidence, and ceased to be a secure circulation, the notes of the national bank would remain a safe medium in which the revenue of the country could be collected and disbursed.

From the moment that the Bank of the United States ceased to exist, you gave up the rudder of the national currency, and I greatly fear that it will get into such a state of confusion that we shall see it go on, from worse to worse, until all shall unite in totally withdrawing from it the public confidence.

But if it were even possible that you could succeed, by appeals to the States and to the banks, in bringing about the restoration of a sound currency, how long would it last? Supposing a general pressure to be produced by the withdrawal of specie from the country, would not the banks instantly be prompted by the States themselves to supply the wants of the community by furnishing the desired medium? Trace back your own history; look to that period which preceded the Revolution, when the colonies were compelled to resort to bills of credit, and even to tobacco, as a circulating medium. I believe that, in Virginia, the law to that effect remains still on the statute book, and that fee bills of some public officers are yet made out at the rate of so many pounds of tobacco for each item. If altered, the law has not been very long changed. The necessity of a circulating medium of some kind is indispensable. Society cannot exist without it. It cannot revert to the primitive state of barter. The representative of property must be had, even if it be in the form of peltries, tobacco, uncoined bars, paper money, or small bank notes. And this great social want is paramount to all law.

But the plan of the honorable Senator, to effect a restriction on bank issues, does not consist exclusively in a reliance on the patriotism of the banks or the States. He would appeal to the interest of the banks, and would hold over them the threat that, unless they cease the issue of small notes, the public deposits shall be withdrawn from their custody; in other words, it is by employing the revenue of the United States that he would effect the restriction he seeks. Now, sir, what is the amount of this revenue? Twenty five or thirty millions per annum. And what did he tell us from very high authority? He told us that the money transactions in one single city, the city of New York, were estimated several years ago, and that by a man than whom none is better acquainted with all such matters, at 1,500,000,000 annually; and at this day the amount is probably double that. Now, if, in one single city, the course of business requires the employment of 1,500,000,000 of dollars annually, what must be the aggregate amount of the transactions in all the other cities and parts of the Union? The amount baffles all human calculation; and do you suppose that, by wielding a revenue of only thirty millions, you can overawe, coerce, and control banks whose business amounts, perhaps, to a thousand times as much? What proportion does the number of your deposit banks bear to that of the whole of the banks of the Union? Before the passage of the deposit act they amounted, if I remember, to less than forty; they are now, perhaps, eighty; and we are told by a secret authority, which seems to be high and controlling, that their number, when the deposit act is executed, is again to be reduced down to forty; but say it is eighty, and then by your operation on those eighty banks you are to bring about an effect so important as to deprive the remaining nine hundred and twenty banks of that which, in many instances, constitutes the most important part of their circulation. Can we not see that the thing is perfectly chimerical?

Suppose you prevail with one bank to give up the issues of its small notes. What is the immediate effect? The vacuum produced by the withdrawal of the small notes of that bank is instantly filled by the small notes of other banks; and even if you could go a step further, and prohibit your deposit banks from receiving in deposit the notes of any bank which issues bills below five dollars, what would be the further effect? There would be an instant collision between the deposit banks and the other banks of the country; and as the other banks are so much more numerous, the necessary result would be the utter destruction of the deposit banks themselves. We have already seen some of the effects resulting from these requirements. We passed an act at the last session prohibiting the use of notes below $10 in the disbursements of the United States. Well, sir, we have a disbursing bank in this city; and how was the rule observed? All the Senators who hear me are personal witnesses to its violation in payment to themselves of their daily allowance. I do not mention this to complain of it. It is possible, if you had ordered the officers of the Senate to receive either specie or notes over $10, it would have been complied with. But the bank still goes on, and it would still continue its course, notwithstanding any voluntary restriction which your wisdom may suggest. Is it not too much to expect, that when you, to whom the task belongs, have abandoned the care of the currency of the country, the States or the banks shall take upon themselves the duty of remedying the defects or the neglect of your legislation? The parties will take care of themselves, and will look no further. They will leave to the whole to provide for the interests of the whole. What interest have the banks in Maine, for example, so to shape their course as to suit the exigencies of the community in Louisiana? We, on the contrary, contended for one currency, which should be general throughout the Union, consisting of the notes of the bank of the General Government, and for a local currency, consisting of the bills of local institutions; so that there might be a general currency, to be employed in purposes of a general nature, while the local currency would subserve all local purposes. Our wish was to have the general currency every where receivable in payment of the public dues, while we relied on the local banks for the medium of local circulation. But you have given up a bank whose credit was coextensive with the commercial world, which supplied a currency never surpassed, and regulated exchanges with an economy unsurpassed in this or any other country. And do you expect these local institutions can be an adequate substitute? Do you cherish the vain expectation that the States will come to your relief, and rectify your incompetency? No, sir, no. Each State will say, it is not our affair to provide a general currency for the United States, we must leave that to be managed by the General Government. And does not all experience demonstrate that while local Governments constitute the safest depository of local interests, the General Government alone can provide for the welfare of the whole?

What is the present actual condition of the banking capital of the country? We told you that the moment you destroyed a bank of the United States there would immediately spring up innumerable local banks; that banking capital would thus be greatly extended, and that the change might lead to the destruction of all confidence in the circulating paper medium. And are not these predictions in a rapid progress of fulfilment? We are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount of bank capital has increased, since the veto on the bank charter, from 200 millions to 300 millions—an increase of fifty per cent. and that the circulation has increased in the same ratio, viz: from 80 millions to 120 millions.

I concur with the Senator from Virginia in the position that no state of things is more calamitous than that which accompanies a decline in the circulating medium of a country; and the degree of distress is in proportion to the rapidity of such decrease; while, on the other hand, the prosperity of a country is never at least apparently greater than while the amount of its currency is on the increase. But does any man suppose that this can continue? Can any reflecting man persuade himself that twenty-six distinct and independent States, looking each one to its own interest, will exercise such forbearance as not to add bank to bank, and increase the paper circulation within its limits, till the country will be involved in the danger of some great calamity? I greatly fear it. When or how it shall come, no one can exactly foresee; but we can all imagine that, if there should occur a great failure, or a great reduction in the price of the Southern staple, or (what is now actually threatened) a general return of American stocks which have been sent to Europe on a foreign demand, from any cause, of a large amount of the specie in the United States, the necessary consequence would be such a run upon the banks as may cause a general suspension of specie payments, if not the bankruptcy of many of the banks. What is their present condition? They are without concert, co-operation, or mutual confidence. The moment there is a great and sudden demand to meet a corresponding demand abroad, there must ensue a general panic throughout the country. Each bank being necessarily unable to measure the exact extent of the demand, will, of course, call on its own debtors, and the same thing, for a similar reason, taking place in all the other banks, there will probably be a general stoppage of payments and universal bankruptcy. Was not all this foreseen? Was it not foretold? Were gentlemen not warned, again and again, not to destroy the only means on which we could with safety rely?

Between the system of the gentleman from Virginia and the hard money system, I am far from being sure that the latter is not a more efficacious remedy than any voluntary action of the States and of the banks. The hard money system proposes that, in all collections and disbursements of the revenues of the Government, specie alone shall be received, and all paper of every description entirely excluded. The object of both systems is to retain a certain amount of specie within the nation, by the creation of a necessity for its use, and thus to prevent its exportation: for if the Government shall decide to receive nothing but specie in payment of its dues, the consequence would be the necessity of retaining a sufficient amount of the hard metals for the collection and disbursement of the revenue. It might not, indeed, be necessary to retain the whole amount of 30 millions, assuming that to be the annual revenue, since one dollar in specie might be made to pay two dollars in revenue. But a certain amount, bearing a considerable proportion to the revenue, would be retained in the country. The process of getting at such a result is of necessity extremely difficult, and would create much practical inconvenience.

If specie should become very scarce, the collectors of the Government might from necessity be forced to receive a portion of the revenue in notes of good banks; but if you receive this revenue in specie only, you immediately and unavoidably elevate the relative value of specie above other parts of the currency, because, while hard money would perform all the offices of other media of circulation, it would then discharge one other office, which they could not. The result must be to create a demand for specie, and thereby to render it a marketable commodity. A man would not then, as now, be as ready to receive a debt in good notes as in specie. He will always want the specie, because it would command a premium. Does not the Senator perceive that gold and silver must then cease to be a circulating medium, and be converted into merchandise? It would be sold at an advance, and would be hoarded for that end. Yet I am far from being certain, if the object in view be to retain a certain amount of hard money in the country, that the remedy which suggests the exclusive use of specie has not a certainty of success which cannot be produced by relying on the patriotism or the voluntary action of a thousand banks and twenty-six independent State sovereignties. My word for it, in fifteen or twenty years after the system of the Senator from Virginia shall have gone into effect, although the same identical banks may not continue to issue notes of a small denomination, yet the aggregate amount of such notes in actual circulation will not be less than it was at the commencement of the experiment.

But we were told by the honorable Senator that Great Britain and several other countries of Europe, having become enlightened by the example of America, are disposed to imitate it. He told us further, that the people of Great Britain are becoming sensible of the impolicy of monopolies, and opposed to the continuance of the Bank of England, and that the present policy of that Government aims at the establishment of joint stock companies in addition to the large number of private bankers, and by this means ultimately to get rid of the Bank of England altogether. On that subject all I can say is that such is not the state of my information. I know, indeed, that they have lately passed a law for the creation, under certain restrictions, of joint stock companies; but what is the state of public opinion in regard to those local banking institutions, which so closely, as the Senator thinks, resemble our own? It is distrust, uncertainty, and fear. We are all aware that a committee of the House of Commons, at the head of which is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was required to examine into the condition of these local banks. I have before me a report of that committee, rendered as late as August last. The joint stock companies in that country are established by what they denominate deeds of settlement, which specify the conditions under which they are erected. After presenting an analysis of a variety of these deeds of settlement, the committee enumerate thirteen different defective provisions in the laws which may require the interposition of Parliament, and they conclude by urging the necessity of the greatest possible prudence and caution in the management of those banks.

While the language of the report shows very clearly that there is great apprehension felt as to the safety and solidity of these institutions, yet it is so constructed as prudently to avoid the excitement of unnecessary alarm. But supposing it to be true that, in a Government constituted as is Great Britain, it were possible to dispense with a national bank, and to rely on local joint-stock companies and on private banks: let me ask the honorable Senator if the condition of England and America is not totally different? You there see a power asserted for Parliament to legislate with plenary authority, both for the future and for existing institutions. Have we any such power? There is a consolidated government; ours is a confederacy. They have power by their legislation to guard against malpractices in all the banking institutions in the kingdom. But here there is no such authority. There, there is not an institution which does not perpetually act under the control of a general law, extending throughout the empire. But here we have one thousand banks, scattered over our immense territory and in twenty-six States, on which the General Government can exercise no effective control whatever. So that even were it true that the British Government could dispense with the Bank of England, it would be far from proving that we could imitate her, when we consider that the local banks in this country are subject to twenty-six separate and independent Governments, over which we have no power to act.

We were told, and the country was promised, that on the destruction of the Bank of the United States we should be furnished with a better currency than we then enjoyed; a currency unrivalled on the face of the globe, which was under better regulation, and by which exchanges were effected at a cheaper rate than in any part of the earth. The paper of that bank had its credit established throughout the world. It was received in Asia; it was received all over Europe, and throughout this entire continent. Our exchanges were managed with an economy which we must all remember with regret at the change which has since taken place; for what is the state of our exchanges now? When they take place between distant places, the premium at the one end of the course ought to be met by the discount at the other end. But is that so? When a merchant at New York sends a bill on New Orleans at a discount, is that discount counterbalanced by the premium on a similar bill at New Orleans? No. A discount is charged at both ends of the line. And it often happens that at neither can you dispose of your bill without great difficulty and sacrifice.

I too, sir, am aware that we are surrounded with difficulties. In that I concur entirely with the Senator from Virginia; but my friends are not responsible for this State of things. You all know the reason of it. You all feel it every day. You know that we are in the midst of a dark and dense wilderness. Who is to be the Moses, whether from this side or the other of the Senate, (looking at the positions of the Senators from Virginia and Missouri,) that shall lead us to the promised land, in among those unknown things which the future alone can disclose.

And now I turn to the questions really before the Senate. I beg pardon for the digression into which I have been led in noticing the able and interesting speech of the Senator from Virginia; the gratification of hearing which I shared in common with the rest of the Senate. If, in noticing the few points with respect to which I differ from that honorable Senator, I have departed from the rigid regularity of debate, I must plead his example as my apology. What are the questions which we have to consider? In 1816, the condition of the country in regard to the currency was this: Throughout all the country south of New England there was a general suspension of specie payments, and the bank notes in circulation were of different degrees of value, and nevertheless constituted the only medium in which the public dues were paid. The consequence was, that, instead of taxes having the uniform character required by the Constitution, different parts of the country and different individuals paid the same tax in widely varying values. This was a condition which the country could not long bear, and the Government would have been wanting to every duty it owed to the community had it tolerated such a state of things. For every body must agree that there is in reality no difference between exacting different rates of duty in different parts of the country, and requiring that the same rates shall be paid in media very different in value. Such was the state in which Congress found the country at the memorable session of 1816. The question was, what should be done? That voluntary action of the banks, which is the sole reliance of the Senator from Virginia, had been fully tried and found wanting. There had been convention after convention of the banks, to try if they could not agree voluntarily to resume specie payments, but it was found impracticable to do so. Congress felt called upon to interpose, and two great and leading measures were devised as presenting the only prospect of remedy. One was proposed, or, to speak more correctly, was espoused by the Senator from South Carolina opposite, (Mr. Calhoun,) (for it had originally been suggested by a late Secretary of the Treasury,) the other was brought forward by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster.) One of these measures was the creation of a Bank of the United States. As there existed no paper medium of circulation on which the country could rely, the establishment of such a bank was supposed to be the only alternative left to the Government. It met with strong opposition, but was carried successfully through. It was apprehended, however, that this measure would be insufficient, unless it should be aided by another; and hence the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, which has repeatedly been alluded to in this debate, was introduced with a design of stimulating the restoration of specie payments, and remedying a state of things which was unjust and scandalous in the eyes of all commercial communities. That bank has been destroyed; and let me here say that I have not the least expectation of any effort being made by my friends to re-establish it. They have no such purpose. An experiment is now to be tried as to the power of local banks in meeting the wants of the community. Let those who are rashly trying the experiment be responsible for the issue. The resolution of my friend from Massachusetts was introduced simultaneously with the bill to incorporate the United States Bank. It was expected that the bank would go into operation early in the next year. The Secretary of the Treasury, by the resolution, was directed to take measures as soon as might be to ensure the payment of all Government dues in four specified media, but the discretion entrusted to him was only to continue until the 25th of February following. After that day no payment of public dues of any kind was to be permitted, save in one or other of the four media which had been specified.

Can any man look at that resolution at this day, and seriously entertain any doubt as to its true interpretation? The Secretary of the Treasury was immediately called upon to expound it; and an uninterrupted usage of twenty years, under succeeding Secretaries, has uniformly given to it the interpretation which it then received. It never was for a moment believed that it vested him with authority to require only specie, or to exclude entirely any of the four specified funds in payment to Government: that exposition was not interrupted for a moment by the act of 1830. Shall not repeat the argument in regard to it. It accomplished, and was designed to accomplish, but one purpose, which was the abolition of the credit system in the purchase of the public lands, and the substitution thereof of payment in hard money. It did not interrupt for a moment the continuous interpretation of the resolution of 1816—an interpretation which extended into three successive administrations, and through seven years of a fourth. Is it not too late, after this long adherence to one interpretation, to say that Congress has misunderstood it; that all the Secretaries have misunderstood it; and that your usage for such a course of years is at this late day to be surrendered and without a true foundation. It has been said that the resolution was restrictive. It was so in so far as it rejected the notes of non-specie paying banks, but it was mandatory so far as it went to enumerate and specify the different media in which payment might be made. It was restrictive so far as bad notes were concerned, but it conferred a legal right on the payer to make, and a legal obligation on the receiver to accept, payment in one of the four several ways which the law provided. But if the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to select some and to reject others of these modes, then his rejection and selection must be applied universally. He has no right to discriminate between citizen and citizen. He has no right to say to the citizen of Boston, from you I will receive notes of the banks in Boston, but not of the Bank of the United States. Or to a citizen of New York, from you I will receive United States Bank bills but not bills of the banks in Boston. No. If he had a right to say that either of the four kinds should be received in preference to the rest, he is bound to make that rule and that preference to reach every where throughout the country. But what does he do? He not only discriminates between different branches of the revenue, making regulations to apply to one branch which do not apply to the others, but, in reference to that one branch, which is the subject of his order, he discriminates between different classes of individuals. I heard it contended by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Strange) that the exception in relation to actual settlers has now expired by its own limitation. True, sir; but if Congress rises and leaves this vast power in the hands of the Executive, how soon may the discrimination be revived? Unless this order shall be rescinded, will not the Executive drawn his conclusions from the silence of Congress, that it approves what he has done? And may he not suppose that he is authorized even to go further, and carry down his principle of discrimination from classes to individuals?

I speak now of the question of power. Suppose the Secretary had reversed his rule—suppose he had said that the citizens of the States in which the land lays should have a right to purchase only with specie; while those who came from a distance might make their payment in notes. If he has absolute power over the subject, he might as well have made the one discrimination as the other. And he may not only discriminate between different classes of individuals, but between different places. I have been, indeed, informed that at one of the land offices specie under the order was not required. Where is this dispensing power? Where did the Secretary get it? Not from the words of the order, for that applies equally to all.

Sir, I have heard it contended for, again and again, and votes have been given recording such as the opinion of the majority of this Chamber, that payment for the public lands is a tax on the community. I do not myself think so. But I put the question to those gentlemen who do, and I ask them how this order can be justified if all taxes are required to be uniform? I come to the conclusion that its legality cannot be established, either under the joint resolution of 1816 or the law of 1821. It wants legal authority. It has on its very face all the air of Executive legislation. It has a preamble setting forth the reasons which have led to its enactment. The Secretary who put it forth seems strongly to have felt the necessity of sheltering himself under the invulnerable name of his chief. But were there even authority for the order in the letter of the law, I should still argue against its gross injustice in practice.

And this brings me now to inquire, what has been the effect of this order in its actual operation on the community? The order professes to proceed on the principle that the public lands are sold for a valuable consideration, if payment be made in bank notes, and that specie alone can constitute a just equivalent for their value. And I admit, that if the Secretary had gone on to provide that the specie thus received should be the property of the Government, there would at least have been consistency in the course he adopted. But the moment the order appeared, there was an instant pressure for specie, especially in the West and the Southwest. The banks were called upon, and specie in all quarters was put in requisition, for the purpose of paying for the public lands. The pressure upon the banks in Kentucky was great. Gentlemen talk to us about the incalculable amount that has been received, which is stated at $1,800,000, exclusive of $300,000 more, which was placed on deposit at Washington, and the certificates of which were received as cash; say, in round numbers, two millions of dollars. It is very true that this amount was not great, but the argument drawn from it is not a fair one. We must recollect that when the operation commenced no one knew what was to be its extent. No individual bank could possibly tell, and each was left in total uncertainty as to what would be required of them. The banks could not foresee that no more than two millions of dollars would thus be drawn from them. If they had known this beforehand, they might have made their arrangements to meet it. But on all the banks of the West and of the Southwest, daily demands were made for specie. There was, at once, not only a cessation of discounts, and the purchase of bills of exchange, but the banks made heavy calls upon their debtors. This state of things operated with peculiar severity on the West. It happened just about the time when our people began to carry their live stock to market. The ordinary course of the trade is this: They draw bills upon themselves, or on their friends, at the markets to which they are destined, which are discounted by the bank, and with the proceeds of which they purchase their stock, and meet their engagements. No business with us is more beneficial to all parties. The purchaser of stock diffuses money through the community, and on reaching the market he makes his sales, and is thus enabled to pay the bills which he has drawn. All this was immediately interrupted, in consequence of this Treasury order; for how could the banks venture to discount, with such an order hanging over their heads? If they purchased bills, the operation was equivalent to a disbursement of so much specie; for if they paid in these notes, they immediately returned upon them for specie. The Senator from Virginia has told us about the effect of the course pursued by certain collectors in Ireland in refusing to receive in payment the notes of Irish banks. What was the consequence? The stoppage of the Bank of Dublin and its branches. Nor could that gentleman have pronounced a more severe condemnation of the order than by the example which he quoted from the kingdom of Ireland. The banks, as I have said, were run upon. Individuals who possessed specie were unwilling to part from it, and reserved it for investment in the public lands. And there was a general accumulation, for the purpose of paying it into the land offices. Well, sir, it was carried to the land offices; and when it got there whose was it? What became of it? Was it the property of the Government? No, sir. Did you get it? No, sir. It was carried to the deposit banks, and there it was credited as so much money to the Government. The whole transaction, therefore, amounted to this: you forced all the purchasers of the public land to become collectors of specie for the deposit banks. The money was not collected for the Government. You cannot call for it. It is the property of those banks, to be used as they please. You have refused to credit banks for the notes they issued; you have occasioned all this vast inconvenience; and, finally, instead of getting the specie which you have been at so much trouble to collect, you get nothing but bank credits.

The money was transported from the seaboard, from the western and southwestern banks, from the theatres of business, where it might have been constantly and advantageously used, and taken into the interior to banks of very limited business. And even there they were afraid to use it, lest it might be suddenly called for. The difference of the two operations, before and after the order, is this: Before the order, purchasers of the public lands paid for them in bank notes, convertible into specie; after the order, they paid for them in specie, converted into bank credit. It was just reversing the order of things. You began with paper, and obtained specie if you wished it; but under the order, you began with specie, and obtained only bank credits. The practical effect throughout all the western and southwestern States has been to make all the interests of society collectors of specie, for the benefit of the deposit banks, without the least benefit whatever to the Government; for these banks were not required to preserve the specific specie, and pay it over to the Government. Such was the demand for specie under this order, that I have heard of as much as forty per cent. being given for gold to carry to the land offices; and in some instances specie has been transported to the land offices, to be sold there as a marketable commodity. The order had a double effect. It withdrew specie both from circulation, and from the banks that could use it for the benefit of the community, that it may perform the unprofitable circuit of being taken to the land offices, and thence back to the banks, when it becomes their property.

Sir, what offence have the Western and Southwestern States committed, that they are to be subjected to an indignity which is not inflicted on the rest of the community? Why are we to pay our dues to the Government in specie, while the rest of our fellow citizens are allowed to pay in bank notes? Even if there were authority for it in the law, the requisition would not be according to justice or equity. And all sentiments of fraternal regard, as well as all principles of equality, cry aloud against such revolting distinctions. Why are our banks and our people alone to be subjected to this rule? I protest, most solemnly, on behalf of my constituents, against so disgraceful an inequality; and I call upon the Government either to carry out their hard money system every where, at the custom-houses as well as the land offices, or efface from its records a discrimination which cannot continue a day or an hour, without dishonor and degradation.

The honorable Senator from Virginia tells us that the measure is temporary. I wish he had made it out, or could do so now. How is it temporary? On its face? No, sir. It has just begun its wide-sweeping ruin. It began on the 15th of August, and it tolerated for a time the exercise of some indulgence. Its full operation only commenced on the 15th of December, 1836, and there is nothing in its terms that looks like a temporary provision. There is nothing in the President's message, or in the report of the Secretary, which announces to a suffering community that the heavy burden imposed upon them will not continue long. It may suit the purposes of the Senator from Virginia so to represent it. It may not be agreeable to him to be seen at open war with a measure of the administration; but there is nothing in the terms of the order, and nothing in the policy on which it rests, which is temporary in its character. No, sir. Let Congress adjourn, and leave on the western States this servitude, this unjust and degrading discrimination in the payment of common dues to a common Government, and my word for it, this order will not only be continued, but it will be carried farther, and other discriminations will be made under your alleged sanction to suit the varying views of the administration. Sir, give us equality. We are a common crew in the same noble, the same glorious ship of State. Is it not right that we should all be placed under the same common laws, and share alike the common justice of our country? I protest against the continuance for an hour of an iniquitous order, which subjects the western and southwestern portions of this Union to a rule so irreconcilable with any principles of justice or equity.

My friend from Ohio, who sits near me, (Mr. Ewing,) has offered this resolution, which abolishes this odious distinction, and places all parts of the community, and every branch of the revenue, upon a footing of perfect equality.

But is said WE ought not to do this; and if we do it will imply censure. And the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Strange,) at a loss to make out a censorious charge from the words of the resolution itself, resorts to the language of a Senator to supply the deficiency. Sir, if we repeal the statute of a legislature, does it imply censure on the legislature? May we not repeal a statute of our own, and yet fix no stigma on our former deed? May we not then rescind an order or edict of Executive authority, without any such implication? Has it come to this, that a mere difference of opinion is censure? Are we to be afraid to express our sentiments of a public measure, lest, peradventure, we wound the feelings of the Chief Magistrate, or the Secretary of the Treasury? Sir, I have been struggling, associated with my friends, for a long time, against the complete encroachment of Executive power; and we have sometimes been encouraged by a momentary hope of being able to arrest its lawless career. But sir, its march has been steadily onward, a giant out to say, triumphant. It is now practically the supreme power in the State. Every branch of the Government bows beneath its sway. The doctrine of unity in the Executive administration, recently introduced, the obedience which, in pursuance of it, is exacted from all executive officers, from the highest to the lowest; the practice of proscription of all who do not conform to the prevailing creed, with the kindred usage of profuse official and other rewards to all who do, often without regard to character, integrity, or merit; and the exercise of boundless power over the public treasure, and by means of a concealed, mysterious, and irresponsible agency over the banks in which it is deposited, have stamped a totally new character upon the Government. It has become a vast organized machinery, controlled by the will of one man, and moved by a single hand. It is a monarchy in disguise, with fewer privileges practically enjoyed than are exercised in some monarchies. There, acts of the Crown may be exposed, censured, denounced, corrected, by the power of parliament. But here we are not to complain of, or remonstrate against, executive acts. We must not presume to censure them. We must bear, in silent and dutiful submission, whatever fills the acts of the Executive may bring on the country. Or, if we attempt any corrective, we must graciously suppose that we are not going counter to the Executive will, and by a fiction convert a permanent measure into a temporary order.

When Mr. President, shall we get back to the good old times, when a President of the United States never stepped out of his own sphere to assume powers not granted to him, or to control the discharge of duties specially assigned to subordinate officers? As to this Treasury order, I do not view it as an act of the Secretary. It has his hand, but not his heart—not his mind. From the face of the order itself, I should draw the conclusion that he has been the unwilling executor of the bidding of another. Like its prototype employed for the removal of the deposits, it is an act of the Executive will, directly against the will of the officer particularly charged with a public duty. But, unlike that case, the Secretary clings closely to his office, and, rather than part with it, exercises the arbitrary command of his master. He does not choose, with a manly independence, to sacrifice his place and preserve his character. And I understand that this order has been issued, not only against the judgment and feelings of the Secretary, but of the whole Cabinet. I have heard so, and I believe it. There are those here who do know, and who, if I err, can contradict me. But I believe it. And now, when we undertake to examine the order, and confront it with the law, WE cannot touch it. WE may not repeal an Executive order, because, forthwith, to do so, casts a censure on the Executive. Why, sir, if the honorable Senator from Virginia is unwilling to throw censure on the Executive, he should have forbore the delivery of his able and eloquent speech. That whole speech, from beginning to end, was directed against that order, which he says we must not repeal, lest we censure the President. Why, sir, if that is his ground, he should have withheld his amendment; for what, after all, is the difference in effect between the resolution of the Senator from Ohio and the amendment of the Senator from Virginia? The Treasury order is now in full operation. And what is the proposal of my friend from Ohio? To rescind it in terms. His language is open, direct, manly, but not offensive. But the Senator from Virginia cannot agree to the proposal. Well, sir, and what does he do in his amendment? He avoids, to be sure, the word "rescind," but he rescinds the order just as effectually as the Senator from Ohio. I am quite sure that my friend from Ohio intended nothing offensive in the resolution offered by him. He thought that, without offence, the poor privilege might still be left to us of repealing our own acts, expressing our own opinions, and even of repealing Executive acts, when we deemed that the good of the country requires it. It appeared to him to be the most direct and manly course, if we meant to repeal the order, that we should say so. He added, it is true, another resolution; but I am willing, on behalf of my friend, that the first resolution should be abandoned altogether, and the last alone adopted. That will sufficiently accomplish our purpose and accommodate the measure to the delicate and nervous sensibility of any friend of the administration. That is all concerning which I feel any solicitude, and with this I will be content. All we seek is, that an end shall be put to this invidious and disgraceful discrimination.

But it is said that there will be great difficulty in adopting this course; and the Senator from Virginia has accordingly guarded his amendment by the addition of a proviso, which goes to make the amendment authorize the reception only of such notes as the deposit banks shall be willing, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, to receive, and to credit the United States as cash. Though I admit that the operation may be attended with great difficulty, yet I cannot think it insuperable. What was the ground on which the first Secretary of the Treasury received bank notes for the duties due to Government? The ground was this: that the bank notes of specie-paying banks are equivalent to specie, being in fact the representatives of specie. Bank notes of such banks are nothing more than so much gold or counted specie, and they are so received. This was the principle on which Mr. Hamilton proceeded. It was a convenient arrangement, and is attended with no risk so long as the bills are convertible at pleasure into that which they represent. The Secretary could stop wherever he pleased. It saved much time; it was one of the greatest of time-saving machines. It was like paying a sum of money by the check of an individual upon his bank. That is not "paper money." Your creditor or the Government collector calls upon you with a demand, and you draw your check for the amount; when presented at bank it is instantly paid, or passed to your credit. Such a check is equivalent to the specie it will command. Such representatives of specie ought to be received in payment of all Government dues; and there should be no discretionary power of refusing them, either by the collectors or the deposit banks. The result, then, to which I would come, is the adoption of this rule, viz: that when a bank note is presented to a collector in payment of a debt to the Government, if, at the place where such payment is made, it is at par, that is, equal to so much specie, the collector shall be obliged to receive it; if it is not, then he shall be at liberty to reject it. If the note is not what it purports to be, the representative of the specie to the amount on the face of it, then there ought to be no obligation to take it. The place of payment is what I would adopt as the test of all bank notes offered to us. If they are equal to specie there, they ought to be received. It may be said that the effect of such a rule will be to accumulate large sums of money at places where the Government does not need them, and thus subject it to the expense of transporting them to where they are required. But to test this objection, we have only to look back for a moment to the hard money system, and inquire, what would be the state of things if specie alone should be received? Would not that plan accumulate in the banks of the Western and Southwestern States vast amounts of gold and silver? And what is the Government to do with it? It is not needed there, and it would have to be transported at the expense of Government to where it is needed. So that my plan requires the transportation of a packet of bills, where that would require the transportation of a wagon load of specie. I think that the plan of making bank notes at par at the place of payment the test of the receivability of paper will save time, and have quite as good effect as the requisition of gold and silver.

I object to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia chiefly on account of its last clause. As to that part of it which requires the suppression of small notes, (though I believe that, in practice, it will prove perfectly nugatory, that it will effect just nothing) I am quite willing to indulge him with the experiment. Nothing, I am persuaded, will come out of it; but try it. But the last clause of his amendment says that no notes shall be received which the deposit banks are not willing to receive and credit to the United States. He adds, to be sure, that this shall be under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such a provision leaves the whole country in total uncertainty. No body can know to-day what is to be the rule to-morrow. And as to the added clause, it will, in practice, make no difference; without it the whole matter would have depended on the mere pleasure of the deposit banks; and with it, should the Secretary occasionally revise the proceedings of those banks, he will still be governed by the wishes of the deposit banks. I object to the entrusting of such a power either to the Secretary or with the deposit banks. It places that which should be fixed and regulated by a known law, at the mere mercy and good pleasure of the banks or the Secretary. But if he will insert in his amendment a clause making the place of payment the test of the notes, we shall then have some rule which all can understand. All parties concerned will know whether the notes offered are at par at the place where payment is made. But, otherwise, no one can know but the Secretary or the banks, may put down to-morrow the notes which, under their auspices, he has received to-day.

I fear, Mr. President, I have forfeited the good opinion I endeavored to conciliate when I began; but I have now done. All we desire is that something efficacious shall be done; that the session shall not be suffered to pass without the Treasury order being rescinded, either expressly or by implication; and I will now conclude by expressing my hope that, in every portion of the Senate, there will be found a disposition to extend equal and impartial justice to all parts of the country, without any degrading discriminations between one part and another, or one class of citizens and another.

Mr. RUGGLES rose only to correct an error into which the honorable Senator from Kentucky had fallen, no doubt inadvertently. He had mentioned the circumstance of Maine's having imposed restrictions upon the circulation of small notes, and remarked that, if he had not been misinformed, she immediately after sent to Massachusetts to obtain a supply of small notes to put in circulation in room of those prohibited. He begged leave to assure the Senator that he had been greatly misinformed. He had been led into a great mistake in this matter. Maine had, it is true, passed a law prohibiting the circulation of small bills, but it is not true that she had sought a supply of them afterwards from Massachusetts or elsewhere. The political friends of the Senator from Kentucky in Maine very warmly opposed the measure in the Legislature, and it may be that they carried their opposition beyond the passage of the law, and sent to their friends in Massachusetts for a supply of those small bills to which they were so much attached. But, he repeated that it was a mistake that such a course could be justly chargeable to the Government of the State.

Mr. CLAY explained. He did not mean to be understood as charging the Government of Maine, nor any political party there, with having sent out of the State for small notes. It might have been the act of individuals. He only mentioned the circumstance as showing that the law could not be executed, &c.

Mr. RUGGLES replied that he had no objection to make to the remark, if the Senator would confine it to his own political friends. But he did object to the imputation of such inconsistency upon the Government of the State, or upon the friends of the administration, who participated in the action of the Government on that subject.

PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF MR. EWING, OF OHIO.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, January 23, 1837.—The bill prohibiting the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, being under consideration—

Mr. EWING addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: As it is my purpose to examine this subject with some care and exactness, and, as far as in my power, show it to the Senate in its true colors and proportions, I find it necessary, in the outset, to spend a few moments in clearing it of some of the rubbish with which it is overlaid and surrounded.

The bill now under consideration is the successor, not exactly legitimate, of one introduced by my colleague at the commencement of the session, for limiting the sales of the public land to actual settlers. That plain, unpretending proposition was what it professed to be, and nothing else; the title declared the object of the bill, and though I thought the measure impracticable, I could not but feel the justice of the motion, and the straightforward means proposed to effect the object. That bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and we have here, reported back, in its name and in its place, what is now before us; and the title is all that is left, either of the letter or spirit of the original bill. But, even this small relic of what the bill once was, is, I divine a right, is destined to be obliterated and destroyed. The title is not descriptive of the contents of the bill, nor is it sufficiently magnificent. When the bill arrives at such stage that it will be in order, we shall have a motion to amend it, and, if the motion prevail, it will become "A bill to arrest monopolies of the public lands," &c. &c. &c.; the title is long and high-sounding, and is to be found at large in the journal of last year, and I will not now detain the Senate by reading it. I will, however, endeavor to show, before I sit down, what name it really merits, for I intend to discuss its provisions, not its title.

This debate has been freely interlarded with high denunciation against a class of our fellow-citizens called "speculators"—men who purchase public land either for subsequent sale, or that they may lie by, as an investment of money, to raise in value, and become a resource in after life, or an outfit for their children. And I have observed, also, what is not a little remarkable, that those who denounce these "speculators" the most loudly and the most frequently on this floor and elsewhere, are those who understand them best, and who are themselves the most deeply engaged in the vocation which they thus condemn. This is generally, perhaps universally, the case. This distinguishedness of gentlemen who condemn thus openly their own calling, and devise laws, intended, as they say, to check and put it down, reminds me of an incident in modern history worthy to be remembered.

When Lord Chancellor Bacon was convicted before Parliament for receiving presents from suitors, which bore a very strong resemblance to bribes, and was removed from office, he was the foremost in proposing and concocting measures which should thereafter effectually keep off such temptation and sin in future, and most certainly protect the purity of the bench. It reminds me, also, of a late occasion on which the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Rives) near me was so deeply impressed with the aristocracy of the Senate—himself certainly not the least aristocrat of its members—that he felt constrained to turn "States evidence," or, perhaps rather, "people's evidence," against the whole body, himself, of course, inclusive, though I believe he did not suggest any remedy for the enormity which he exposed. Now, this is all right; and it is honorable; and it is unquestionably sincere. I take no exceptions to it, but merely notice it among the passing incidents of the times.

Now, sir, I will say a few words as to this class of individuals who are so much the theme of discussion and of attack; and, that my opinion may have the more weight, I can assure the Senate that I am neither an aristocrat nor a speculator in public lands. I do not know that I have been accused here of the one or the other, but I have heard gentlemen on the other side of the House talk loudly and harshly of speculators, and those who favor speculations, while, at the same time, they made strong gestures towards the benches here. As I referred to no one in particular, I could only appropriate to myself my just distributive share of the reproach which, lessened by division, would be but small. Yet, that modicum, insignificant as it may be, I am prepared to dispose of. I therefore say, once for all, that I am wholly free from the offence of having ever purchased public land or any thing else from the General Government. And I have no sympathy, save that of general good will to all mankind, with any who I know have so purchased. I never entered an acre of public land in my life; and do not know that I ever shall; nor do I know that any friend, or even acquaintance of mine, is engaged in these purchases. My neighbors, it is true, in whose welfare I take great interest, do sometimes raise a little spare money and go to the West, and purchase a quarter or a half section of land, to settle a son who is about to arrive at the years of manhood, for which they pay the cash into the Treasury of the United States; and, until gentlemen satisfy me more fully than they have yet done, of the impropriety of the thing, I shall esteem them none the less for it; nor shall I the less assiduously advocate their interests and their rights.

But, in declaring my utter exemption from all participation, direct or indirect, in that kind of investment which is here condemned in such unmeasured terms, I do not at all admit the truth or justice of the judgment which condemns it. It is a use of money that is supposed to be unpopular, and it is no new artifice to exclaim against it, as if it were a crime, until, by force of voice and repetition, it may come to be esteemed so; and what is more to the purpose, those who are most deeply engaged in it, by being loud and vociferous in its condemnation, throw off all suspicion from themselves, and stand the pure advocates of the people's rights, and the very antagonist principle of all speculation and monopoly. But, sir, I see no objection to this mode of investing money when you have it to spare, and can make no better use of it. If it be fairly done, it is a fair, and just, and honest mode of acquiring property. The United States, by a public law, and a public proclamation, offers its land for sale at a stipulated price; an individual, who is desirous of possessing the land, goes and purchases, and pays his money. Now, why, I ask, does any one here apply to this act, or the man who does it, opprobrious epithets? Why accuse him? Why denounce him? If he had bought fifty hog-heads of sugar, or a hundred bales of cotton, he would be just as criminal, and deserve just the same opprobrium and reproach from the members of our National Legislature. Gentlemen are mistaken; these purchases and speculations in which they and their friends are so deeply engaged are not criminal, nor even improper in themselves. They are liable, indeed, and especially liable, to be contaminated, by fraud or force, or combinations among purchasers, and collision with public officers; but from these they and all honorable men, as a matter of course, are free. They, therefore, pronounce a harsh and unjust judgment on their own acts, and I am prepared to defend them against themselves before the Senate and the nation.

[Mr. WALKER here rose to explain. If the gentleman's allusion was to any thing he had said, so far from criminating purchasers of this description, he had, in the report accompanying this bill, expressed many of the same sentiments just uttered by the Senator from Ohio. He had denounced, and ever should denounce, in the strongest terms, those speculators who attended public sales after having taken down the numbers of lots improved by actual settlers, and bid them off over their head, thus depriving them of their homes and the fruit of all their toil.]

Mr. Ewing referred to the Senator from Mississippi who has just taken his seat, and also to others who, in both branches of Congress, habitually use the same course of remark. But I accept the explanation with pleasure, and regret that absence from the Senate prevented my hearing the Senator's principal speech on this subject, and that a pressure of business since my return has not allowed me time to read his report accompanying this bill. My remarks, so far as the Senator from Mississippi is concerned, applied to several short speeches of his on incidental questions touching the bill, which have arisen within a few days past. But I cannot concur with him in the distinction which he draws between those who purchase occupied and unoccupied lands of the United States. When all are offered in open market fairly for sale, when all who desire to bid are invited by law to become bidders, I cannot recognize the right of any individual to press forward upon a choice piece of the public land before the sale against law. Nor can I admit that by so doing, he makes the lawful purchaser amenable to censure, any where, for purchasing according to law. The proposition is monstrous in itself, and it must be a diseased state of public morals that can hold it for a moment either reasonable or just. My guide on this subject is the law—those who purchase according to its letter and its spirit, and who neither break through nor evade its provisions, no matter how much or how little they may buy, and no matter who may have intruded upon the land before the purchase, I hold them in that matter blameless; and, as far as my information goes, in nearly all the cases in which occupied land is purchased the squatter is paid many times over the value of his improvements, an often permitted to remain and enjoy them.

The sales of land in large quantities to large capitalists, as a matter of public policy, is liable to some objections, though it produces good as well as evil consequences. The evil is sufficiently obvious; and being a very happy subject for popular declamation, it has been reiterated, I know not how often, already in this debate. That which occurs to me as substantial, and which we can obviate by legislation, without producing other and worse mischief, are the entries by an individual or company of many small tracts, as of forty or eighty acres, in commanding points all over the country, or what is called dotting, thereby compelling purchasers of the neighboring tracts to pay enormous prices for such choice spots; but it will be seen that this bill, so far from remedying that evil, makes it infinitely worse. No man can now enter more than two forty-acre tracts, and one of those subject to certain conditions—proximity to his farm; but if this bill becomes a law in its present shape, he may enter no less than thirty-two of those small tracts, and he may select them any where on the public lands between the northern extremity of Wisconsin and the southern cape of Florida. The entries of large tracts by great capitalists, with a view to enhance their value by great and important improvements, such as railroads, canals, harbors, cities, have produced, and are producing, the most important advantages to the districts of country in which they are situated. Look at the southern shores of Lake Erie, and the whole coast of Lake Michigan, and see the towns and cities which are rising up by their borders, under the fostering care of capital and intelligence, and you will see at once the full strength of this position. The scattered resources of a thousand individuals, who should have purchased each his quarter section of land in the neighborhood, could not have produced such mighty results in half a century as have been brought about in a few years by the investment of accumulated capital. It has facilitated migration by the establishment of lines of steamboats between the cities on the eastern shore of the lake, and those remote western points which a few years ago were a wilderness. It has opened harbors, drained swamps, built wharves, and erected warehouses, transferring the business and bustle and comfort and intelligence of an old and cultivated community into the very heart of our remote western forests. Fortune, perhaps, are made, or augmented by it, but it is well. The value of land is enhanced greatly all around these selected spots, but this also is well; it is a just reward of enterprise and public spirit, and it injures no one, for the broad prairies of the interior are still open to the grazier, and the plains and woodlands to the farmer at the Government price, and a nearer and more extensive market is open to him in the new and flourishing cities which arise on these choice-selected spots. I am not, therefore, prepared to condemn, even as a matter of public policy, the countenance which our present laws give to this kind of investment by the capitalist. Much less am I disposed to join in the denunciation of those who, under and pursuant to our laws, adopt this mode of investing their surplus capital. Gentlemen even here are perhaps too much in the habit of addressing themselves to the lowest passions of the lowest portion of society; and while they themselves are insatiate in their thirst for riches, speak of poverty as if it were a merit, a good thing in itself, and wealth, or even competency, as if it were a crime. I for one unite in nothing of this feeling or expression. If a young man shows himself industrious, enterprising, and intelligent, and bids fair to rise in the world by these qualities, I am not prepared, as a statesman, to tell him that the moment he has risen he will have lost his claim to the affections of his country and the respect and regard of its rulers. And in our country, where industry, sobriety, and prudence will in almost all cases raise a man to competence, I do not think that mere poverty, too often the result of indolence and intemperance, is of itself sufficient to entitle the individual to our special affections and regard. In my opinion, poverty and wealth are, or ought to be, out of the question. I esteem a man none the more and none the less for being poor or rich; and in legislation I know not how we can discriminate between American citizens according to their property; and I contend, and am prepared to defend the proposition, that the man whom industry, temperance, and intellect have enabled to acquire a competence, is as meritorious as one whom indolence, intemperance, and imprudence have kept poor.

I therefore put out of the question all that has been said about and against capitalists and speculators. I join in the denunciation of no class of our fellow-citizens who pursue a business which the law authorizes; and I do not make, nor do I pretend to make, any efforts to put them down. But, on the other hand, I will not consent to pass any law which shall operate against the mass of the community—against the small capitalist, the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, for the special benefit of any class of speculators; however great their power, or democratic their professions; and I believe it, that many of the Executive officers, some of the very highest, next to the President himself, are deeply concerned in these land speculations. It is also said, and I believe it, that some in this chamber, and in the other house, are also members of these large joint stock companies, which have purchased to an immense amount. I charge no one in particular, nor do I present it as a matter of charge; but I name it to caution gentlemen who are so engaged and so interested, that they do not permit their private interest, unawares to themselves, to glide in and mingle with the performance of a public trust. How can those who are so engaged, and who have so purchased to the full extent of all their available means, how can they now, as lawgivers, say to the rest of the community, you shall not purchase—the public sales shall be closed against you, and if you wish to buy, come to us; we have land to sell in abundance, and we will sell it to all who will pay for it, without discrimination, and we sell it embarrassed by no troublesome conditions. Gentlemen, it is true, could not be operated upon by motives of this kind, but it were well to avoid the appearance of evil; and as this bill will, if it become a law, have the direct effect of driving purchasers from the Government to the speculator, and as it is to continue in force about long enough to enable these large companies to make sale of the twenty millions of acres which they have now on hand, the public will attribute to them this, as one of the motives which induced the passage of the act. They will be thus more inclined to think so, as this act is not, and they will see that it is not, what it is pretended to be. It is not a bill to confirm the sales of the public lands to actual settlers; and an amendment which would produce that effect, laid on the table by myself, (not offered, for I could not support any proposition which would deny to my fellow-citizens the right of purchasing lands to settle their children)—an amendment which would have produced that effect, met with the universal approbation of the friends of this bill. This bill, therefore, is not, and the people will see that it is not, what it purports to be; and its effect, which is the important matter, will be to raise at once some fifty or a hundred per cent. the price of the lands already in the hands of the large speculators, of whom the lawgivers, who are about to pass this bill, form a very respectable part, and whose friends in the Executive Department form another portion not less large and respectable. If it is a law pass, a member of one of those companies, whose profits would have been confined to one hundred thousand dollars, will pocket his two hundred thousand. For this it will be said he may very well break out in terms of patriotic indignation against speculators and capitalists, and he may overflow with sympathy for the poor man. But the churchill will nature will aver that the members of the Legislature and of the Executive Departments, who hold the key in their hands, have fed until they were full gorged with these dainties, and then locked the closet, that no one else might break in until they were ready themselves to return and renew the feast.

I have said that the amount of lands in the hands of speculators is about twenty millions of acres; this, in round numbers, is very near the quantity. In a report which I had the honor to present last year, from the Committee on Public Lands, I estimated the quantity wanted for actual occupation at eight millions of acres yearly. This was then thought too high, but time will verify its accuracy. Year before last the sales amounted to about thirteen millions of acres. This year it amounted to more than twenty millions; which, taking my estimate of what is wanted for settlement as correct, (and every one admits it is high enough) it will leave in the hands of speculators from sixteen to twenty millions of the purchases of those two years. The whole aggregate is low enough at twenty millions. This immense investment, amounting in cash (if we include all expenses) to thirty millions of dollars, has more than exhausted all the capital that can be turned from the ordinary business of the country to this object. Those who hold public lands and command political influence, or whose friends command it, have become borrowers to an immense amount of the public money from the deposit banks; and the deposit bill of the last year cut off the sources of their supply, and compels them to pour back into the loan from which it was drawn a portion of their borrowed treasure. This state of things tends to make this business, pushed as it has been to an unreasonable extent, a precarious if not a lesing business, unless the Legislature come to the relief of these borrowers of the public money. Gentlemen may say what they please about these persons, if they will only aid them by a law such as this. If they will but encumber the conditions of the sales of public land to honest and fair purchasers, so that they cannot buy of Government, but may be compelled to buy of the speculator, those who have gone farthest in proportion to their resources, and are compelled to sell, will thank you for your hard names and good gifts. And they have no reason to complain of unkindness; the Treasury order did much for them, but that cannot endure long; the public exclaim with one voice against it, and it must go down. But this bill, which better effects the same object, is to be first substituted in its stead. I see, however, by indications here, that we shall not touch the bill rescinding the Treasury circular in time for it to be taken up in the other House and passed into a law. It will not do to keep up that order to oppress the country, for the people will not endure it long. It is to be rescinded, but not by an act of Congress. We shall pass such act through this branch near the close of the session; it will be lost in the other House for want of time; and thus it will be reserved until after the 4th of March, that its final decision may be a feather in the cap of the new administration. I infer this, from the fact that this bill, for which the people do not call, is pressed in advance of the bill to rescind the Treasury order. And when I moved the other day to take up that bill, I received a most significant intimation from a gentleman whose word is law here, that I might spare my efforts, for they were useless; and it proved so—the party refused to take up the bill.

Having considered some matters which touch this bill collaterally, and which, if it pass, will really have more influence on its passage than any intrinsic merit which it possesses, I will now proceed to consider some of the provisions of the bill itself, and show how far forth it is likely to effect its professed objects. It proposes to limit the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and that in small quantities. The requirements of the bill in that respect, are, let me say may enter under one of the sections of this bill more than 1,230 acres of land, but in another part of the bill he is very generously allowed 640 acres more if he want it to eke out his farm; so he may purchase more than 1,870 acres; and this is what is called "small quantities." The settlement provision requires that the purchaser should reside on the land, or some part of it, one year, or—not and—on clear and cultivate one-tenth part of it within five years. Now, the clearing, where one-tenth part of the tract is open prairie land, is not a matter of much difficulty or hardship; it requires only the burning off of the grass in November, and that work is done. Then the cultivation; what is that, and how is it defined? Is it the passing a harrow over the ground, and sowing tame grass seed on it? Is it running a few furrows across a tract of one or two hundred acres, and planting corn rows upon it, with the hills a hundred yards apart? It is not to be cultivated well, but merely cultivated, and the fact of cultivation to be settled by those who make the affidavit before the register and receiver, in order to perfect the title. Those, then, who live upon the spot, and who understand it, would have nothing to do but to put up a log cabin, which would cost five or ten dollars, burn the grass off of 200 acres of prairie, and run a plough or harrow a few times across, and sow or plant a little grass seed or a few hills of corn, and the condition of the law requiring "actual settlement" is complied with. The affidavit is made, and the patent obtained. This bill leaves the fact of clearing and cultivation to the sound discretion and clear conscience of the affidavit man who is to swear to it; and if there be any other regulation or restriction, I am not advised of it. We have a Committee on Agriculture, it is true, of which my honorable friend from Kentucky near me is a member, though not of high rank; last, I believe. [Mr. Clay: "Last, but not least." A laugh.] This committee, however, has not yet reported what shall amount to cultivation, and I presume it is not the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to refer this bill to them for their opinion. Now, my constituents, who reside at a distance from the public lands, and who do not understand this mode of becoming "actual settlers," and of "clearing and cultivating land," would be unable to purchase of the Government at all, and would be driven to buy second-hand of those who understood the matter better, or of the speculators, who have already on hand large quantities for sale. Gentlemen who advocate this bill see in it a remedy for many great political and moral evils; among others, it is to destroy or prevent that dreadful scourge "a surplus, and distribution," for which they evince such a holy horror. This surplus was a very good thing so long as it remained in the deposit banks, and was by them lent out to those who wished to purchase public land "in limited quantities,"—such, for example, as half a million of acres to a single company; but when you come to distribute, or rather deposit in the State treasuries, then it carries with it all sorts of political iniquity and corruption; it is every thing that is monstrous; no republican can bear it, and this bill is to put an end to the mischief; and this money, which, if distributed, would corrupt the whole nation, can be safely trusted with the gentlemen and their constituents without any danger of corrupting them. Let us say they are the exclusive purchasers of the public lands, we will not take much of it, but we want it cheap, but save us from competition! Do not permit the Ohio and Pennsylvania farmers, rough, rude fellows as they are, to come to the sales with their little wallets of cash, and bid against us—us, anti-monopolists—or enter the land that we want, while we are waiting to raise funds to secure it; withdraw all this provoking competition; pass this bill, and make it unlawful for any man living in one of the old States to come to the new to purchase Government lands, and we will let the tariff alone; we will adhere to the compromise and hold it sacred; and we will also save you from the inconvenience of a surplus and the perils of distribution. Some of these gentlemen reason with us mildly; others declaim with oratorical vehemence. Why, say they, should you collect money from the people which you do not want, merely to distribute it among them again? And when we answer that it arises out of the sale of the national domain, that we must receive or stop these sales, and when received, we must preserve it in such manner as to render the most service to the whole country, they offer to relieve us of all this inconvenience by keeping the public land and the profits on it themselves, thus lightening the public burdens by possessing themselves of the public property. You have, say they, a great quantity of excellent land, which is a very great trouble to you; we and our constituents will relieve you of it at once; but do not let the people of the old States have it, or any part or lot in it; they are speculators, and they will fill your Treasury with money, which you know is a very troublesome thing. We, who are not speculators, but who know how to make money by dealing in land, will take it without embarrassing you with any thing that will burden your Treasury.

These lands which gentlemen ask in behalf of themselves and their constituents the exclusive right of purchasing at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, are worth, by their own showing, from $5 to $40 per acre. There are yet undisposed of, about one thousand millions of acres—not all of such great value, but worth, nevertheless, more than one thousand millions of dollars. Pass this bill, and follow it up, as you are certain to do if you once make the commencement, and there will be fortunes made under it, such as no crowned head in Europe can boast; Cæsar was a beggar compared with the industrious and unscrupulous speculator under this bill. Gentlemen before whose eyes these golden visions flit, hate every thing they ought to hate, to induce other gentlemen to support their favorite measure: they hate the tariff, but they will endure it; they do not like the compromise, but they will adhere to it, if this bill can be passed to ease the Treasury of its cash, and relieve the people of their burdens. The public lands—an unconstitutional surrender of the public lands—is the only thing that can reconcile or pacify them.

Pacific as I am inclined to be, and much as gentlemen have operated on the easiness of my disposition, and greatly as they have alarmed my fears, I am not yet disposed to make them this large peace-offering, until I am assured that we have the constitutional power to do it; I want to see our authority, and I would like further to know that we can do it and be just. This public domain is a fund placed under the guardianship of Congress by a compact prior to the Constitution, and which is recognised and made obligatory by that sacred instrument. And Congress is bound, by that compact, to dispose of it bona fide for the benefit of all the States, members of this Confederacy, according to their proportions of representative population. And it ought to be so, for it was bought with the common blood and common treasure of the people of all the States, old as well as new; for I acknowledge no pre-eminence in favor of the old States. Our common ancestors fought on their soil for our freedom, and they (the small remnant of them) and their descendants (now a mighty people) are spread over our whole vast territory; and, wheresoever they are, they inherit the glory as well as the rights of their fathers.

These public lands, then, are to be disposed of bona fide for the common benefit of all the States. The fund, of which we are thus made the trustee, is immense—worth not less than one thousand millions of dollars: this is now admitted; though a few years ago, when the estimate of its value was made by my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) it was scouted by gentlemen who then wanted to get the land, not because it was overflowing our Treasury with money, but because this land was not worth surveying and selling. Gentlemen, it is true, do not now ask it as a gift, but they admit the choice tracts to be worth from $15 to $40 per acre. And they ask us to withdraw from them all competition at public and at private sales—to give pre-emptions to those who shall intrude on the land—and thus secure it to them at $1 25 per acre. They only ask us to give them from about $14 to $39 an acre on all the choice land of the United States that remains to be sold. These demands, it must be admitted, are moderate, especially when addressed to a trustee who is bound to administer the fund bona fide for the equal benefit of all who have an interest in it. The privilege, therefore, which these gentlemen ask for their constituents, or those who shall become so, is a donation, and a very large one. It is against common right, and it promotes no meritorious object whatever. Suppose it to induce emigration: is that desirable to a greater extent than is now going on? Should it be the object, or is it the interest of the United States, as a whole, to induce by bounties the citizens of the old States, on or near the seacoast, to abandon their farms and their homes, and migrate to the West?

The last census shows that the older portions of the old States are in fact depopulating. From the year 1820 to 1830, Virginia, east of the Blue Ridge, lost about 100,000 of its population. The same was the case, though in a less degree, with several extensive districts in others of the old States. Now, I make no objection to this; but I do not think it a desirable state of things. It is enough for us, in the West, if we receive the natural increase of the population of the old States, and it is enough for them if their increased population finds an easy access to our fresh lands, and a cheap home when they come among us. It is not wise, nor is it necessary, to give new bounties for emigration; nor have we a right to do it. Suppose the bounty to emigrants proposed in this bill were to be paid in money out of the Treasury, and the lands were sold in fair and open market to raise the money, would any gentleman from the old States, having the least regard for the rights and interests of his own constituents, consent to it, or even entertain the proposition for a moment? I think not. And where is the difference? It is the same thing in substance and effect: the mode of bringing it about gives it a different aspect.

Having considered the general objects of the bill, both as expressed, and as professed by its advocates, I will now examine some of its provisions, and endeavor to show how those objects are to be carried into effect. The bill is entitled and professes to be "A bill to limit the sales of the public lands to actual settlers;" but I have said it is in fact no such thing. I call the attention of the Senate to its provisions. Who may enter land under it? Any one—man or woman, husband or wife, or both, without any evidence of residence, or of any declaration of intent to reside upon it. All they have to do is to swear that they enter it for their own use, and not for the purpose of speculation. Here is the initiation of the title. And how much land may be entered by making this oath, and under this particular section of the bill? The husband may enter 1,240 acres, the wife 1,240, the son and daughter, over eighteen years of age, 1,240 acres each—making in all, for an ordinary family of four persons, 4,960 acres, and this may be all entered in tracts of 40 acres each, making 128 tracts that a single family, such as I have described, may enter, on this "actual settlement" principle, and these 128 tracts may be dotted over all the public lands in the United States, occupying all the most commanding positions in the country. They may take your woodland in a prairie region, your springs and brooks in a country where water is scarce, and your coal banks and quarries where fuel and stone are valuable. Having thus sworn and made the entry, and obtained the certificate the next step to procure a title is to reside on some part of the land one year within the first five; it must not be a continuous residence, but one year in all: or, erect a dwelling-house, clear and cultivate, within the five years, one-tenth part of the whole: that is to say; select in the entry somewhere one-tenth part of your purchases in a dry prairie, which will burn over in October or November. This burning is a compliance with the first requisition, that to "clear." The next is "to cultivate," and that can be done, as I have already shown, in a most commodious manner. A few bushels of grass seed, and one man, two horses and a harrow, for a month or two, are sufficient to make the "cultivation," for it has only to be sworn to generally as "cultivation,"—the mode and manner of it being in no wise designated.

The next step to be taken to procure a title is to "swear" again, or to produce the affidavits of those who will swear to residence, or swear to the erection of a dwelling-house, and swear to the clearing and cultivation of the one-tenth part in five years. "Our army swore terribly in Flanders," said Corporal Trim.

But the person making an entry of the public lands must swear that he enters it, not in trust for any other person, but for himself or herself only. This provision prevents the father from entering in behalf of his child, the guardian for his ward, or the trustee of a will in behalf of the widow or orphan devisees; it prevents, also, an entry in execution of a charity. All open, honest trusts, those that deserve the countenance of mankind and the favor of Government, are excluded by this bill, while every species of fraudulent and secret trust will come in and evade its provisions. A person, before he is allowed to make the entry, must swear that he enters for himself, and not in trust for another. Now, suppose the affidavit to be wholly false, how is it ever to be proved that it is so? It is swearing to intent merely, and the intent at the time the oath is taken; and if some other person, who furnished the money to make the entry, go on in one month after, and clear and cultivate the one-tenth part of it, and the patent issue at the end of one year, and the land is transferred accordingly, the capitalist has got the land, and he may go through the same process with hundreds, as far as his friends will go; and where is your evidence to convict of perjury or subornation of perjury? You clearly have none—the proof must come home to the time of making the affidavit, and doing of an act inconsistent with it afterwards would convict the party of a change of purpose, but not of perjury. And all who know the facility with which these ex parte affidavits are made, where much money is to be got by them, will agree with me that the fear of the law is the only restraint upon perjury in cases like this—conscience is nothing, public opinion is nothing, for all society is placed under like temptation, and public morals would, by reason of that temptation, become generally vitiated. The man who would hold out against such a state of things would be considered an enemy to his country and the interests of it, and he could reclaim his character in no way but by joining in the general plunder. If there should be a case of prosecution, and strong proof of perjury, there could seldom be a conviction, for the fountains of justice are poisoned when the public morals are thus vitiated; and there would be great danger that the registers and receivers in the several land offices would join in the fraud and share the spoils. We should hesitate long before we place before any portion of our community such a temptation to vice—such a vast amount of plunder to be obtained by fraud and crime. There is a clause several times repeated in the bill, and of course intended to be efficacious, which provides, in substance, that no legal incumbrance whatever, and no sale, or lease, or contract as to such land, shall be, in any wise, binding, if made before a patent issues, but all such shall be absolutely null and void. Now, whatever might be the effect of this provision in the Territories, where we have a right to interfere as a local Legislature, I hold that it is wholly nugatory in the States. If an individual have title either complete or inchoate, that title is property, and, as such, is at once amenable to the local law, and must be governed and controlled by its principles. A judgment would bind the interest when the local law should declare judgments binding on imperfect titles. A contract would attach to it, and equity would enforce its obligations. A conveyance with covenants made prior to the issuing of the patent would draw to it the perfect title after the patent had issued, upon the principle either of estoppel, enurement, or relation. Gentlemen cannot, if they would, destroy the application of these principles to effect, or serve to effect, this or any other such object; and it is well that they cannot. They may provide that no patent shall issue to an assignee, for, as the vendors of property, we have a right to make what condition we please with the purchaser. But when the land lies in the States, and we sell it, we are vendors only, and we cannot accompany our sale with illegal incumbrances, or immunities inconsistent with the general principles of law.

I would next call the attention of the Senate to the fourth section of the bill, which grants pre-emptions to actual settlers on the public lands; that is, it permits any one who shall have gone in advance of the surveys and sales, or even of the purchase from the Indians, and intruded upon choice parts of the public land, to prove that they have done so, and then enter the land, no matter how great may be its value, at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. I object to the principle of this section, and if the principle be adopted I object to the language and the details—as open to the practice of the most stupendous frauds.

We have upon our statute book, yet unrepealed, an early law punishing intruders upon the public lands. That law directs that the marshal of the district shall remove those who intrude against law on the public land, and that a fine shall be assessed upon them, on conviction in the district courts of the United States. Nor has this law become obsolete. It was recognised and its provisions extended in 1833, and it is now in full force, and as familiarly known as any other of the laws of the land. I object, therefore, in principle to giving an important privilege—a great pecuniary advantage, to a class of individuals, merely because they have violated the laws. That statute, if it be unwise or unjust, should be repealed before any rights are permitted to accrue by intrusion on or over portions of the public lands.

But, sir, that law is a necessary and proper law—it ought to remain, and its provisions ought to be regarded and enforced. It was enacted to prevent the intrusions of the whites upon the Indian lands, and to avoid the fraud, imposition, and oppression which is the consequence of such intrusion; and further, to prevent a possession in advance of the sales, which would inure the lands, and operate to the injury of the purchaser. We have recently seen enough, in our own times, to satisfy us of the wisdom and foresight of our predecessors. Whence arose your Black Hawk war in the Northwest, which cost some lives and several millions of money, but from the haste of a horde of greedy speculators to possess themselves of the fine lands belonging to the Sac and Fox Indians at the Prairie du Chien? Whence your threatened Creek war? Whence your actual war in Florida, now raging, and which has cost already so many valuable lives, and which has cost and will cost more than twenty millions of treasure before it is quelled, except from the avarice, and pride, and oppression of these intruders upon the public land and the Indian property. If the laws of the United States had been enforced, if this breach had been punished instead of being rewarded, we should have escaped all this, with its attendant train of misery to individuals, and mortification to a people.

But if no evils arose from this contemplated law except those which fall on the individuals themselves who seek to take advantage of it, it would be enough to decide us at once against its policy. Those who framed it must have been aware of its tendency, and aware also that that tendency would be obvious, if the bill had, in form, the provisions which it is intended to have, and which, if it pass, it must have, in effect. The right of pre-emption is by the bill limited to those who have occupied, and does not extend in terms to those who shall hereafter occupy, the public lands. This is the form of the bill; but the effect is to give the right to all future occupants. For this measure is even now urged on the ground that we have held out encouragement to settlers by former pre-emption laws; that, under the provisions of those laws, past settlers had been protected, and that those who entered on the public lands too late to claim protection under those laws, had a right to expect that the same favor would be extended to them which was extended to their predecessors. This is the argument; and will it be less strong when urged next winter, in behalf of those who shall have occupied and cultivated the public land during the summer of 1837, than it is now in favor of those who occupied during the past year? I can see no distinction. And if we pass this law now, we must pass another then, and so on in all future time. I would rather, therefore, pass at once a pre-emption law, to operate in all future time, and fairly, by law, hold out this reward to settlers on the public land, than to continue in force, as we do, the law against such settlement, with the assurance in advance that all those who break it shall hereafter receive the reward. All the evil consequences which would flow from a prospective pre-emption law, and they are many, flow from this state of things; and in addition thereto we hold out the assurance to the people that, whatever our laws may be, if resisted, they will not be enforced.

If it became a fixed principle that the actual settler or occupant gets the land which he may select, at $1 25 per acre, then will arise contests and conflicts between individuals about the possession of favorite and valuable tracts. First, it will be a race, who shall get on first to take possession. Then a conflict to keep it. The first who gets on, if the tract be very valuable, is likely to be driven off by a stronger hand, with the loss, perhaps, of limb, and sometimes of life. Another yet stronger detachment drives off the second "actual settler;" and they in turn have to defend their possessions against a fourth; and all apply in their order to the register and receiver, and make the necessary affidavits to obtain their titles. Cases of this kind are constantly occurring, even now. A friend of mine, in the other house, who recently travelled through Wisconsin and part of Illinois, informed me that when at Mineral Point he heard a conflict for the possession of a lead mine spoken of, not as an extraordinary, but as a recent incident. Two parties who contended for the mine, drove each other away, and alternately took possession four or five times, with the loss of several lives. One of the party who succeeded in keeping possession, and who had killed a young man in one of their engagements, was quietly amusing himself in a store or tavern a short time after, when a young woman addressed him, and inquired his name. He told it, and she at once drew a pistol from under her cloak, and shot him through. Private revenge in these cases seems to be the only redress for murder, as the law takes no notice of incidents so common and so unimportant.

I am told that, in travelling through the fine lands in the Northwest, you will see these "actual settlements and improvements" constantly forming. If it is prairie, they merely run a furrow round it. If it is a choice piece of woodland that is to be held by improvement, they will fell trees all around it, so that the top of one will lap on to the stump of another; then the woodland is enclosed, and the party is entitled to it, as an actual settler. And perhaps it is the only spot of woods within many miles in the midst of a broad prairie, and therefore of immense value. If the woody island be very large, it becomes the subject of a kind of joint-stock company, or association, who all unite to "improve it," and to secure each other in the possession of it. I find the following advertisement in a Chicago paper:

SETTLERS, ATTENTION.

Notice is hereby given, that the semi-annual meeting of the Big Woods Claim Association will meet at the house of Thomas Paxton, on the east side of the Big Woods, on Saturday, the 4th day of February next, at ten o'clock A. M. when a general attendance is requested.

January 3d.

JOHN WARNE.

The particular character and purpose of these associations I will show by and by more fully. There is a false base constantly put upon this subject, not intentionally, but from a mistaken notion of the thing, by gentlemen who urge, with so much zeal and perseverance, the claims of the squatters to the lands on which they intrude. Gentlemen represent the squatters generally as poor men, seeking a freehold and a home, willing to pay for the land on which they settle, but unable to do so, because the lands are not in market, and cannot be purchased. But how is the fact? You have more than one hundred millions of acres of land, a large portion of it excellent land, constantly in market, and open to entry at $1 25 per acre; but there is not much speculation in purchasing this, and therefore these "poor men" that gentlemen speak of, seeking a home, pass it by, and go habitually to the lands that are not in market; and they will continue to do so, let you push your surveys and sales to whatever point you may.

Then the improvements by which, under this bill, the squatters are permitted to gain a right to the land. We had that subject under consideration last year, and the proof was ample that, in a vast number of cases, I should think a majority of cases, the improvement was merely colorable, for the purpose of enabling the individual to get the land, but having nothing actual or substantial about it; and this bill requires no substantial occupation or cultivation. The individual, to give him a title to his pre-emption, must have "actually occupied and cultivated the tract for six months before the 1st of December, 1836." "Actually occupied and cultivated." How occupied? Not by residing on it; for that is not necessary to make an occupation in law, much less in the opinion of the two witnesses who are to make affidavit to the occupation. He may go on the ground, mark the trees if there be any, and burn a brush-heap, and continue to go upon it once a month for the six months, claiming to occupy, and he will make out his occupancy. He must also "cultivate." This, I am told, is done by building a little pen of rails, and sowing oats or turnips or radishes upon ten or twelve square feet of ground; and thus the "actual settler" occupies and cultivates, and becomes the meritorious recipient of your large bounty. My colleague informs me that he travelled through a part of these public lands not long since, last summer, I believe, and he saw great numbers of these little pens, with something growing in them. I did not think to ask him whether they were square or triangular, built with three rails or four.

[Mr. MORRIS. They were triangular, built with three rails.] Mr. EWING. I should have guessed so, for the economy of labor is important, and the "actual settler" could thus save one rail for the whole height of his pen—a small matter. But after proving this occupancy and cultivation, these actual settlers sell their claim at an advance of some two or three hundred dollars, to large capitalists, who have their agents always at hand, ready to purchase, and they go again beyond the survey, and "actually cultivate" another pen full of something that will grow in a shade, and sell again. Thus squatting becomes a regular profession. A gentleman lately from Chicago informs me that he knew a great number of the pre-emption claimants about that place some years ago, who got their claims allowed and shortly after disappeared, he knew not where; but last summer as he was going across the country to the Prairie du Chien, he found and recognised them as old acquaintances. They were on the fine lands upon Rock river, waiting to take advantage of the next pre-emption law. I do not say that this is the habit of all who squat upon the public land for the purpose of obtaining a pre-emption; I am aware that it is not; but it is the business of many, and most of the pre-emptors fall into and pass through the hands of those who are employed for the purpose by the large capitalist, or who go in advance of him, and cater for him.

The pre-emption laws (for we have tried them for a few years past) have already produced a most fruitful crop of fraud and perjury. From papers sent each year to the Committee on Public Lands, it appears that in many cases even the pretence of possession or cultivation was not resorted to in order to get a pre-emption or a float, which could be laid on the finest land in the United States—the choicest and most commanding spots, and take them at $1 25 per acre. There was actually set up somewhere in Louisiana a manufactory of affidavits, in which the whole proof, with the justice's certificate, and every thing else necessary for the commencement of the title, were forged, leaving a blank for the name of the occupant and the tract of land. There is now pending a case of a French settler by the name of Raubien, who, about the year 1804, got permission to put up his hut under the guns of the United States fort at Chicago. When the pre-emption was passed, as the United States had not sold this fort, he claimed it as a pre-emption. He was several times refused, but at last his claim was admitted by the register and receiver, and he got his certificate; his application for a patent is now pending. I understand that the land he claims on this state of his case is worth more than a million of dollars. That in order to obtain an influence, and a power by which it should be secured, he has disposed of parts of it, on very cheap terms, to men of high political standing, wherever he could find them. A valuable part of it, I am told, is now owned by members of Congress, and God knows to what point this interest and influence may at last extend, far enough, I presume, to secure the emanation of a patent. It is a subject worthy the inquiry of a committee of Congress.

These pre-emption laws have not only produced violence and bloodshed among those who strive as rivals for a choice spot; they have not only produced fraud and perjury, and corruption, but they have taught your citizens to despise your laws, to resist by violence their due operation, and form great and extensive combinations to oppose them. It is well known by those who have attended the sales of public lands in the northwest, that violence and intimidation are used at those sales, and in the presence of the officers of the United States, to put down competition. Men who are occupants, or pretend to be so, or who buy the privilege of coming in as an occupant, and I am told that any one may buy that privilege of the association for five or ten dollars, gather together in a group by the stand at the place of sale, and when a tract which they have selected is proclaimed, some one who has a good strong voice cries out "pre-emption;" and then we to the men who venture to bid for it. It is, as a matter of course, struck off at $1 25 per acre. Associations are now forming over the whole northwestern country, the object of which appears to be, either to bind the laws to the purposes of the combination, or to put down law by numbers and organization, if not by force. I hold in my hand the constitution of one of these societies, which was forwarded me by a prominent member, accompanied by a letter in which he seems to claim my approbation of its object. I hope it may be read.

[The Secretary here read the paper alluded to, which is too long for insertion entire; but the following are two of the principal articles.]

"ART. 11th. Resolved, That, before the land is offered for sale, each district shall select a bidder to stand and bid off all claims in the claimant's name, and that, if necessary, each settler will constantly attend the sale, prepared to aid each other to the full extent of our ability in obtaining every claimant's land at Government price."

"ART. 13th. Resolved, That we will each use our endeavors to advance the rapid settlement of the country, by inviting our friends and acquaintance to join us, under the full assurance that we shall obtain our rights, and that it is now as perfectly safe to go on improving the public lands as though we had already outlived from Government."

This requires no comment; it is a Government established in a Government—imperium in imperio. It does not profess to be subordinate to the laws of the Union, but in opposition to them, and its object is to embarrass their operations and destroy their force.

I had hoped, at the last session, that we had got clear of this pre-emption system, with all its mischiefs, and all its demoralization; but a desperate effort is now made to revive it, and, if once more revived, it is fastened upon us, and for ever.

FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF MR. BELL. OF TENNESSEE.

[As reported for the National Intelligencer.]

In House of Representatives, January 25, 1837.—On the bill to secure the Freedom of Elections.

Mr. BELL said he rose for the purpose of submitting a motion, of which he had given notice, for leave to introduce a bill to secure the freedom of elections; but he had felt so much of the inconvenience under which gentlemen labored who held resolutions which they could not have an opportunity to present, that he was disposed now, after having submitted his motion, to move that every gentleman who had resolutions to offer should now offer them, provided they would not create debate. If no gentlemen were desirous to present such resolutions, he was ready to proceed with his observations.

No resolution having been offered, Mr. BELL said that the remarks which he intended to submit might, perhaps, be better comprehended if he were to send to the Chair the bill and preamble; which he did, and requested that they should be read; and they were accordingly read, as follows:

A bill to secure the Freedom of Elections.

Whereas complaints are made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices and employments under the authority of the same, other than the heads of the chief Executive Departments, or such officers as stand in the relation of constitutional advisers of the President, have been removed from office, or dismissed from their employment, upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake; and whereas such a practice is manifestly a violation of the freedom of elections, an attack upon the public liberties, and a high misdemeanor; and

Whereas complaints are also made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, are in the habit of intermeddling in elections, both State and Federal, otherwise than by giving their votes; and whereas such a practice is a violation of the freedom of elections, and a gross abuse, which ought to be discontinued by the appointing power, and prohibited by law; and

Whereas complaints are also made that, pending the late election of President and Vice President of the United States, officers and employments were distributed and conferred, in many instances, under circumstances affording a strong presumption of corruption, or that they were conferred as the inducements to, or the reward of, influence employed, or to be employed, in said election; and whereas such a practice, in the administration of the patronage of the Government, will speedily destroy the purity and freedom of the elective franchise, and undermine the free system of government now happily established in these United States: Therefore, to prevent the recurrence of any practices which may give rise to similar complaints in future,

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person, holding any office or employment of trust or profit, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall, by the contribution of money, or other valuable thing, or by the use of the franking privilege, or the abuse of any other official privilege or function, or by threats and menaces, or in any other manner, intermeddle with the election of any member or members of either House of Congress, or of the President or Vice President of the United States, or of the Governor or other officer of any State, or of any member or members of the Legislature of any State; and every such officer or other person offending therein, shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars; and any officer other than the President, Vice President, and judges of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be thereupon removed from office, and shall be ever after incapable of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with the right of suffrage as secured by the Constitution: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall so operate as to prevent the President, or the head of any department who is vested by law with the power of appointing inferior officers, from removing from office, at any time, any incumbent whom the President, or the head of a department, as the case may be, shall be satisfied has intermeddled in any election, State or Federal.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, no officer who, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, is authorized to appoint, or nominate and appoint any officer or agent of the Government, shall, by himself or by any other person or persons in his behalf, give, or procure to be given, or promise to give or procure to be given, any office, place, or employment, to any person or persons whatsoever, with intent to corrupt or bribe him or them, or for whose use, or on that such person or persons to whom, or for whose use, or on whose behalf such gift or promise shall be made, shall exert his or their influence in any election, or by himself or themselves, or by any other person or persons, at his or their solicitations, or to endeavor to secure the election of any person or persons to represent any State, or any district in any State in Congress, or of any person to be President or Vice President of the United States, or of any person to be Governor or other officer of any State, or of any person or persons to be a member or members of the Legislature of any State; and every such officer offending therein shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars; and any officer other than the President, or the judges of any of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be thereupon removed from office, and shall be incapable, ever after, of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States; and every person who shall receive or accept, in behalf of, such person, any office, place, or employment, with the intent aforesaid, shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, be removed or dismissed from such office, place, or employment, and shall be incapable, ever after, of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several lines posed by this act shall, when collected, be paid into the Treasury as other moneys belonging to the United States.

After the reading had been concluded, Mr. BELL, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: In moving for leave to introduce the bill that has just been read for the information of the House, I have been actuated by a motive which, I know, will be more acceptable to honorable members than merely to lay the foundation of a speech for ephemeral effect, here or elsewhere. My object is, sincerely, temperately, but earnestly, to call the attention of both sides of this House, and of the country, to the expediency, the imminent expediency, not to say the necessity, of immediate legislation upon the subject which it brings to view.

I admit the obligation of every gentleman upon this floor, who ventures to bring forward charges of a grave nature, and upon which he proposes to call forth the action of the House, to be sure that they are not unfounded in fact, and to take care that he may not be justly charged with an attempt to create unjust and false impressions for party effect, or merely to gratify some unworthy passion. In this respect, I feel that I stand upon perfectly sure ground. As to the allegations of improper practices and abuses, set forth or implied in the preamble to the bill, I stand prepared to prove them all by such evidence as would be satisfactory to any jury of honest men; and I challenge the opportunity, under the authority and in the name of this House, to do so, to the satisfaction of the whole country. As to some of the abuses assumed to exist in the preamble, I believe I will not be put to the proof. The practice which has obtained to some, I believe I may say to a considerable extent, of removals from office upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake, will not, I imagine, be denied by gentlemen representing the Middle and Northern States. Still, I may revert to this point again, inasmuch as in some sections of the country it has been denied that such a practice has obtained, under this administration, to any extent. I presume, sir, it will scarcely be denied that a large proportion of the officers of the Federal Government, from the President down to the lowest grade of persons employed in its service, have interfered, of late, in all Federal elections, directly, openly, and industriously. Then, the only charge implied in the preamble of the bill which may call for explanation, or proof, is that, in the late election of President and Vice President, offices and employments have been given and distributed as the wages of political profligacy—the rewards of hiring service in the support of particular and favorite candidates. I know the extent of the responsibility I assume in making this charge. I know full well the difficulty which always attends an attempt to make proof of any such charge, when there is so much power to influence and intimidate on the one hand, and none, often, even to protect, on the other. I know how often it happens that a whole community are convinced in their own minds, from circumstances known to exist, that crime has been perpetrated, yet the accused is foiled in making out his charge by clear and positive proof. But, after taking a full view of the responsibility I incur, I here solemnly reaffirm the charge implied in the last clause of the preamble to the bill which I have submitted for the consideration of the House. I beg leave to explain the ground I mean to occupy in making this charge. I am not so illiberal as to infer a corrupt motive in giving or receiving an office, during an exciting election, from the circumstance that the politics of the parties are the same, even when the person receiving the appointment is an active partisan. Officers must be appointed—the appointing power must be exercised; and when the persons appointed are honest and capable, I have never complained that they were selected from among political friends. But, sir, when appointments are made from among political opponents, who thereupon suddenly change their politics, and become political adherents, or when the new convert from his late principles receives an office at the hands of his new political associates, I maintain that this is the highest and most conclusive evidence of a corrupt understanding which the nature of such a transaction admits. I have said as much upon this point as I designed on the opening of the subject. I may recur to it again before I sit down.

[Here Mr. BELL, after speaking ten minutes, was interrupted by a call for the orders of the day.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1837.

I have said enough, I hope, to satisfy the House that I do not intend to raise an idle clamor, based upon vague unsupported charges or rumors. Supposing them for a moment to be true, is there a man who hears in who does not agree that the subject is of such magnitude, and the evils so alarming, as to demand immediate attention and redress?

But, before I proceed further, I wish to anticipate an objection as to the time at which I have thought proper to bring forward this measure. Many gentlemen, feeling the pressure of the great variety of business demanding the action of the House, and considering the short period within which the session must necessarily terminate, may desire that this subject should be postponed until another Congress. It is my opinion, sir, that there is no time so fit as the present. The new administration is not yet committed, in practice, to the support of the abuses complained of. These charges cannot, therefore, be construed into an attack upon it; and I take this occasion to say, that, for one, it is my intention to give to the new administration every support to which the members of it shall entitle themselves by the merit of their measures. I shall endeavor, as far as possible, to forget the very exceptional circumstances and influences which brought them into power, in order that my judgment may not be improperly biased. I am the more inclined to this course, because, for any thing I now see in the condition of parties, those who are now in power, will be likely to govern the country for a long time to come. At all events, the elements of opposition must undergo a considerable modification. There must be further decompositions—different combinations—new trials of political affinities—and a recasting of parts among the actors in the political drama, before there can be any just ground to hope for success in opposing the extraordinary and powerful political union which now controls the public administration.

I must, I think, Mr. Speaker, strike every observer, who is not blinded by interest or party rage, that some malignant temper has seized upon, and now deeply affects, our political system. At all former periods we had, it is true, great party excitement, much crimination and recrimination, between the respective parties; more or less violent denunciations, complaints of gross infractions of the Constitution, and other irregularities and abuses; and, undoubtedly, there have been irregularities and abuses under every administration; but, sir, it must be apparent to every one that there are some features in the character of the present times, some circumstances of excess or novelty developed in the practical operation of our peculiar form of government, which were unknown and unfelt at any former period. A new character is rapidly forming and attaching to our American institutions and birth has been given to new theories as to their ultimate destiny. I can only glance at those general results, as conclusions which present themselves upon a review of the actual state of things. It is an old maxim, or proposition, that power is never so absolute, or the danger that it will become perpetual so great, as when it is commenced and wielded in the name and by the authority of the people. The truth of this saying is confirmed by the experience of this country, at this time. It is demonstrated that the partition of power, established by the Constitution between several departments of the Government, and all other barriers interposed by that instrument, have not been sufficient to prevent the practical accumulation of all power in a single department. That a complete change has taken place in the action of the Government, within the last few years, is too manifest to require elaborate illustration. Take one striking evidence of the fact, which has struck me painfully, yet forcibly. I have been in this capital, from a distant residence, during the last nine or ten years; and during all that period, there have been subjects of more or less interest among the people, and which were to be settled and regulated at this seat of Government and power. For the first few years of my experience in passing over the country, the inquiry was, "What will Congress do?" when any subject of public and national interest or policy was spoken of. "What will the House of Representatives do? What will the Representatives of the people do?" But, sir, we hear these inquiries no longer. No one now asks, nor seems to care, what the chosen delegates of the people in Congress may feel or think upon any subject. The form of interrogation is changed. The question is, both from citizen and foreigner—"What will the President do? What will he say in his message? What will Andrew Jackson do? What will the People's President do? His will and purpose ascertained, it is understood that Congress will conform their action to it. This single fact in the history of this country will be sufficient to stamp the present as the period of transition from a popular representative Government to the Government of an elective Presidency—of a political chief. A revolution in the Government is, in some sense, complete. We have no longer a Government constituted of two or more separate departments—of an executive and of a legislative department. All power, in substance and effect, is concentrated in the hands of one department—in one head; and that head, I am sorry to say, is the head of a party.

The only example of the independent action of this House, upon any subject in which the President was pleased to manifest any decided interest, which has occurred within the last two years, was the passage of the deposit or distribution bill, at the last session. But, let all the circumstances under which that measure was sanctioned by this House be held in memory. Let it never be forgotten that it passed only by opposing patronage to patronage, money to money, and arraying corruption against corruption. The people and the States were brought to desire and demand a more equal division of the spoils—of that portion of the public moneys which, according to former practice, would have been employed in corrupting particular States or sections of the Union, and in attaching them to the party in power by appropriating it to various objects of local improvement. In no other way was it possible to have defeated the manifest determination of those in power, and all the entire accruing surplus in the Treasury to the enormous patronage already within their control. It was by them decreed that the expenditures should be raised to the standard of the existing revenue. But mark the instant change in their policy: the moment it was ascertained, by a test vote in this House, that the surplus was about to be rescued from their insatiate grasp, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. McKay) was upon his legs, proposing to reduce the revenue; and more patriots sprung up in one moment, in this House, than I had dreamed were to be found in the ranks of public men in the whole country.

The entire party now became satisfied that the revenue should be speedily reduced to the actual wants of the Government. The views of the President himself, it seems, underwent a great and sudden change. In his message to Congress at the last session, he thought the surplus might be well applied to the increase of the public defenses, and to various objects of national importance. Then he was of opinion that the famous compromise act, as it was called, was too sacred to be touched; that it involved too many interests, connected itself with too many delicate sympathies, to be disturbed for the mere purpose of getting clear of a surplus revenue for a few years. The extraordinary increase of the revenue from public lands in that year, he regarded only as an evidence of the increasing prosperity of the country, and practical proof of the beneficial and successful administration of public affairs, of which he was at the head. A surplus then had no terrors in it. But since the passage of the act for distributing it among the States, it would seem that nothing is so repulsive with horrible mischief, in the mind of the President or of the party, as a surplus in the Treasury! The famous compromise act no longer presents any obstacle to the reduction of the tariff; the extraordinary increase of the sales of the public lands is discovered to be the result of a diseased, instead of a healthy and prosperous action of the political system. It was worthy of note that the gentleman from New York (Mr. Cambreleng) suddenly discovered that corruption threatened the States by the distribution of the surplus, without seeming ever to have spent a thought about the corruptions which threatened the country from permitting the surplus to be expended, or rather prodigally squandered, by the General Government.

[Mr. BELL was interrupted by a call for the orders of the day, after having spoken fifteen minutes.]

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1837.

Mr. BELL, after noticing an article in the morning's Globe, which reflected upon him, spoke as follows:

Before I resume my remarks, Mr. Speaker, upon the subject of my motion, I beg leave to do an act of justice to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. McKay,) to whom I alluded when I addressed the House the other day. That gentleman has, I know, always been an advocate for a reduction of the revenue; and when I described him as having presented his resolution immediately after it became manifest that the surplus would be distributed, at the last session, I referred to him merely as the organ of the party in that step. I presumed that he was glad to avail himself of the change of sentiment which had recently manifested itself among his political associates in the House in carrying out his own long cherished policy.

When I was interrupted by the call for the orders of the day, when last up, I was digressing from the point which I had intended to establish, which was, that all actual power was now concentrated in the hands of the Executive; and I refer to the general acquiescence of this House in the will of the President as evidence of the truth of my proposition; but the condition of the Senate will illustrate my position more clearly. According to all the early expounders of the Constitution, the Senate was constituted upon the principle of long terms, and a select constituency, the State Legislatures, for the purpose of giving greater stability and uniformity to the action of the Government. It was intended as a counterpoise to the Representatives of the people in this House, who were supposed to be more under the influence of popular impulses. I beg leave to quote a sentence or two from a celebrated volume, upon the subject of the peculiar structure of the Senate:

"As the cool and deliberate sense of the community ought, in all Governments, and actually will, in all free Governments, ultimately prevail over the views of its rulers, so there are particular moments in public affairs when the people, stimulated by some irregular passion, or some illicit advantage, or misled by the artful misrepresentations of interested men, may call for measures which they themselves will afterwards be most ready to lament and condemn. In these critical moments, how salutary will be the interference of some temperate and respectable body of citizens, in order to check the misguided career, and to suspend the blow meditated by the people against themselves, until reason, justice, and truth can regain the authority over the public mind."

These are the sentiments of James Madison. Now, sir, we know that the Senate is reduced to a state of absolute submission; given over to the guidance of every popular gale, blown up by the artifices of an unprincipled and reckless class of men as ever made their appearance in any age or country. If the sea of public sentiment, thrown into commotion by the puffings of that great political bellows, the Globe, shall happen to set in half a dozen different directions in the same fortnight, the unhappy Senate must tack and change its course as often, or be denounced as contumacious, and opposed to the voice of the people. In truth, the Senate described by Madison is no more. It is the most supple and compliant body of the two, not only as regards the sudden impulses of popular feeling, but also the mandates of power.

But further, as to the Senate. The members of that body were designed by the authors of the Constitution to be the advisers and counsellors of the President in the exercise of the appointing power. It is remarkable that it was the early opinion of both Mr. Jefferson and Colonel Hamilton, the leaders of the two extremes in politics, that the concurrence of the Senate was necessary before the President could remove a public officer; but I do not mean to press this point, nor do I wish to disturb the settled doctrine in relation to it. It is certain that the Senate was designed by the Constitution to be taken into the council of the President in making treaties, as well as in making the most important appointments, when it prescribed, as a condition to the validity of all treaties and appointments, "the advice and consent of the Senate." But, sir, while the power of the veto, vested in the President over the proceedings of Congress, flourishes in excess, what has become of a similar power in the Senate over the treaties and appointments of the President? Abrogated, rescinded, expunged, practically, from the Constitution, and trampled under foot. If any Senator shall dare to oppose any important nomination of the President, or to question the propriety of a treaty, he is denounced as the tool of a faction; or, if he belongs to the dominant party, his conduct is instantly branded as an act of infidelity to the party! Then, sir, I repeat that the Senate no longer exercises its most important constitutional functions; and that the design of its peculiar structure is defeated. It is also manifest that a revolution has taken place in the practical operation of the Government.

But there are other symptoms, indicating a highly diseased state of the body politic. The charges upon the people—the permanent annual expenditures of the Government—have been increased ten millions, or nearly a hundred per cent, during the present administration, and chiefly within the last two years! And, after careful examination, I am able to state further, that this estimate of the astonishing increase of the public burdens is exclusive of the increased amount of pensions granted under the present administration, and of the large sums paid in extinguishing the Indian title to the public lands! The entire charge upon the people for support of the Government of their choice, in all the various departments of the public service, did not exceed twelve millions and a half, exclusive of the public debt, when the present Chief Magistrate assumed the management of public affairs. The present annual charge upon the people, for the same objects, and which appear to be permanent, exceeds twenty-three millions! What do you say, sir, to an increase of ten millions in eight years, and this under an administration which ousted the preceding one upon a charge of profligacy and extravagance, and came in pledged to retrenchment and reform? But, what is still more surprising is, that none of the great establishments for the public defence have received any considerable augmentation in the mean time. Notwithstanding the liberal annual appropriations for the increase and support of the Navy, that branch of the public defence was, last year, notoriously in a most disgraceful state of dilapidation; and what is still more surprising, although we have confessedly a military President, yet at no period since the foundation of the Government, was the Army in a more deplorable condition, nor our military operations more discreditable to the country! I affirm that the military service of the country is, at this moment, in the last stage of disorder and imbecility. Our officers, of the highest merit, are discontented and dispirited; our highest military talents discredited by defective organization, and the want of due attention and co-operation on the part of the Executive Government. Three Major Generals have had their "Northern laurels converted into Southern willows" in the course of little more than twelve months, and the spectacle has been exhibited of a handful of savages setting at defiance the arms and resources of this great confederated Republic for years! Yet, all that devoted and gallant men could do, unsupported by the Government, has been done by the subordinate officers and soldiers, both regulars and volunteers. These Indian wars, which will have cost the Government fifteen millions before they are concluded, it is now sufficiently manifest, had their origin in the gross misconduct of our agents, the frauds of our own citizens upon the Indians, and the culpable neglect, if not connivance, of the Government; wars which have entailed disgrace upon our arms, and a stain upon our national character! Let us hear no more of the moneys extorted, by the energy and address of the President, from foreign powers, when, for every million thus restored to the pockets of our merchants, the people are taxed two millions, by reason of the gross neglect of our domestic affairs.

It is to be noticed the deranged condition of the currency and of exchange, because that is a subject which must, for a long time, be judged of by prejudice. But I cannot pass over, in this enumeration of the actual state of the country, the condition of the public press. The great source of light and knowledge has been corrupted by the patronage which has been lavished upon it by this House and by the Executive Government. The most important instrument employed in the moral improvement of society has been polluted and broken up. No one knows what to believe or disbelieve, unless he shall have the evidence of personal knowledge and confidence. I, of course, do not mean that there are no exceptions among the public journals, which come under this description. A morbid appetite has been created, and fostered chiefly by the example of the official organ, (the Globe), for violent denunciation, invective, and calumny; and party excitement and prejudices have risen to such excess, that the mass of the followers of the leaders on either side are prone to rush into the most ruinous extremes to gratify their own, or their leaders' passions or interest, heedless of truth, recklessness of justice, and often, no doubt, unconscious of the injury which they inflict upon the country. When the most important branches of the public service have thus been neglected, and suffered to fall into disorder; when our arms are disgraced, the national justice compromised, our expenditures doubled, and our free Government changed in its practical operation; what great boon has the administration, under which all these things have come to pass, bestowed upon the country by way of recompense? It has been able to propagate itself! This, the chief end of its existence, and the only single object kept in view from the beginning to the end of it, has been accomplished! A man has been elevated to the Presidency who could, and did boast, before the American people and the whole world, that he accounted it glory enough for him to have served under such a chief as General Jackson! And our boasted institutions have so soon developed such a result! The profound observer of the causes of human events will seek no other evidence, require no better proof than this simple fact to convince him that the sun of American liberty is suffering an eclipse!

Is there nothing in this extraordinary catalogue—this enumeration of alarming results in the action of our cherished political system, to awaken inquiry or excite the inquiries of the patriotic citizen? But I have omitted to notice the most striking anomaly—the greatest phenomenon of the times. After all that I have said of the deranged and distempered condition of public affairs, I am still obliged to confess that the administration which is justly responsible for every evil of the times, is popular! But it must be borne in mind that there are various kinds of popularity. It may be with administrations as it sometimes happens to individuals, that the glare of a single splendid achievement has been sufficient to cover over, as with a mantle, the errors and irregularities of a whole life, and still leave the fortunate actor in good odor with the public. Popularity, in general, follows success in all daring enterprises, and often when they are unlawful. It follows that popularity is not always the best test of merit or general propriety; it is sometimes artificial, factitious, and more seeming than real. When real, it is often the homage of the profligate and interested who are bought, or of the credulous and ignorant who are deluded. Then, whether popularity attaches to individuals or administrations, it does not always augur well for a republic. Without undertaking to decide upon which of these bases the popularity of this administration stands, I refer to the fact that it is popular, merely as a further proof of the novel and alarming developments of our favorite system of government.

Now, sir, I proceed to notice the general nature and character of the malady which is attended with so many bad symptoms. Whence the action of our chosen form of Government, in so many essential branches of it, so contrary to all that was hoped and predicted of its results by its immortal founders? I will endeavor to expound to you. In the first place, the patronage of the Government, we shall find, upon inquiry, to have been extended immeasurably beyond any thing anticipated, or even conjectured, by the framers of the Constitution. I had occasion to refer to the historical fact, in addressing the House upon another subject, at a former session, that the entire patronage of the Post Office Department was wholly unnoticed and disregarded in the estimate of the amount of patronage about to be conferred upon the Federal Government by the adoption of the Constitution in its present form. This single branch of patronage, unforeseen and unprovided against by the illustrious authors of the Constitution, is now perhaps greater in influence than all the other branches put together. So erring and short-sighted are the wisest of mortals! In the second place, the weight and influence of this extended amount of patronage in the hands of the Executive, as an engine of power, has been increased one hundred fold of late, by the unconstitutional abuse of it, as I will presently demonstrate. All former calculations of the probable amount and influence of patronage in our scheme of Government are thus baffled and set at defiance. Some degree of influence, through the use of patronage, may be admissible in the Executive, in order to secure proper talents and respect for the office of President, and to insure a due co-operation from the other departments of the Government; but the basis of this influence has recently been enlarged to an extent which must, in the end, if not narrowed down, terminate in the entire destruction and overthrow of our system. A great misfortune is, that every other evil necessarily incident to a free Government is increased in an equal ratio. The same increase and abuse of patronage which have concentrated all power in the hands of the Executive, has imparted a new stimulus, and consequently given increased fury to party feeling and party contests. The competition for honors and offices, always a prolific source of party divisions in a free Government, has, by the multiplication of vacancies, and the tenure of party service by which offices are held, become so fierce as to threaten the peace and security—much more, the comfort and happiness, of society. From the same cause has also sprung the polluted and prostituted condition of the public press, and every other corruption of the times. The abuse of patronage is the Pandora's box of our system; it is the original sin of our political condition, to which every other sin of the times may be fairly ascribed.

It is idle, Mr. Speaker, it is in vain to point out, from year to year, in this Hall, as has been done, the existence of the grossest irregularities and abuses in every branch of the public service. It is in vain that these abuses and corruptions shall be stripped of their disguises, and portrayed to the country in all the disgusting deformity with which a rich imagination, and an eloquence not often surpassed in this or any other country, can invest them. It is in vain that we institute investigations; resolve upon rectification and reform; that we enact laws to multiply checks, and increase the accountability of public officers. It will be only cutting off the heads of the Hydra, which will be eternally reproduced, until we shall have the courage to attack and destroy the monster itself. All, all, sir, will be vain, while we suffer the original source of the evil to remain undisturbed. I repeat that it is labor thrown away; it is time and talent exhausted in fruitless efforts, to pursue with research, however relentless and penetrating, the authors of corruption, of fraud and peculation, in the public offices, while the prolific parent of all is permitted to survive. When was more time, a greater proportion of business talent, more patient investigation, bestowed upon such subjects than at the close of the late administration? When was the public mind better prepared, not only to sustain and carry out, but, as it appeared to me at the time, to compel the execution of the plan of reform then pointed out, and announced to the country? But, sir, such was the charm of a new administration, so powerful was the effect of the siren whispers of Executive power, that the commotion which had so recently threatened to unhinge society itself was suddenly hushed into a dead calm; and it has so turned out, that all the vices of the late administration, which gave rise to so much excitement, would not constitute a tinge of those, of the same nature, and others even of a more wicked and mischievous character, which exist at the present moment. As a most conclusive proof that we do not set about reform at the right point, or in the right way, I refer to the enormous mass of abuses which were lately laid bare in the Post Office Department. These abuses were accumulating for years; they were repeatedly charged to exist; but inquiry was evaded from year to year, until, like the smothered flames of a pent up and consuming fire, they burst forth at once into light, too gross to be any longer concealed from the public eye. Well, sir, do we find the progress of abuses and corruption in the other departments of the public service checked by that disclosure? Not at all. Is the Post Office itself free from abuses? I answer, it is not. The administration, which winked at the abuses of the Post Office Department for so many years, instead of suffering any disparagement in public estimation on that account, acquired new laurels and increased popularity from its ready condescension in taking upon itself the re-organization of the department, and the reform of abuses, the moment they could no longer conceal their existence from the public. I beg leave, in connection with this subject, to notice some portion of the remarks made in this House, not long since, by a gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Hamer.) That gentleman took upon himself, rather hazily, I think, to say that the charge of abuses in the administration was unfounded; and he said he knew about as much, in relation to the subject, as those who made the charges. That gentleman should remember that such was the unvarying response, session after session, in regard to the abuses in the Post Office Department. At the same time a gentleman, distinguished for his skill as a criminal lawyer, was placed at the head of the Committee on the Post Office in the Senate, and was heard to boast of his service to the administration in shielding the department from the attacks of a powerful opposition! The denial of the gentleman (Mr. Hamer) is about as much to be relied upon now, as were those made three years ago. But, sir, I am digressing from my subject. I was endeavoring to show that the only true and effective reform will be, to curb the abuse of patronage. Sir, if we should this day reduce the patronage of the Government one-half, and suffer the remaining half to be administered upon the principles practised upon of late, it would still be sufficient in amount to taint the whole country; to make the business of politics a traffic in corruption, and drive every man of spirit and principle from the public service.

I come now, sir, to notice and identify the specific vices in the action of the Government, which I regard as the cause and source of all the public abuses of which we complain. I have given a summary of them in the preamble to the bill under consideration.

The first clause of that preamble assumes that the practice of removal from office, for opinion's sake, has prevailed under the present administration. Can there be a question as to the fact? I know there is no gentleman upon this floor, who represents any of the Northern or Eastern States, who will be bold enough to deny the charge. In the South and Southwest, I admit, public sentiment has restrained the course of the administration and but few instances are to be found in these Sections; but still, even there public officers have been taught that they indulge their independent sentiments at the hazard of their places. I have heard it stated, and I believe it to be true, that upwards of one thousand removals have been made since General Jackson came into office; and that, in almost every case, the only reason which could with truth or plausibility be assigned for them was their politics. If we examine into the effect of this system of punishment, we shall find that a few removals, judiciously distributed over the Union, would have all the effect, in general, of a much greater number. Acting upon this principle to some extent, the whole army of officials was decimated at the commencement of this administration. Sir, under the direction of a skilful tactician, ten removals would be sufficient to keep ten thousand office-holders in obedience. But, notwithstanding the general notoriety of this practice in some sections of the Union, there are districts in the South and Southwest in which its existence is denied. I do not mean to trouble the House with proofs, in detail, at present. I will content myself with affirming that this practice has been pursued in some sections of the Union to a most shameful extent. I have myself heard gentlemen of influence and standing in the party, from every quarter of the country, avow and vindicate the propriety of such a practice. I confess I never heard any man defend a proposition so monstrous to my mind, who, in my opinion, had ever troubled himself to inquire what was either right or wrong, in the practice; or who cared whether it could be defended upon principle or not; they were what are called good party men, and we know, sir, fears neither God nor his own conscience; provided his party approve his conduct. I am able, sir, to make this further statement upon this subject, that I have heard gentlemen of distinction, as party leaders, maintain the doctrine that by no other device or invention can a party be kept together; that is to say, that bribery and corruption are the only lasting cements of party! It is not only the party in power which practises upon this odious policy. I am sorry to say that the opposition is not entirely free from this sin. In several of the States, as I am informed, where they have chanced at any time to succeed in the State elections, the practice has been to sweep the public offices of every incumbent, from the highest to the lowest—even a petty receiver of tolls, or a lock keeper upon a canal, cannot escape their prescriptive vengeance. Such a practice I consider a disgrace to any Government, but more especially to a free Government like our own. Nor do I believe that any Government can continue free under its operation. All party divisions must soon come to be founded upon the desire, and a calculation of the chances of office among politicians; all elections must come to be a mere contest for the offices and employments of State; and there can be but one end to such a system; first, general corruption, and, finally, violence and disorganization. I can neither sympathize with, nor wish success to, one party more than another, whether the contest be for power in the State or in the Federal Government, when both are, in my judgment, alike mercenary, corrupt, and unprincipled. Sir, when I think of the effect of this precedent, or rather what must be the effect of this practice of removal for opinion's sake, when it shall once be fully established and acquiesced in, I am utterly amazed that any public man who countenances such a practice should escape the open expression of public indignation, instead of receiving the applause and support of the people. What is the inevitable tendency of this practice? To corrupt—to reduce to the condition of mere creatures of Executive will, every man who fills any office or holds any employment under Government; to compel them, whatever may be their own sentiments, or whatever they may think of the conduct of our administration, to support its measures, right or wrong, or be driven from their places. Since the precedent has been established of a Government candidate for the Presidency, they must support him also under a like penalty. It is proper, upon a question of this magnitude to have clear ideas. I have said that this system tends to corrupt the public officers. What is corruption? Whenever any public officer or other citizen is induced, either by the hope of office or promotion, or the fear of losing an office or employment already in his possession, to give his influence or vote in favor of any man's election, contrary to his private unbiased judgment, it is a case of corruption.

In the preamble to the bill which I have submitted for the action of this House, the practice of removal from office upon political grounds is denounced as a violation of the freedom of elections. It is so. Every improper or undue influence, or, in other words, every interest or temptation, brought to bear upon the mind of a qualified elector, in Great Britain, to induce him to vote for men or measures contrary to the suggestions of his free and unbiased judgment, has ever been declared by the laws, and denounced by every commentator upon the British constitution, as a violation of the freedom of elections. Elections cannot be free where the voters or electors are either bribed by actual gifts or the promise of office, on the one hand, or intimidated by the fear of the loss of office, and often the means of subsisting their families, to support any particular candidate for the Presidency or Vice Presidency. The elective franchise, or the right of the people to choose their own legislative or executive functionaries, so far from being an adequate security for the protection of the great objects for which government was established, if it may be made dependent upon, and subservient to the will of any man, or any set of men, will be no security at all. It will be a mere mockery—an imposition upon the people. It will only afford an opportunity to the ambitious and unprincipled to possess themselves of unlawful power, through the medium of the ordinary constitutional forms. By the theory of the Constitution, all elections are to be determined by the will or choice of a majority of qualified electors in the several States; and this is the means provided for securing a good administration and preventing a bad one—for putting good men into office and power, and keeping out bad ones. But here are one hundred thousand voters or electors, who come to the polls, and declare that their own will and choice, but the will of those who gave them their employments, and who hold the power of dispossessing them. Power over a man's support, and the subsistence of his family, is, in general, power over his will. I am not left free to vote as I please, in elections, when I am made to understand that my office or employment which gives me bread, or supplies my family with the comforts of life, will be taken from me if I do not vote for a particular candidate; and the election is not free, in which one hundred thousand such votes are given. If it be said that there are not so many office-holders, I answer that all who are employed on the public works of any kind, and all who are engaged in furnishing supplies, or in any manner dependent upon the Government, may be fairly included in the number. Let it not be said that the number is at last insignificant. The power of the office-holders is immense, if we estimate their votes at one hundred thousand only. We have seen, by the result of the recent election, that the individual votes of the dependents upon the Government were sufficient to decide the vote of several of the States. But this is a very fallacious view to take of the powers of the official corps in elections, as I will presently show.

But it was further declared in the preamble to the bill which I have had the honor to submit, that the practice of removals from office for opinion's sake is an attack upon the public liberty. It is so. Whoever weakens or destroys any of the great and fundamental securities of the public liberty, attacks liberty itself. The elective franchise is undoubtedly the foundation stone of liberty in this country; and he who seeks to corrupt it is a foe to that liberty which it was intended to secure, and which cannot survive the loss of its purity and independence. Every public officer, who avows and practises upon this policy, is, in practice, a foe to the liberties of his country.

This practice is also denounced in the preamble as a high misdemeanor in any public officer who is guilty of it. After what I have already said, I believe I need not occupy the time of the House in establishing this point. Any public officer who violates the freedom of elections, is guilty of a high misdemeanor. Any officer who attacks the public liberty by the corruption of any of its guards, is surely guilty of a high misdemeanor. But I will establish this proposition by an authority higher than mine, or any other living authority, however great and venerable. When the question was raised in 1789, whether the President possessed the power of removal under the Constitution, without the consent of the Senate, Mr. Madison maintained the affirmative of the proposition; and in answer to the objection that such a power would enable the President to exercise a dangerous control over the public officers, and cause them to become the creatures of his will, Mr. Madison contended, in an able argument, that no such danger was to be apprehended, for the reason "that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust." To displace a worthy man from office, Mr. Madison was of opinion would be an act of mal-administration, and consequently subject the President to an impeachment. The sentiments of Mr. Jefferson, in reply to an application from his republican fellow citizens of Wilmington, to remove an officer of the customs, against whom no charge of official delinquency could be made out, was worthy of his high character and known devotion to the principles of civil liberty.

"We have," said that illustrious man, "no passions or interests different from those of our fellow-citizens. We have the same object, the success of representative government. Nor are we acting for ourselves alone, but for the whole human race. The event of our experiment is to show whether man can be trusted with self-government. The eyes of suffering humanity are fixed on us with anxiety, as their only hope; and on such a theatre; and for such a cause, we must suppress all smaller passions and local considerations. The leaders of federalism say that man cannot be trusted with his own government. We must do no act which will replace them in the direction of the experiment. We must not, by any departure from principle, dishearten the mass of our fellow-citizens who have confided to us this interesting cause."

If, sir, we are disposed to be guided by the authority of the great founder of our system, we have it here presented in the most authentic form.

The second clause of the preamble to the bill declares that the interference of public officers in elections is a gross abuse. I have already remarked that it was a very fallacious view to take of this subject, to say that one hundred thousand votes was the extent of the power of the office-holders, and other dependents of the Government, in elections. The doctrine now is, that it is the duty of the office-holders, not only to vote in elections in favor of the administration candidates, but to support them with all their influence and all their energy. Such is the necessary result of the doctrine that office-holders are bound by gratitude, or any other obligation, to conform to the wishes of the appointing power in elections. The suspicions and misrepresentations that office-holders are exposed to in an excited canvass for the Presidency, and the eagerness with which hungry office-seekers, and other informers, with whom the country is filled under this system, are looking out for some delinquent to denounce to the Government, will compel them, for their own safety and protection, to take an active part in elections, and to become officious and open in their interference. Another powerful incentive to such interference will always be found under an administration which fills the public offices chiefly with men whose principal merit has been their zeal and activity in past elections. In nine cases out of ten, honest and competent public servants were removed, to make way for these new incumbents, and the latter are under the most powerful inducements to make a desperate struggle to uphold the administration or party that put them in office. Hence the desperate, the death-struggle of the office-holders in the late election, wherever the contest was doubtful; and it is due to their exertions to say that they saved the election of Mr. Van Buren.

As to the fact of the interference of public officers in the late elections, openly and directly, is there any one here who will deny it? Is there one member in this house who will deny that this interference was general? If there is such a member present, I call upon him to stand up in his place, and make the denial. Sir, I go further, and I put the question whether the whole machinery of party, so far as it was composed of caucuses, conventions, and committees, employed in the late election, was not moved and guided by office holders and applicants for office? I do not say that a majority of the delegates in these conventions were office holders or office seekers, but I do mean to say that the exciting spirit, the soul of them, consisted of that class. But, for fear that I may be thought to exaggerate, I must ask leave to refer to a few facts. At the convention which assembled at Columbus, Ohio, on the 8th of January, 1834, to nominate delegates to the Baltimore Convention, which sat in 1835, there were thirteen postmasters, three registrars and receivers, two light-house keepers, two superintendents of the National road, one collector of customs, one inspector, one bearer of foreign despatches, a commissioner under the treaty with Naples, and four printers of the laws of the United States, besides numerous officers under the State authority; and we have the authority of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Hamer) for saying that they make common cause with the Federal officers, wherever they belong to the same party. In the State convention of New York, which sat at Albany, to appoint delegates to the Baltimore Convention, there were eighteen postmasters, thirteen judges of courts, seven masters in chancery, three sheriffs, two surrogates, and a State comptroller. Among the delegates appointed to the Baltimore convention there were seven postmasters, a collector of customs, and a superintendent of the custom-house in New York. I give these details as a specimen of the voluminous evidence which might be adduced of the same nature. It would present a singular result if a statement were made of all the office holders and office seekers who attended the Baltimore convention; and the interest of the statement would be increased if it should include an account of all those delegates who have since received appointments. But I have been informed of a mode of interfering in elections by office holders, which far outstrips all that I had imagined could exist at this day under our free Government. It is alleged that the office holders, in some sections of the Union, and especially in the State of New York, are in the habit of contributing a portion or a percentage of their salaries—that, in other words, they are regularly taxed for the support of the candidate of the party in power. If this be true, it is proof of the progress of corruption in our political system, that should carry alarm into the bosom of every patriot in the land. What, sir! and can the money exacted from the people for the support of Government, be converted by their own agents, with impunity, into a fund for their own corruption? If I am mistaken as to the fact of the existence of such a practice, I hope some gentleman will correct me.

But I now proceed to notice the interference of office-holders of a higher grade. I will first call the attention of the House to the letter of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kendall) to a committee of gentlemen in Philadelphia, written on the 23d of October last (1836).

"Did public duties permit an acceptance of your kind invitation," says Mr. Kendall, "no occasion has presented itself since the late war with Great Britain on which it could have given me more gratification in festivity, gratulation, and triumph. A direct attempt has been made to govern your State by corruption, and it has been rebuked and repelled in a spirit worthy of '76. It is not a triumph of one man over another: it is a victory of principles over profligacy—the triumph of a virtuous people over concentrated wealth, mercenary talent, and licensed corruption."

When it is recollected that this letter was written by a member of the Executive Cabinet in reference to the result of a State election, which was expected, and no doubt did produce a decided effect upon the Presidential election, which ensued during the next month, a more audacious and unwarranted act of interference cannot be readily conceived of. I hope I shall be excused the digression, while I remind the House of the statements made by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Hamer) the other day upon the subject of the abusive epithets, the gross charges of corruption, and violent denunciations, which he said members of the opposition were in the habit of dealing out upon this floor against the President and the party in the majority in this House. That gentleman said that it had been too much the habit of the friends of the administration to sit silent and make no reply to such tirades of abuse as were constantly pronounced against it. I am not one of those who are in the habit of employing abusive epithets either against the administration or the majority of this House, in debate; but I might appeal to the gentleman from Ohio, if those who take that liberty, might not find some countenance in the language employed by the Postmaster General in the letter to which I have referred. In what speech delivered upon this floor did he ever hear stronger language, or more abusive epithets, applied to the motives and principles of a party, than those deliberately penned and given to the people by a cabinet officer of the Government? But I would further inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, whether he and his friends, during all the period of their silence and forbearance under those violent and abusive denunciations of which he complains, did not steadily look to the Globe to answer all the arguments as well as the denunciations of opposition members; and whether it was not found much the most convenient as well as effective mode of reply? Does not that gentleman know that the columns of that paper, during the past session, as well as the present, have been devoted to the perversion and misrepresentation of every thing that is said, as well as done, by the opposition in this House—that its daily sheet is a daily libel upon the motives and character of every man who dares to arraign the course of the party, or of its favorite leaders? Well may the gentleman of the administration be silent, when they have such a pensioned engine of falsehood and calumny in their daily service.

I now come, sir, to speak of the interference, in the late election of another high functionary of the Government. It is no less a personage than the President himself. The President exhibited himself a devoted partisan of Mr. Van Buren in an early period of the canvass. The proof of his interference I consider so notorious that, but for the singular and unexpected assertions which I have lately heard upon the subject, I would not think necessary to notice it. Those, sir, upon which I shall rely in establishing the first act of his interference, are not dependent for their validity upon the uncertain memory of any man, nor can they be weakened or evaded by the denial or misrepresentation of any man's friends. But I think proper, at this time, to state that, if the subject shall be regarded as of sufficient importance by the House to appoint a committee with the proper power, all the statements of my colleague (Mr. Peyton) in relation to the language and denunciations of the President, while in Tennessee, last summer, without exception, so far, I believe, can be established by the evidence of gentlemen of the most unquestionable character. I feel warranted in making the same statement in relation to the charge made by a Senator from Tennessee (Judge White) in a speech at Knoxville. The first overt act of the President, in which he gave evidence of his interference in the late Presidential election, was to dictate the Baltimore Convention, and to give the sanction of his name and station to a party movement, intended, from the first, for the benefit of Mr. Van Buren. In his celebrated Gwynn letter, he says:

"Discarding all personal preference, I consider the true policy of the friends of republican principles is to send delegates, fresh from the people, to a general convention, for the purpose of selecting candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency; and that to impeach that selection before it is made, as an emanation of Executive power, is to assail the virtue of the people, and, in effect, to oppose their right to govern."

Here, sir, we have a denunciation, in advance, of every man who should dare to oppose the nomination of the Baltimore Convention. I have heard it said that this letter was written in answer to a charge of preference for Judge White. There never was any thing more untrue.

In fact, this letter was foretold, and some of the friends of Judge White were admonished that the President would take a decided and open part in the election of Mr. Van Buren before Judge White was generally regarded as a candidate. In a letter to a committee of gentlemen in Bedford county, Tennessee, while the President was on his late electioneering tour, he uses the following language:

"We live, fellow-citizens, in evil times, when political apostasy becomes frequent; when public men abandon principles, their former party attachments and associations, and, for selfish ends and personal aggrandizement, are attempting to undermine our republican system."

Here is a direct attack upon the motives of the supporters of Judge White in Tennessee—a direct charge that they were attempting to undermine our republican system. That there may be no mistake as to the intention of the President to excite the people of Tennessee against the supporters of Judge White, as the enemies of republican government, is manifest from a paragraph which appeared in the Union, the organ of the Van Buren party in Tennessee, in which the editor, referring to the President's letter to the Bedford committee, says:

"The President's views of the existing state of political affairs in Tennessee are here clearly and distinctly indicated, and are so just and strictly conformable to truth that he who runs may read."

I might refer to the sentiment delivered by the President, at the same period, to a large assembly of his fellow-citizens who had honored him with a public dinner at Nashville; and to numerous letters besides, which were industriously circulated, all containing evidence of the deep interest and the open zeal which he manifested in the late election. I might refer particularly to a letter written to the late Willie B'out, which denounced the course of Judge White, and his leading friends in Tennessee, in the strongest terms; and which I am informed a member of this House (Mr. Johnson of Tennessee) was in the habit of reading at public meetings, in his own canvass before the people for a seat in Congress. A letter to the late B. F. Curry was of a similar character; but I have already devoted more time to this point than I intended. The act of the President's interference is indisputable; it was also notorious; and the knowledge of this preference had a decided effect in favor of Mr. Van Buren. It is true, sir, there were some minds upon which the course of the President had a contrary effect; but they were too few to control the result. The open and decided stand taken by the President was a signal for the interference of all office-holders and office-seekers throughout the Union; and from that moment Mr. Van Buren became, emphatically and truly, the Government candidate, and of course had the full benefit of the patronage of the Government in strengthening his interests.

But, as might have been expected, when the highest officer of the Government stepped aside from the line of his official duties to become the electioneering partisan of a favorite candidate for the Presidency, it was almost impossible that any appointment could be made of a public officer, without exciting some distrust that it was intended to advance the interest of the Government candidate. I consider this state of things a great calamity of itself—that the Chief Magistrate should place himself in a position which afforded no escape from the imputation of improper motives, in administering the patronage of the Government; and, what is equally to be regretted, it was at the same time next to an impossibility that he could administer it without reference to the interests of his own candidate. And accordingly it will be found that various offices and employments have been conferred under such circumstances that it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that they were given and received with improper motives.

Whether the President was privy to the object of all these appointments, or whether they were in all instances bestowed through the agency of some political office-broker, I know not; but the effect is the same upon the public interest and the public virtue. However this may be, it accidentally came to my knowledge that Government favors of some kind were distinctly offered in a letter from a person in the confidence of the President, and franked by him, to a gentleman in my own congressional district, upon the condition that he would take a more active part in the election against Judge White and one of his leading friends. I have seen the open partisan of one candidate become the supporter of another, and that other the Government candidate, and employment under Government following in the rear of conversion. I have seen the representative seduced from his constituents, and made to act in opposition to their wishes and his own professed principles, by artful suggestions of future rewards. I have seen gentlemen of distinction and high standing change their politics, and violate their personal honor, upon the promise of Executive support and influence in accomplishing their plans of individual promotion. I have seen the corrupt apostate from his former principles and professions, too weak to resist the promise of office, but lacking courage to pocket the well-earned reward, when offered to his acceptance. When, sir, the practice of official interference has arrived at this height; when rewards are openly bestowed for open apostasy and treachery to party engagements; when corruption walks abroad through the land in her own nakedness, without a veil or a mantle to cover her native deformity; when neither regard for principle nor the honor of the country can restrain such practices, so far, at least, as to preserve the semblance of purity; when disguises are rejected as unnecessary; is it not time to sound the alarm to the sleeping sentinels, and call every patriot to his post?

Let us pause here for a moment, and inquire how this subject of the interference of public officers in elections has been regarded and provided against, in the only country in which the principles of free government are correctly understood and appreciated besides our own. I mean Great Britain. Ever since the Revolution of 1688, when the English Government assumed something like a regular plan of civil liberty, the people of England have been extremely jealous of the interference of public officers in elections. The slightest interference on their part, in the election of members of Parliament, has always been promptly met, complained of, and redressed as a grievance, and a violation of the freedom of election. As early as the 5th William and Mary, (1694,) an act of Parliament was passed, which, after reciting that elections of members of Parliament "ought to be free and uncorrupt," prohibited all excise officers from endeavoring, "by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever," to persuade any elector to give or to withhold his vote in the election of any member of Parliament, under penalty of one hundred pounds, and disqualification to hold any office or place of trust ever afterwards. The act of 12 and 13 William III, (1706) contained a similar prohibition, and prescribed the same penalties, against the interference of all custom-house officers in elections. By the act of 10 Anne, c. 19, several new excise duties were laid; and so tenacious was Parliament upon the subject of the influence and interference of public officers in elections, that, by a separate section of the act, all the new officers created by it were prohibited from intermeddling under the same penalties provided by former acts. But when, towards the middle of the reign of George III, it was found that the public officers and other persons in the employment of the Government, by their own numerical force, in some counties and boroughs, were often able to carry the election of the court candidates; and that the influence of the Crown over them was so great that they generally voted in mass for the Government candidates, the Whigs of England—the true old English Whigs—made a bold rally of their strength in Parliament, and by one act (22 George III, 41, 1782,) disfranchised every officer employed in the customs, in the collection and management of the excise duties, and in the post office—forty thousand in number. A glorious triumph for Englishmen and English liberty! This act, which stands a glorious monument of the spirit of Englishmen, is entitled "an act for the better securing the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament." It was at this period that the celebrated Mr. Dunning introduced and carried the resolution in Parliament, that "the influence of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished." The first measure which followed was to deprive forty thousand office holders of their right to vote in elections! The subservience of Parliament to the will of the Crown had been too gross and palpable to be longer endured. The ministry had carried every measure by a dead, inviolable majority, just as we have of late seen measures carried through the Congress of the United States. This great measure of reform was justified and sustained by the English people, under the firm conviction that their proudest possessions in the new world—the "imperial crown of America"—had been wrested from their King by the blunders of an incompetent ministry, supported by a corrupt Parliament. But the remedy came too late to prevent the catastrophe. It would be a singular incident in the vicissitude of human affairs, if the liberties of America should be lost by the same errors which afforded the opportunity for their existence.

I must now, sir, go a little back in the order of time, to speak of the course of the English Parliament, and how the spirit of Englishmen has always treated the interference of any of the high grade officers of State in elections. The first case of the kind which I have been able to find on record occurred in the reign of Queen Anne. A bishop of Worcester, who filled at the same time the office of almoner to the Queen, having some ground of resentment against Sir J. Parkington, a candidate for Parliament, in the county of Worcester, wrote to several of his friends soliciting them to oppose his election. His influence was unavailing, and one of the first acts of the member elected, after taking his seat in the House of Commons, was to complain of the violation of the privileges of Parliament, and the freedom of elections, by the bishop and almoner to the Queen. The House of Commons, upon hearing the proof, which was the production of some of the bishop's letters, instantly voted his conduct to be a violation of the liberties of the people of England; and, at the same time, voted that an address should be carried to the Queen, requesting her to dismiss the bishop from the office he held under her Majesty. The address was presented to the Queen, and she sent a gracious answer to the House of Commons, informing them that she had complied with their desire. The next example of the manner in which this abuse has been treated in Great Britain occurred in 1779, when the power and influence of the ministers of that day were at the highest, and the condition of Parliament was consequently low indeed. A lord lieutenant of a county, an officer appointed by the Crown, was detected in writing to his friends in the county of Southampton, urging them to give their support to his friend, who was also the Government candidate for Parliament. When his conduct was brought before the House of Commons, and some of the letters which he had written exhibited, Lord North ventured to say that he thought the case presented no great cause of alarm, and instantly, and it would appear, from all sides of the House, there arose such indignant clamors that it was some time before order could be restored, and Lord North was obliged to explain and qualify his meaning. But the most decisive proof of the spirit which prevailed upon the subject, even in corrupt times, and the odium in which all intermeddling of office-holders in elections has ever been held in Great Britain, is to be found in the following resolution, which the House of Commons adopted upon that occasion, without a division, and without a dissenting voice.

"That it is highly criminal for any minister or ministers, or any other servant of the Crown, in Great Britain, directly or indirectly, to make use of the power of his office in order to influence the election of members of Parliament; and that an attempt to exercise that influence was an attack upon the dignity, the honor, and the independence of Parliament, an infringement of the rights and liberties of the people, and an attempt to sap the basis of our free and happy Constitution."

Sir, these are the maxims of wisdom and experience. We have seen that the King of Great Britain, even since the revolution of 1688, has, by the sole power of patronage, been able several times to annihilate the independence of Parliament, and to rule with absolute sway. How the spirit of Englishmen has often broke the power of corruption and re-established the Government upon its free foundation, we have already seen. Sir, human nature is the same in this new world that it is in the old. Patronage is the same in its power to seduce and its liability to abuse; and the same jealous vigilance is demanded in this country to prevent the consolidation of all power in the hands of the Executive.

The abuse of patronage, Mr. Speaker, and every other incidental evil of which I complain, it was supposed by our ancestors, when they framed and adopted the Constitution, would no sooner become known than they would be redressed by the ballot-box—the panacea of the Constitution; but, sir, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "the constitutional remedy by the elective principle" has "become nothing, 'because' it is smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government." It is to me, sir, matter of real wonder and amazement that a degree of abuse in the administration of the patronage of the Government should excite no particular alarm at this day, which, but eight years ago, would have caused such a commotion in the land as must inevitably have terminated in revolution, if no other remedy could have been applied. Undoubtedly, many causes peculiar to the times have combined to produce this extraordinary result—the unrivaled popularity of the President—the blunder of opposition in relation to nullification and the United States Bank; but the most subtle, powerful, and successful element of evil has been the introduction of the spoils principle, as an avowed and defensible incentive to party association and party service—the disgrace of American politics. It will be perceived, and must be acknowledged, that this principle is founded upon the abuse of patronage. It can have no existence or operation but in the abuse of patronage. The doctrine is, that all the public offices and employments belong, as a matter of right, to the successful party in a political contest, and should be distributed among them in the same manner that the spoils, whether of lands or goods, plundered from a conquered people in war, belong to and ought to be distributed among the victors. It is impossible that a principle so odious and tyrannical, and one which has been discarded as dishonorable, and against natural law, even in war, among civilized nations, could have received the sanction of any respectable portion of the people, if they had not been deluded and their confidence abused by their favorite leaders; if the principle itself had not been arrayed in the guises of patriotism. And accordingly we find that such was the fact. The people have been told that their best friends, and the only true patriots, were contending against a powerful combination to change the character and administration of the Government from a government of the people into an aristocracy—a government of and for the rich only. The President, as we have already seen, condescended to give his sanction to this article, by charging that the supporters of Judge White, in Tennessee, were "attempting to undermine our republican system." Upon such grounds as these the people have been prevailed on to bear with, and, in some sort, to sanction every abuse; and if they believe half the statements made to them upon this subject, they are right. They act upon the same principle upon which General Jackson, in the defence of New Orleans, and the liberty of his country, called in the aid of notorious pirates.

The people suppose that the defenders of their liberty, and of our free Constitution, against the wealth and aristocracy of the land, whatever may be their merits in other respects, are at least entitled to all the offices and employments in the public control. The circumstances that many of the leaders of the party which thus claims to be arrayed against the rich are themselves among the most wealthy citizens of the country; and that many of those profligate incendiaries, who have been most active in exciting the poor against the rich, have actually become rich themselves upon the spoils of office, and are taking their stand in the ranks of the wealthy, even while they are yet hoarse with bawling the fire-cry of the party, with which they have alarmed the slumbering senses of the country, appear to have had no effect in undeceiving those who set out the victims of delusion.

But, sir, it is not a little remarkable that those who claim all the public virtue, all the disinterestedness, all the patriotism, and exclusive devotion to free and equal rights, should be the champions of a system of plunder; affecting to despise and fear riches, as the source of all oppression and injustice, yet seizing upon, and appropriating exclusively to themselves, the entire national treasury; a capital which yields an annual income of at least twenty five millions! Is it not remarkable that such men, with such professions daily upon their lips, should be the inventors and supporters of a principle of party association, a motive to party action, the most mercenary, the most tyrannical, the most corrupting, and founded more exclusively in a thirst for riches, than any which has ever been known heretofore in the history of Government?

Sir, what is the true spirit and character of the spoils principle, as avowed by some of the leaders of the party in power? That it is detestable, is felt by many; but how dangerous it is, I believe has not yet been duly considered. Have you, sir, ever reflected upon its nature? Do you know that this principle is the foundation of the largest class of crimes known in the criminal code of every country? Do you know, sir, that this same spoils principle has been the cause of more devastation, wretchedness, and guilt, individual and national, than any other in the history of human suffering; that it is the incentive alike to the burglar who breaks and enters your house at night, and the highwayman who waylays your path and takes your life; that, rising from individuals to multitudes and nations, it is the actuating motives to the plundering and desolations of military conquests; that it forces the gates of cities, plunders temples of religion, overturning in its course, indiscriminately, republican States and imperial dynasties? It is the great despoiler of private rights, and of national independence. It was the spoils principle which united the barbarians of the North, and finally overthrew the vast fabric of Roman policy, law, and civilization—the work of ages; and it is the only principle which can ever shake the solid fabric of our own free and happy institutions.

The charge that the British General encouraged the troops before New Orleans, during the late war, by holding out the beauty and booty of the city as the rewards of their valor and success, was thought so dishonorable to the British army as to have led to a correspondence with the American General, as I have been informed, with a view to procure a retraction of the imputation. But in what does this new principle of party association differ from that which was thought so disgraceful to British arms? I repeat the question: how does the spoils principle of the party now in power, in this country, differ, as regards the honor or safety of it, from the wickedness of the British General? If, in war between civilized nations, the spoils principle is regarded as too great a temptation to licentiousness, and too dangerous for the general safety of property and society, how much more dangerous and insufferable must such a principle be, when applied to the contests for power between political parties in a free Government? In truth, sir, what is this principle but the watchword invented by a political chief to animate his followers to a savage and unscrupulous warfare, sparing neither sex; practising every species of fraud and hypocrisy; confounding right and wrong; and often robbing the innocent and virtuous of their only treasure—their honest fame? What is it, I repeat, but a proclamation to the venal and corrupt, of all parties, to rally to the standard of a chief, who, like the leader of an army of bondsmen, points to the Treasury, and says to them, that shall be the reward of victory? Sir, this is no exaggeration. Disguise it as you will, it is a system of corruption and plunder.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, in the history of modern Europe, when, whatever discord prevailed among the Christian nations which occupied that fair continent, however bloody and furious the wars which raged between them, the moment it was announced by pilgrim messengers that the infidel powers of the east were assembled, and advancing their standard to the confines of Christendom, the sacred tocsin was sounded! "The truth of God" was proclaimed, and Christian armies which had lately met in deadly strife, upon many a bloody field, were now seen advancing harmoniously in united columns, a consolidated phalanx, rolling back the tide of war upon the haughty Turk! I will not say, sir, that the parallel is complete. It would be profane to do so; but, I will say, that next to the Christian religion, as an instrument for the improvement of the condition of the human race, that which is most precious on earth is in peril. The Constitution of the United States is invaded! The Janissaries are mustered; the infidel Powers advance; already are the outworks carried; they approach the citadel, and nothing but a united effort, and the most determined courage and good conduct, can save it from irretrievable destruction.

Sir, this resolution has been regarded ever since as expressing the true principles of the Constitution of England. In every debate which has arisen since 1779, it is referred to as a standard authority. And upon the subject of official intermeddling in elections, let it be remembered, to the eternal honor of Englishmen, that no party, that no member of any party in that country, however weak, or however debased by corruption, has ever dared to question the soundness of the principles of the resolution of '79.

In this review of the course of British legislation in securing the freedom of elections, I must not omit to notice the act of 49 George III, c. 118, (1809.) Notwithstanding the numerous legal provisions which had been adopted to secure the purity and freedom of elections, it was notorious that members of Parliament were often returned through the influence of ministers, in giving or promising offices and employments to influential persons in the several counties and boroughs of the kingdom entitled to send members to Parliament. To reform this abuse, Mr. Curran brought forward a bill prescribing a penalty of five hundred pounds, and forfeiture of office, against every person who should be found guilty of selling his influence in an election, and a penalty of one thousand pounds against any person holding an office under the King, who should be guilty of giving any office, place, or employment to any person, upon any contract or agreement that they should exert their influence in the election of any member of Parliament; but the Ministry had the address to get it so amended that no officer of the Crown could be punished for such an act of corruption, unless the contract upon which the office was given was express. This amendment defeated the salutary design of the bill in a great measure; but still, in the shape in which it passed, it attests by its preamble, as well as by the manifest spirit of the act, the sentiments of the English people in relation to this subject. The preamble recites that all "such gifts and promises of office are contrary to the usage, right, and freedom of elections, and contrary to the laws and Constitution of the realm."

These are some of the securities which the wisdom of Englishmen has provided for the preservation of the freedom of elections; these are some of the bulwarks which the spirit and sagacity of that renowned people have created to defend their liberties, and to operate as barriers against the inroads of arbitrary power.

Let us next see what we have done to secure the purity and freedom of elections—to guard and preserve our liberties. All that we have done presents but a barren catalogue. The Constitution contains the only provision bearing upon this subject to be found in our statute book. But, sir, we have had the most salutary doctrines laid down by some of our most distinguished and venerated statesmen; and it will be our own fault if we do not carry them into execution by prompt and effective legislation. I have already referred to the authority of Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson, upon the subject of removals from office for opinion's sake. Upon the subject of the interference of public officers in elections, Mr. Jefferson is, if possible, still more explicit and satisfactory. I beg leave to read an extract from his letter to Governor McKean, of Pennsylvania, in 1801, upon this subject; written, it appears, while the election between him and Col. Burr was still pending in the House of Representatives:

"The event of the election is still in dubio. A strong position in the House of Representatives will prevent an election if they can. I rather believe they will not be able to do it, as there are six individuals of moderate character, any one of whom, coming over to the republican view, will make a ninth State. Till this is known, it is too soon for me to say what should be done in such atrocious cases, as those you mention of federal officers obstructing the operation of the State Governments. One thing I will say, that, as to the future interference with elections, whether of the State or General Governments, by the officers of the latter, should be deemed a cause of removal; because the constitutional remedy by the elective principle becomes nothing, if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government. How far it may be practicable, prudent, or proper, to look back, is too great a question to be decided by the united wisdom of the whole administration when formed."

After Mr. Jefferson was made President, he took steps immediately, in compliance with his pledge to Governor McKean, upon the subject of the future interference of public officers in elections; and the circular which I hold in my hand, and which I ask leave to read to the House, appears to have been issued by his order, to regulate the conduct of all in authority under him.

"The President of the United States has seen, with dissatisfactions, officers of the General Government taking, on various occasions, active parts in elections of the public functionaries, whether of the General or of the State Governments. Freedom of election being essential to the mutual independence of Governments, and of the different branches of the same Government so vitally cherished by most of our constituents, it is deemed improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right. This I am instructed, therefore, to notify to all officers within my department, holding their appointments under the authority of the President directly, and to desire them to notify to all subordinate to them. The right of any officer to give his vote at elections, as a qualified citizen, is not meant to be restrained, nor, however given, shall it have any effect to his prejudice; but it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the votes of others, nor take any part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and his duties to it."

It seems that Mr. Jefferson did not think it expedient to remove all public officers who had intermeddled in elections before he came into power; but he took care to prescribe a rule for the future, which would leave no ground of complaint for any removal from office for any act of subsequent interference in elections. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Hamer) claimed to act with a party which practised upon Jefferson's principles. I call upon him and his friends now to confirm what they say by their example, and turn out every man in office, in the United States, who interfered in the late election. Sir, it is due to principle—the purity and freedom of elections demand this course—it is due to consistency, among those who call themselves republicans and followers of Jefferson. It is due to the cause of liberty and free government, that every public officer who has dared to interfere in any election, State or National, should be made an example of in all time to come. But, sir, this is the business and duty of the Executive, so far as the past is concerned.

What I propose that Congress should do, is simply to declare the removal of any public officer upon political grounds, and for opinion's sake, to be a high misdemeanor, or by the action of public sentiment at the ballot-box, as heretofore. I propose to leave the power of removal in the President, as it is now, believing that any attempt to limit it would be injudicious. But we are under no such restraint in providing an adequate penalty against all public officers who interfere in election, except to cast their votes, nor is there any reason why we should not declare any gift, or promise of any office or place under the Government, as the consideration of service in an election, to be bribery, and to punish such offences for the future in a manner proportionate to their enormity. Until the National Legislature shall take this subject up, and act upon it, experience has shown that we have noscivity for the purity or the freedom of elections—none, for the protection of our free institutions. The only popular objection to the principles of the bill which I propose to enact into a law, is the principle of rotation in office. Whatever objections exist to the adoption of that principle, and they are very serious and important, I still infinitely prefer the adoption of it, according to the views recently expressed by some of the people of good old republica

Pennsylvania, than the present practice of the Government. If we can agree upon no remedy for present abuses, let us adopt a uniform rule, at least, and let all officers go out at the end of four or eight years. Now, sir, when the President or any head of a Department wishes to remove a meritorious officer, of offensive politics, in order to make way for some favorite partisan, he may cite the popular principle of rotation in office to support his conduct; but still the great mass of tractable and obedient office holders, who are ready to become the creatures of Executive will, are permitted to remain in office for life, in defiance of the salutary and popular principle of rotation in office. The rule, sir, should work both ways, or be discarded altogether.

Mr. Speaker, experience, I think, has conclusively demonstrated, of late, that patronage is the vice, and is likely to be the euthanasia of our political system. The Virginia objectors to the Constitution were mistaken. It is not the great powers of peace and war—of the purse and of the sword, vested in the Federal Government, which are most to be feared; nor is it so much the aggregate amount of patronage within the control of the Government, as it is the want of proper legal limitations and restrictions upon the use of it in the hands of the Executive, which is to be dreaded and guarded against. All other dangers in the operation of the Government will wear out by time, and are of small moment in comparison with this of patronage.

Let it be understood that I do not propose to divest the President of one particle of the patronage which the Constitution has conferred upon him, in giving him the power of nominating to all the important offices; nor do I wish to deprive the Executive of that due and proper influence over the public councils and people of the country which the legitimate exercise of it naturally brings to him. The legitimate exercise of the patronage vested in the President insures to him a vast influence in the country, sufficient of itself to keep alive the jealousies and vigilance of a free people. The power of nominating to all new offices—to fill all accruing vacancies by death, resignation, or removal for unfitness—the power of appointing all the heads of the Executive Departments, all foreign ministers, and the judges of the Supreme and other courts of the United States—a vast power of itself, and operating directly upon the highest talent and ambition in the country; beside these, the power of promotion in the army and navy, and the patronage of the Military Academy, exclusive of the other great branches of the public service, would of themselves, when exercised with an eye single to the interest of the country, as it should be, constitute an aggregate influence great enough to be trusted in the hands of any one man. To this measure of influence, and more, the President is entitled. The Constitution bestows it; and I seek not to deprive him of it. But, sir, this vast power was a necessary deposit for the public good; and not the smallest portion of it was given for the personal gratification, or to advance the private interests or wishes of the President. It was a sacred trust, to be administered according to the spirit and intention of the GREAT DEED by which it was vested. The trustees have, in my opinion, abused this trust; they have converted the public estate to their own private uses; they have caused the public service to be regarded as subordinate to private interest and ambition.

It is an old maxim that money is power. Patronage is even more powerful than money; for patronage is money, and more. It bestows honor, rank, and consideration, along with money—it gratifies every passion of the human heart. It is the most successful instrument of power ever employed by artful and ambitious men in a State. It is, of itself, sufficient to overturn and revolutionize governments—it is able to neutralize all forms, and to consolidate all actual power in the hands of the possessor. Let us see what has been said upon this subject by one of the most acute and able writers upon this or any other subject; and one, too, who was no enemy to a strong government. I allude to Dr. Puley. In his chapter upon political philosophy, and in giving his views upon the British Constitution, he lays it down that—“When the Constitution conferred upon the Crown the nomination to all employments in public service, the authors of this arrangement were led to it by the obvious propriety of leaving to a master the choice of his servants; and by the manifest inconvenience of engaging the national council upon every vacancy, in those personal contests which attend elections to places of honor and emolument. Our ancestors did not observe that this disposition added an influence to the regal office, which, when the number and value of public employments increased, would supersede, in a great measure, the forms, and change the character of the ancient Constitution. They knew not, what the experience and reflection of modern ages has discovered, that patronage is, universally, power; that he who possesses, in a sufficient degree, the means of gratifying the desires of mankind after wealth and distinction, by whatever checks and forms his authority may be limited or disguised, will direct the management of public affairs. Whatever be the mechanism of the political engine, he will guide the motion.”

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

SPEECH OF MR. PEYTON, OF TENNESSEE.

In the House of Representatives, March 1 and 2, 1837—On presenting the minority report of a select committee, &c.
[As reported by the National Intelligencer.]

Mr. PEYTON said: I rise, Mr. Speaker, to present a report from the minority of a select committee of which the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Garland,) is chairman. I offer the paper which I hold in my hand, as containing the views of the minority of that committee, from a majority of whom a report has just been made by the chairman. In reference to the report of the minority, I wish to submit a motion to the House, directing that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a bill prohibiting, in future, under sufficient penalties, the communication of secret intelligence, by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the benefit of the deposit or other favorite banks, which is withheld from others, and which concerns all the deposit banks alike.

The CHAIR said the gentleman from Tennessee must obtain the leave of the House.

No objection being raised in any quarter,

Mr. P. was proceeding.—Mr. Speaker, upon the proposition—

The CHAIR. The gentleman will forward his proposition to the Chair.

Mr. P. having done so, was again about to proceed, when The SPEAKER inquired if the gentleman included the report of the majority also in his motion to commit.

Mr. P. replied in the negative, and proceeded.

Mr. SPEAKER: Upon the proposition which I have sent to the Chair, I wish briefly to state the reasons which have influenced me, as one of the minority, to make the motion.

It appears, sir, from the evidence taken in this case, that there is resident in this city a secret agent of many of the most important of the deposit banks, who is in the habit of communicating to those banks secret information which he obtains from the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the Treasury Department, which, in my opinion, is unauthorized and unjustified by any law, principle, rule of reason, or of justice, and tends, also, in an eminent degree, to jeopard the safety of the public money, to encourage corrupt combinations for the purpose of speculation, and to destroy that equality of benefits which should be extended to all the citizens and all the banks of the United States alike. I will name one instance, which must force itself strongly upon the mind of the most incredulous as well as upon that of the most prejudiced partisan.

This agent, Reuben M. Whitney, obtained information of the expected issuance of the Treasury order of July 11, requiring specie payments for the public lands, and communicated that information, as a matter of favor and indulgence, to his distant friends; while, sir, Congress, then in session, and every individual member of it, as far as we have any information, were permitted to remain in profound ignorance of the intention or design of issuing such an order! Yes, sir, this “Treasury familiarity,” as he has been appropriately styled, obtained possession of this cabinet secret about the last of June, or first of July—Congress adjourning upon the 4th—and informed, for one, the cashier of the Girard Bank, at Philadelphia, of the intended issuance of that order. And what makes the case still more aggravated and suspicious is this, that when the question was propounded to the witness, who communicated to his friends and partners in speculations in the public lands, and bank stocks, and Treasury certificates, whether he was not a party interested in these transactions, the witness stood mute, and refused to answer the question! And, sir, shall it be tolerated in this land? Shall it be sanctioned by this House, that a man, irresponsible to the laws, and unknown to the country, a secret spy in the Treasury, shall obtain information of an intended measure, which was at least a doubtful exercise of power on the part of the Executive, involving the currency, trade, and commerce of the country, and the value of every species of property of the citizens of these United States; and that he shall use that information as a matter of speculation, in connection with others, and those others high officers of this Government, and yet the American Congress not have the independence, not have the political honesty to interpose its shield and protect the Treasury of this nation, and the people of this country, from such abuses of power? Why, sir, when it was proposed to forward interrogatories to the deposit banks, and the receivers of public moneys, as to the secret emoluments of this agent, I propounded, or proposed to be propounded, a question to this effect: whether the said agent was not engaged, directly or indirectly, with any officer or officers of the Government, in speculations; and whether he did not derive the larger part of his emolument in that way? The gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Hamer,) one of the members of the committee, moved to strike out the words “any officer or officers of the Government,” wherever they occurred; which motion was sustained by a majority of the committee, but only by a majority of one, the honorable chairman (Mr. Garland) voting, as he did on almost every occasion, for the most liberal investigation into what we were directed to inquire; a most important branch of which was, as to the amount of the agent’s compensation. Yet the majority of the committee chose to give so rigid and technical a construction to the resolution under which we were authorized to act, that we were denied the right of proving to this nation that Whitney, in connection with high officers of the Government, was engaged in speculating upon this very Treasury order of the 11th of July, by drawing specie from the deposit banks, and selling it as a matter of merchandise, instead of applying it to the purposes of Government. That inquiry was suppressed by the majority of the committee, upon the motion of the gentleman before referred to, because, no doubt, the majority thought they had not the power to reach any gentleman connected with the Government, unless he was in the Treasury Department, notwithstanding that every individual may have formed a partnership, a league of alliance, offensive and defensive, in this war upon the public treasure, with R. M. Whitney. That, sir, was the construction given to the resolution of the House by the majority of this committee.

Mr. CUSHMAN here sprung up, and announced that he rose to a question of order.

Mr. PEYTON. Did the gentleman move the previous question? because, if not, I call him to order.

Mr. CUSHMAN said he understood the majority of the committee had made their report, which was ordered to be printed and lie on the table. The minority of that committee, he understood, wished also to present their views, and, having the leave of the House, had done so, making a different motion for its disposition. Now the point he raised was this: whether it was proper that the minority of the committee should go into facts laid before them, until the whole proceeding, as contained in both reports, should come up before the House.

The CHAIR decided against the point, and that the gentleman from Tennessee was strictly in order.

Mr. CUSHMAN again rose, and was about to proceed, when Mr. PEYTON said: Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the gentleman’s being heard, because I have always understood the previous question is not debatable. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEYTON. I ask the gentleman if he intends to insinuate any thing from my course in this House?

Mr. PEYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know the operation of the previous question as well as that gentleman does. I had supposed that the sphere of its operations was circumscribed to the limits of this House; but, sir, I am just informed that the gentleman moved the previous question on my friend from North Carolina (Mr. Graham) in the late election in the Bundles district, (Mr. C. secured a majority under his frank during the canvass between Graham and Newland, in behalf of the latter.) But, sir, the previous question was cut off in that instance by my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The gentleman is mistaken; I have not moved the previous question.

The CHAIR. Order! The gentleman from Tennessee is on the floor.

Mr. PEYTON. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question is settled, I will—

The CHAIR. The previous question is not before the House.

Mr. PEYTON. But its personification just has been.

[Much laughter.] This will be understood by a word of explanation. A distinguished gentleman from Virginia last session described Mr. C. as the “very personification of the previous question,” and he has ever since gone, in the House, by that name. The gentleman is generally on the look out for the eye of the Chair on particular occasions, and it has been whispered aside, &c. &c. vice versa.—Rep.]

Mr. PEYTON proceeded. Mr. Speaker, I was proceeding, as well as I could make myself understood, and it is very difficult for me even to speak so as to be heard, owing to a severe cold and accompanying hoarseness, in consequence of attending your night sessions. I say, sir, I was proceeding to show that there was an agent here; that he was vested with great power; trusted with secrets; suspected of being engaged in heavy speculations, and, in all probability, from the evidence, connected in those speculations with the officers of this Government, all of which tended to corrupt its purity and to squander the treasure of the nation; and that such abuses required and called aloud for the exercise of the power of the House to shield the public treasure from further loss and peculation.

Sir, we have established that this agency exists; that Reuben M. Whitney is the principal agent; we have also shown the nature and objects of this agency, and I have just glanced at some of the duties which appertain to his station. What is the amount of his compensation? This is a question which, it will be seen, is difficult if not impossible to answer, because the agent himself and those connected with him refuse to disclose the facts. What is the character of his business? It is no easy matter to give a specific response to this inquiry; his powers are so broad and his business so general. I have alluded to one or two branches of his business, such as giving information of the forthcoming of the Treasury circular of the 11th July; joining his friends at a distance and officers of the Government in converting that circular into a matter of merchandise, &c. I will now allude to another branch of said agent’s business, independent of his speculations for himself and his friends; that Reuben M. Whitney has friends and partners high in office, high in power, who are so strongly linked with him, so closely allied to him, that to separate them would be like separating the Siamese Twins—it would be death to both; and hence they are bound to make common cause with him—compelled to protect him. Of this there can no longer remain a doubt. Look at the facts, sir.

I propounded to Mr. Whitney this interrogatory while he was on his examination before the committee: In drawing up your protest, were you aided by, or did any member of this committee, or of the House, give you any advice, assistance, or opinion in relation to said protest? The witness answered that, so far as the members of the committee were concerned, he was not assisted, aided, nor counselled. But, when I came to press the other branch of the inquiry upon him, in all its forms and shapes, he shrunk from the investigation, said the question was “inquisitorial,” and therefore would not answer it. He could not deny but that his protest was drawn up in full consultation with some members of this House; else why did he answer one branch of the interrogatory, and refuse to respond to the other?

Again, sir, when called upon to disclose who were his partners in these speculations, derivable, and derivable alone, through his power, as an agent or officer of the deposit banks, he demurred, and refused to answer.

When questioned as to whether he had or had not, since this investigation commenced, written to those at a distance who were supposed to be in possession of facts which might lead to important developments, making important communications to them on public matters, affecting the treasure of the country and the legislation of Congress, and whether he did not, in conclusion, mark these letters as “confidential,” and holding up threats of ruin if they dared disclose them; to that question he also stood mute, and refused to answer.

But, sir, there was one gentleman of the committee which the delicacy of Mr. Whitney, though on oath before the committee, would not suffer him to mention, whom he seems to have consulted; but it eked out in the investigation before the House. When asked whether any members of the committee, or of the House, did or did not counsel him in drawing up his protest, he swore that, from motives of delicacy, he would not approach the members of the committee, and had carefully abstained from all conversation with them. Yet, sir, how does it turn out in evidence? Why, it was disclosed by the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. Fairfield,) in his evidence before the House, that, upon a certain occasion, he called upon the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Gillet,) and found him and Reuben M. Whitney in close converse together, after night, in the room of the gentleman from New York, and that he (Mr. F.) thereupon went away, leaving them alone in their glory! Now Reuben must have pretty suddenly changed all his ideas of propriety or “delicacy,” as he himself terms it, to have become bold enough to force himself upon a member of the committee.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I unhesitatingly assert that he may have employed counsel most learned in the law, and skilled in all the rules of criminal jurisprudence, deeply read, and pre-eminently acute and ingenious in quibbles and technicalities, but he never could have got one more true to him than has been that very gentleman from New York, (Mr. Gillet,) a member of the select committee. And, I will say for him, that he has been consistent throughout the whole of the investigation. Why, sir, I propounded a question of this character, to which he objected. Having been informed by a gentleman, well known here, of the first respectability and highest honor, residing in Philadelphia, that the cashier of the Union Bank of Tennessee, coming to the city of Washington to transact business in relation to his bank with the Treasury Department, had better sense than to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the mere man of straw, like Maelzel’s automaton, in the hands of Reuben Whitney, but that he passed him by, and, approaching the source of power in that department, went directly to Whitney, taking care to deposit to his credit or in his hands a bill or check for a thousand dollars, or some large amount of money. That he called in the morning, and Whitney told him he had arranged his business to his satisfaction; that the favors which he sought were extended. Unfortunately, there was not time from the 28th of January, when the information reached me, to get Mr. Van Wyck’s (the cashier of said bank) testimony. This, however, I do know, from the highest sources, that he (Van Wyck) has said that he gave Whitney a check or note to pay him for his services. Now, sir, is, or is not, this a case of bribery? It must be so, sir. It could not have been otherwise; for his influence he received the money. I do not reflect on Mr. Van Wyck. I asked him (Whitney) is it true or false? But when I propounded the question he was mute—he was dumb.

[Mr. P. being called on by a member, (Mr. Beale, of Virginia,) here explained how he came in possession of the above facts, by a letter received on the 28th of January, from a gentleman in Philadelphia, and that he drew out the facts conveyed in that letter, in a series of interrogatories which he propounded both to R. M. Whitney and to the late cashier of the Union Bank of Tennessee, A. Van Wyck.]

Now, sir, what does this establish? Does it not establish Whitney's power, and his abuse of that power by receiving a bribe of a thousand dollars for the exercise of it? Whitney could not, dare not, attempt to gainsay the fact. I instantly, sir, proposed the inquiry to be sent to the witness at Nashville, and have him examined upon the facts; but the gentleman from New York (Mr. Gille) objected, and recorded his vote against it upon the ayes and noes, as did the gentlemen from Maine (Mr. Fairfield) and New Hampshire (Mr. Pierce), suppressing, or attempting to suppress, that important branch of the inquiry; but we succeeded. Nor was this all. When it was agreed that the interrogatories I had framed should be propounded to Mr. Van Wyck, the gentleman from New York was found alone voting against his being summoned. I have since received a letter from a gentleman of known honor and integrity at Nashville, confirming the statements contained in the letter from Philadelphia, and expressing the regret of the writer at Mr. Van Wyck's absence at New Orleans. I have, however, the letter from the gentleman to whom I have alluded, confirming the facts in every particular, and stating that the cashier (Mr. Van Wyck) expressed his surprise that the other bank at Nashville did not employ Mr. Whitney.

Mr. P. continued. Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury travels a long way out of the issue, particularly according to the strict construction put upon the resolution of the House by the gentlemen from New York, and passes a high eulogium upon Reuben M. Whitney with regard to political transactions. He says, in substance, that justice to that gentleman (Mr. W.) requires him to state, that he always held political considerations of no influence whatever in the selection of deposit banks. That is what the Secretary says of Reuben. Now, what does Reuben say to the officers of these banks themselves, when they make their application for the public money? Why, sir, he writes a letter to the President of the Planters' Bank at Natchez, James C. Wilkins, then a candidate on the White ticket for Congress, beginning as follows:

"WASHINGTON, September 30, 1835.

"DEAR SIR: When I wrote you last, I did not inform you that it had been represented here that you were, or would be, the candidate for the Senate in opposition to Walker. This I then considered was a tale for the purpose of operating prejudicially to the interest of the Planters' Bank, got up by some one who was striving to direct a part of its Government agency to another institution," &c. &c. &c.

Yes, says he, when he first heard it, he believed it to be a calumny, a "tale" got up by "some one who was striving to direct a part of its Government agency to another institution." Was it, then, a crime to run for the Senate in opposition to Walker? He then goes on to lay down his doctrines, some of which are very sound, but winds up by stating that he would consider it proper to remove the deposits from any institution employed as the fiscal agent of the Government which should be hostile to the administration. This is no interference in politics! Reuben M. Whitney is entitled to all praise on account of abstaining from such interference! So swears your Secretary.

Take, Mr. Speaker, the case of the Illinois Bank. His conduct in that instance was the most outrageous, impudent, overbearing, reckless exercise of power which was ever perpetrated by any man in office, and this known to, and connived at by, the Secretary of the Treasury. An application was made by the Illinois Bank to become one of the depositories of the public money; and then began a fair test of Whitney's power, politically speaking, for this was altogether a political contest. I believe I can say that the evidence is in existence showing that every one of the representatives in Congress from Illinois recommended the bank of that State to be employed as a depository of the public money. I think the two Senators also united in the request. These gentlemen were governed, as I hope and believe, by higher considerations than party politics. They looked alone to the interest of the country in which the bank was located, and, rising above all sordid and selfish views, recommended this bank to be selected, notwithstanding its officers were known to be politically opposed to the administration. Well, what was the result? Whitney opposes it, and puts his veto upon it. He stands up against the bank. The cashier applies to him; no, I am wrong, one of the directors applies to Reuben M. Whitney, the cashier having written to the Secretary of the Treasury, who had not, it would seem, answered his letter, but he appeared to be disposed to decline any correspondence on the subject, because it would have to be placed on file in the Department. Correspondence is often carried on through this dark and suspicious organ of communication, Reuben M. Whitney, though the final consummation, the mere matter of form, is transacted through the Secretary of the Treasury. One of the directors writes to Reuben M. Whitney, offering him a large reward, as much as the other banks gave him, and asked him to obtain from the Secretary of the Treasury a reply to the cashier's letter. Reuben replied, "I must be frank with you; candor compels me to say that charges of the most serious character are brought against your bank." And what are these charges, Mr. Speaker? Why, Whitney says the charter has been violated by the manner in which the stock was taken. "That is one allegation—a mere pretext. But then he proceeds mainly to charge that some of the officers connected with the 'Ohio Life and Trust Company' are stockholders in the Illinois Bank, and that these are known to be hostile to the administration, and that their object was to produce a political change in the States of Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, and Ohio. And, in a letter to Mr. Tillson, a director, he says 'there are serious charges against your bank, and I must tell you that, with any pecuniary sacrifices to myself, I will oppose your application, unless you can clear your bank of all these charges.'" And yet, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury says that Whitney abstained from all political influence whatever! The result was, that the bank did not get the public money, was turned out of competition with the other banks, and the moneys arising from the sale of public lands in that State were transferred from it to the bank at St. Louis, Missouri, and the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, of which he, Reuben M. Whitney, at a salary of $1,000, was the agent!

Take another case. The Bank of Michigan, at Detroit, says: "This bank desires to co-operate with the Treasury Department in its measures for the general good; and with that view solely, the proposition received from you (to become its agent) will be accepted at due time."

Take again the case of the bank at Burlington, Vermont. There, sir, you will find the most flagrant and palpable influence and exercise of political power, through Reuben M. Whitney, upon that State during the elections. Whitney applied to become the agent of that bank, and they implored him almost on their knees to spare them from the tax he had exacted from other banks. "Look," say they, "at our insulated situation, cut off, as it were, from trade and commerce; you cannot expect to receive the same from us as from the other banks in the large commercial cities. We are willing to co-operate with the Government, and pay for all the services you may render us." Whitney, however, renewed his application for an annual salary in the most imposing form, sending—what think you, Mr. Speaker?—a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and from "a distinguished gentleman residing here, high in the confidence of the Executive," without a name, but who speaks for the President and the Secretary, pledging both to Reuben's scheme, and both answering for Reuben's fitness, and recommending his employment. And yet, sir, when I moved in committee (the having been discharged before that letter came to the committee from the bank) to have Whitney summoned, to testify in reference to its authorship, a majority of a committee appointed by this House to ascertain and report facts shrank, appalled from the investigation, and suppressed the truth of that most important inquiry. But, sir, what did this House itself do? Appealed from what I conceived to be an unjust exercise of power on the part of the majority of the committee to the fairness, justice, and duty of the House. I offered a resolution requiring the Speaker to summon Whitney to appear, either before the committee or before the House itself, and answer as to the authorship of that letter, and let us see whether the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Postmaster General wrote it, or whether it was a forgery of your Treasury pet. And what course did the House take? Having the day before humbled itself upon its knees to Reuben Whitney, it dared not ask him to come to its bar! Having just before appeared at its bar, and gone away in triumph, it refused to summon him either before the committee or before the House. Have I not a right, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to say to the American people, I will declare it to my constituents, that this inquiry was suppressed, that the truth was suppressed by the majority of the investigating committee, backed by "the party" in this House? The people will see and appreciate the craven spirit which governed it.

Mr. Speaker, you have not only humbled yourselves to the President, and pocketed in silence his rebuke for appointing these committees, but you have humbled yourselves to the meanest and vilest instrument in the hands of the slaves of the President. Sir, you have humbled yourselves to Reuben M. Whitney! Now, in all bodies, heretofore, that had any regard even to the forms of justice, or the slightest regard to the expectations of the people, in the appointment of committees raised for the purpose of carrying out any measure, but more particularly to carry on investigations like the present, which are always unthankful, and more or less perilous to those charged with them, the Speakers of all deliberative bodies have heretofore never failed to appoint majorities in favor of the inquiries. How is the case here, sir? Two committees have been appointed at the close of this Congress, for which we have been battling for years past, but so near the close of the session that we have only twenty-nine days remaining in which to collect testimony from all parts of the country, and six members out of nine of the committee opposed to the very investigation they were raised to carry out! Such an appointment by a Speaker is unprecedented in the history of the civilized world. But how can it be otherwise, sir? The price, in these days, which must be paid for power, is the sale and prostration of every principle of honor, patriotism, independence; and, I fear, sir, the day is distant when we shall see the Speaker of an American Congress dare to appoint investigating committees, a majority of which will be in favor of inquiry, how important soever it may be to the preservation of the institutions and liberties of this country. No, sir. He who obtains place in these days upon the conditions annexed to it, will look down from his lofty height, from the Tarpeian rock on which you are tottering, and knowing he was lifted there as a party instrument to do the bidding of those who placed him there, he will not dare to act independently; feeling conscious of the means and motives of his elevation, and the little claim he had on the score of merit, he would shrink back amazed and terrified at the prospect of his fall. It would be too great a sacrifice, for it would sink him into the abyss of nothingness out of which he sprang. Why, sir, for a small great man to look down from that height upon which you sit, would be like the immense precipices over which the guide of the poor old blind man in the play of Lear seemed to be looking, at the cliff of Dover. The members upon the floor would appear to him no larger than mice, smaller than Gulliver's Lilliputians. And would he hazard such a fall? Oh no, sir, never! Any man who crawls up to that point, in these days, will never hazard the consequences of a patriotic, a generous, or a noble action; it would be fatal to him. How, then, could it be expected otherwise in the appointments of the investigating committees? But, while I think of it, candor, honor, justice, require of me that I should say, and I do so with the utmost pleasure, that the chairman, (Mr. Garland of Virginia,) although opposed politically to the inquiry, has, like an honest man, in spite of your party tactics and party technicalities, his honest bosom, swelling with patriotism, elevated him above all other considerations—he has given a latitude of interpretation to the resolution under which we were authorized to act, for the fullest inquiry. Sir, it is honorable to him, and he has risen higher in my estimation. I wish I could say it of all the members of the committee. He has raised a monument to his honor and patriotism higher than the dizzy height upon which you sit, sir.

[Mr. Root here interposed and called for the orders of the day. There were loud cries of "soo! gooo!" But Mr. B. insisted on his motion, and Mr. Peyton was consequently compelled to give way without concluding.]

The foregoing is the account of a very accurate and impartial report of Mr. PEYTON'S remarks, as taken down at the time they were delivered.

Mr. PEYTON submitted the following amendment, on which he concluded his remarks in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, not having an opportunity to do so in the House on the night of the 2d of March:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an officer, to be called the Superintendent of the Public Deposits, whose duty it shall be to manage and superintend all the correspondence, business, and interests connected with the deposit banks, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and whose correspondence and all other proceedings shall be deemed official, and regularly filed and kept with the other papers of the Treasury Department.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said Superintendent shall receive a fixed annual compensation of three thousand five hundred dollars.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be continued or hereafter selected as a depository of the public money, unless such bank shall expressly stipulate that all correspondence and other proceedings, between said bank and the Secretary of the Treasury, or between said bank and said Superintendent, or any other person or persons, touching the public deposits; their custody, use, or disbursement, shall at all times be open for the inspection or examination of any committee of either House of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment, sir, with the assurance to this committee that I am serious when I propose it for its consideration. Sir, this is unknown, illegitimate, secret agent should no longer exist. This minister extraordinary near the Treasury Department should have a salary and an outfit; his character should be known; his credentials should be received; his compensation provided for by law; his correspondence should be public, inasmuch as it appertains to the public interest; and this secret, collusive, fraudulent and intimate which has so long existed should be broken up.

Sir, there is an agent, or an officer of the deposit banks or of the Treasury, now living in this city, with a salary, as has been proven, of near seven thousand dollars per annum; and yet, sir, the amount of his salary and the extent of his power are unknown, and the sources of his revenue have scarcely been touched or fathomed, for from upwards of ninety deposit banks, the select committee have not received returns from half the number; yet his direct compensation is now proven to be near the sum, over or under, of $7,000 per annum, from eleven or twelve institutions.

Mr. Chairman, the question arises, is there a necessity for such an officer of your Government? If so, there must be a necessity for making provision for his salary. If there be no such necessity, this House ought to declare it by rejecting the amendment I have offered.

Sir, for the broad investigation which has been attempted to be made into the nature of this agency, the character of the agent's business, the amount of his compensation, the time has been, as you know, [Mr. Pierce of New Hampshire, one of the select committee, then occupied the chair,] short and limited, so much so indeed that it was impossible to ascertain the nature or extent of either. On the 20th of January, as you well remember, in the committee resolutions were proposed, calling upon all the receivers and officers at a distance to furnish the committee with such information as they were possessed of touching the subject of our investigation. They passed upon that day, and upon the 13th February you will remember that a motion was made and carried in the committee that no further testimony be taken; allowing, therefore, only twenty-nine days to carry on this most extended correspondence. But, sir, the want of time was the smallest difficulty with which he had to contend. We had to contend with the whole power of the Executive, which was interposed, at every step and stage of the inquiry, to shield this agent, to suppress inquiry; and with such encouragement, such countenance, and such support, that agent treated the committee itself with contempt day after day, and time after time. Sir, we passed resolutions requiring that the witness should answer all questions of a public nature propounded to him; he responded by demanding that we should decide upon the preliminary question, his application for a week's delay. Even that the committee yielded to him, and then he finally refused to answer at all; and he was not only supported by a majority of the committee in these refusals, but he was supported also by a majority in this House: the same body, sir, which appointed the committee, professing to confer upon it the power, and requiring of it the duty to ascertain all that he or any other witness might know or had done in reference to the subject proposed to be inquired into. He persists in his refusal, and is sustained in it by the majority of the committee and of the House. Again he is summoned to appear at the bar of the House, to answer upon the most important subjects of the inquiry, but the majority again sustain him in his contumacy.

How charged are the notes of these gentlemen! Upon the 9th of April, 1836, when my friend, who sits before me from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) alluded to this agency and official connection as possibly existing, as none proven to have existed, the official organ came out with an authorized denial, emanating from the Secretary of the Treasury, of any official connection between that department and this agent; and volunteered a readiness upon the part of Whitney to respond to any and all questions which that gentleman might choose to ask! Then was the trumpet blown, and the battle begun.

Again, when the President was in the State of Tennessee, during the last summer, in a public speech to him at Jonesboro, he was called out to testify upon this subject, and what position did he then take? Why, that no such agency existed; that the allegation was false, a slander got up by the partisans of the bank to calumniate an injured man, who was persecuted by the Bank of the United States! And yet now, sir, when a committee is appointed to investigate these charges, and when the agent himself has an opportunity to testify to his innocence, and prove the falsehood of these charges against him, what position do the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the official organ, the innocent man, all take? Why that it is "inquisitorial," and that we deserve to be punished for calling upon an innocent man to disprove his own guilt!

Mr. Chairman, I feel authorized to say upon the authority of one of the members of this House from Pennsylvania, also a member of another select committee, (Mr. Muhlenberg,) not that he has himself told me, but I have it as coming from a gentleman who was present with him on the occasion, of which I have no doubt, that the President of the United States did say "THAT PEYTON AND WISE WERE THE MEN (OR FELLOWS!) WHO SHOULD BE PUNISHED, and that innocent man (Whitney) should be discharged." Have I been misinformed? The gentleman can answer. Did not that gentleman, in company with a gentleman from his own State, perhaps one of his constituents, visit the President a short time since; and in that visit did not the President denounce my friend and myself in strong terms, and say we ought to be punished, and Whitney discharged?

Now, sir, what was the course of the witness himself? This innocent man! Why, he avails himself of that protection which authorizes a man to refuse to testify against himself; a provision made for felons and malefactors, and never sought to be pleaded by any man who is not conscious of guilt. Let me, sir, allude to an illustrious example in history. When the Governor General of Hindostan, the celebrated Warren Hastings, was arraigned at the bar of the British House of Commons, upon charges impeaching his character, his official conduct, and his honesty, what did he say? Why, sir, even a man standing in the high and elevated position of Governor General of Hindostan, dared not assume the high ground this Whitney has taken in defiance of the American Congress, and in the face of the American people. "Mr. Hastings said he had only five days in which to make the refutation of charges it had been the labor of his accusers, armed with all the powers of Parliament, to compile during as many years of almost undisturbed leisure."

Yes, sir, the British Parliament armed its committees with all its powers. Whatever power the one had, was bestowed upon the other; and so should it be in the American Congress. Yet, sir, here was a committee of investigation, with a majority of six to three of its members politically opposed to the very object for which the committee was raised. I am not, however, to be understood as including the honorable chairman of that committee (Mr. Garland) in any thing that I may say. My allusion is to the appointment of the committee by the Speaker of the House. Now, let me ask, what power have three against six? Even when our honorable chairman, in his patriotic, just, and upright feelings, voted with us, which he very generally did, we were then only as four to five, and what could we do?

Sir, Warren Hastings further observes: "If truth can tend to convict me, I am content to be myself the channel to convey it."

Yes, sir, that was his language: "If truth can tend to convict me, I am content to be the channel to convey it." Warren Hastings, if guilty, knew the importance of assuming at least the semblance of innocence.

What a contrast does this conduct present to Whitney's! When we propounded questions to him, as to his connection with the public treasure, his connection with the deposit banks, and his fraudulent speculations in stocks and lands, he declined to answer. He then changes the position he had assumed in the Globe. He had advertised himself as an injured and innocent man, ready and willing to answer all and every thing he knew; but when he is brought to the test, he shrinks and skulks under what he conceives to be his privilege—a privilege always assumed by a man conscious of guilt, of not being his own accuser. Why, this very plea tantamounts to an acknowledgment of his guilt, and will be so held by the American people.

I will allude, sir, briefly to only one other evidence to the same effect, in which the majority of the committee made a similar interposition calculated to suppress inquiry, and I will then proceed to the consideration, more directly, of the amendment I have offered. Here was a question I propounded to William D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank at Philadelphia, and he took the same ground that Whitney did with regard to disclosures of correspondence.

"3. In the evidence of the president of said bank and yourself, you state that his (Mr. Whitney's) annual compensation was, enlis, $500, and that upon each of two occasions, as I understand the evidence, he received a gratuity of $500, in addition to his regular compensation. Will you have the goodness to explain to the committee for what extra or other services said allowances were made, if said services were rendered for the said bank as fiscal agent of the Government, in and about the public money on deposit, or to be on deposit in the same?"

Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Martin, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer."

"5. The president of the Girard Bank, of which you are cashier, expressed a willingness to annex to his statement heretofore sent to the committee, copies of every thing contained in books, papers, letters, orders, resolutions, contracts, correspondence, and memoranda," referred to in the interrogatories upon which his testimony was taken, from '1 to 10, and from 18 to 21, inclusive, and from 25, 26, and 31," but abstained from doing so, because he was aware that the cashier (you) was about being examined as a witness under the same compulsion, and upon these identical interrogatories, &c. and he further says, that he (meaning yourself) will annex to his deposition ALL the copies called for, and which it would be in his power to give, except of the correspondence directly from and to the Secretary of the Treasury, which is voluminous, &c. State, if you are willing, at this time, to give copies, or answer questions as to the purport of the memoranda, letters, &c. above referred to. If yes, annex copies, or state the purport of the same, if in your power.

Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Peyton, Hamer.

"Noes—Messrs. Gillet, Martin.

"The question was put to the witness, who replied as follows:

"Answer. I am not.

"Does or does not the correspondence, copies of which you have heretofore, in your testimony, and still decline to lay before the committee, between yourself as cashier of the Girard Bank, and R. M. Whitney as agent of that bank, relate to the public money in or out of said bank, its use, or the expected use, of the same? And state, further, whether the said correspondence, upon the side of said Whitney, is marked confidential; and, further, whether you have reasons to apprehend injury to the pecuniary interest of said bank, if you were to make a disclosure of the same?"

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Martin, Hamer.

"7. Do you know the facts upon which the president of said bank differs with you in relation to the propriety of producing said correspondence? If yes, state what are the facts.

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Fairfield, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Gillet, Martin, Hamer.

"8. Has or has not R. M. Whitney been compensated, directly or indirectly, for services rendered, or supposed to be rendered, to any deposit bank, or company, or individual, in procuring the use of money for or from any deposit bank, since he has been acting as agent for the deposit banks, or some of them? Speak from information which you may have received from him, said Whitney, or any agent or officer of said banks, or within your own knowledge, if any such exists.

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Martin, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"9. Is not R. M. Whitney a stockholder; if yes, to what amount, in any of the deposit banks at this time?"

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"10. Who wrote the original, of which the letter exhibit A is substantially a copy? At what time did Mr. Amos Kendall, if ever to your knowledge, come to a knowledge of the existence of such or a similar plan as is therein contained?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"11. Has, or has not, the bank of which you are cashier, derived information from R. M. Whitney, which enabled it to use public money on deposit advantageously for itself, or its friends, in speculation?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Peyton.

"Noes, Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"12. Did you hold a conversation with R. M. Whitney on the subject of the issuance of the Treasury circular of July 11, before its issuance; if yes, what information did he possess and communicate on that subject?"

"Mr. Fairfield objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"13. Could, or could not, large speculations have been made by banks, companies, or individuals, in consequence of knowing in advance that such a circular as that of July 11 last would be issued? If yes, state the modus operandi."

"Mr. Fairfield objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"14. Do you, or do you not, know that R. M. Whitney did communicate that information to his friends; and that large speculations were made by them in consequence of that information?"

"Mr. Fairfield objected to this question, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer."

My friend from Virginia, being absent, as he was almost all the time, at this period, engaged in the labors of the other committee.

This, sir, affords a pretty fair sample of the views and the construction given by the majority of the committee any power of inquiring into the indirect compensation derived by this agent in speculations with companies or individuals; and taken in connection with the course of the President, and the House itself, as well as the witness and some of the deposit banks, an imperfect idea may be formed of the difficulties with which the minority of this committee had to contend. But, Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee for a short time, for I do not mean to trespass on its patience, to the first resolution adopted by this majority, and then I will take up the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, and of one of his clerks. I will show, sir, and convince any man in this House, of whatever party he may be, who will give his ears to my statement, and do himself the justice to think, that the testimony and the resolution are in the direct face of each other. If I fail in doing so, I will surrender every thing like judgment in the case. Here is the resolution:

"Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have not all, or any of them,—mark that word "any" Mr. Chairman—"have not all or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department."

Well, sir, here is a declaration sufficiently explicit. The deposit banks have not, "any of them," employed an agent here to transact business with the Treasury Department."

I will now read a single clause from the testimony of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, Mr. McClintock Young. Here is what he says on oath:

"1. State all you may know upon the subjects of inquiry contained in the resolution of the House, which is now before you.

"Answer. There is an agent of some of the deposit banks residing in Washington, R. M. Whitney. My information on this subject is derived partly from letters from banks on file in the Treasury Department, and partly from having heard Mr. Whitney say he was employed by some of them as their agent. I know nothing of any agreement or contract he may have with any of those banks. The character of his business I believe to be to attend to their interests, so far as relates to their connection with the department; that is, he attends generally to all matters in which their operations are required in relation to the keeping, disbursing, and transferring of the public money. Those operations sometimes operate, as the banks say, injuriously to their interests, and he has frequently called on the Secretary, and other arrangements have been made, I presume and believe on his representations. I know not what compensation he receives. I am under the impression that I have heard him say that the three first selected banks in New York paid him one thousand dollars each."

And yet, Mr. Chairman, this resolution, which was introduced by you sir, (Mr. Pierce,) and adopted by the majority of the committee, expressly says that not "ANY" of the deposit banks have employed this agent to transact their business with the Treasury Department! How can that resolution stand with the testimony of the chief clerk of that department?

But, sir, it is possible to make this inconsistency still more apparent. I will quote the testimony of Levi Woodbury himself; and although his answers are elaborate arguments, page after page, yet, sir, when we come to the answering part of them, he is compelled to admit this official connection between him and his friend Reuben M. Whitney. He is compelled to show the nature of the business transacted personally by the agent, Whitney, as the authorized agent of some of the deposit banks, with the Department; and by the Department, through the agent, Whitney, as an "organ of communication" with the deposit banks. I will show it all, Mr. Chairman. Let any man attend to the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, and disbelieve it if he can. I will first read a short sentence or two to show the "official connection."

"Speaking of Whitney and other agents, he says:

"With all these agents before named, as well as many others, when transacting business for their principals, the official connection of the Department has, in all other respects, as well as in these, been similar."

Again he says:

"They have access to papers and every species of public information." "But in the case of the agent of the bank, no indulgence of any kind is known or believed to have been granted, which, if requested, has been withheld from the agents on other subjects, and especially the agents of corporations, or persons in public employment, nor any withheld which, in other like cases, has, on request, been granted."

"I can think of no further explanation desirable as to the official connection between the agent for some of the deposit banks and this Department."

Now, sir, I will show you what that official connection is.

"44. In the cases alluded to in your report of the 11th inst. where the Planter's Bank, Natchez, and the Commercial Bank, Cincinnati, confided authority upon said Whitney, as shown to you in a written communication, what was that authority, what were the claims or requests made by him, what was the case of the Commercial Bank at New Orleans?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, Peyton, Fairfield.

"No—Mr. Gillet.

"Answer. The cases referred to in my report of the 11th instant, where differences of opinion occurred, and an authority was produced, but not found necessary to be filed, were those of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati, and the Commercial Bank at New Orleans. I mentioned the Planter's Bank only as one in which a general notice had been given, and was on file, as to his agency, and a copy of which was annexed. The particular case of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati was, so far as I recollect, a letter which he held in his hand and read, wishing him to request the department to change the place to which some of the transfers outstanding against it were to be made, such as from other parts of Ohio, or Kentucky, New Orleans or Philadelphia; and stating the reasons for the request to be, that the banks in Ohio and Kentucky would probably demand specie, or be less accommodating as to the payments than those at a distance. I think it stated further, that an extension of some of the transfers was desirable, if the department could conveniently grant it, and complained that the time already allowed was too short. The agent also urged both these requests, assigning similar reasons, and that the time granted in several cases was less than that formerly allowed, under like circumstances, to the United States Bank to make transfers. I declined to change the places from Ohio and Kentucky, as requested, because, under the late deposit law, I felt bound to confine to the neighborhood those particular transfers, till about money enough was placed in Ohio and Kentucky to meet their share of the anticipated division of the surplus and the current expenditures, rather than send it to a distance; but the time for some of the transfers, which seemed too short, I proposed to extend as long as seemed to me proper. He, however, declined taking such extension in behalf of the bank, unless I could make it longer, thinking it would not be useful so little extended; and, therefore, I wrote to the bank itself what had been proposed to him and his declining it, and that I should, notwithstanding, give the extension which to me seemed suitable, and the bank, if not accepting it, might pay the money over at the time originally fixed. In respect to the Commercial Bank at New Orleans, the application by the agent was, according to my recollection, with a letter, setting out that the department had, by transfers and warrants, drawn out, or proposed to draw out, all or nearly all the public money in its possession, and wishing him to request it to revoke some of the transfers, and possibly to postpone some to a much later day if none could be revoked. I informed him that the bank must be in an error, as, before signing a transfer or sending one, I was always careful to see that it would not reduce a bank too low. I sent for the clerk who had charge of the subject, and examined into it critically, and declined to revoke any of them, as I felt satisfied that the bank and its agent considered the money the bank had been notified it would probably be called on to pay the State of Louisiana during 1837, but for which no transfers had then been issued, and which I told him would not be issued when the time of payment arrived, provided the bank should, before that time, be drawn down too low. I informed him, also, that the bank had, by mistake, included one transfer, in order to make out its case, which had never been issued, according to our records; and hence I could not revoke any that had been issued. He seemed to be satisfied that the bank was right. Whether any extensions of time were given in this case I do not remember, but know that none were given beyond the period of the quarterly payments to the States, for which purpose these transfers had been seasonably ordered."

Here, sir, there is the AUTHORITY, conceded by the banks to their agent, he holding in his hand the written authority, "NOT NECESSARY TO BE FILED." Sir, I am sorry for the character of the majority of the committee; I regret that this resolution should be as it is.

But I have not done. Although here is evidence which shows you the when, and where, and how, it shows you the manner of these bank transactions in all their details, as carried on through their agent. Not only has all this BUSINESS been transacted by him, but Mr. Woodbury says that, upon some occasions, this agent took an appeal from his decisions as secretary to the President of the United States; and not content with that, he even went, or threatened to go, to Congress for redress. We have seen, from one of his published letters, that this private gentleman seems to have a fancy for enlightening and instructing this opaque body, these ignorant members of Congress, on his magnificent schemes of banking and legislation. That is a part of his ordinary duty, for he writes to the deposit banks, to these moneyed corporations, to use their exertions in making a concentrated movement upon this body, so as to produce some stupendous pecuniary result favorable to the people and to himself, and which would enable him to fleece the people upon a more extended and liberal scale.

Having proven the official connection, and that some of the deposit banks transact their business with the Treasury Department through Whitney, I will now show that the Department has looked to Whitney as "an organ" to transact its business with the deposit banks. Here is the position assumed by the majority in their last resolution, "that Whitney's business is to communicate information to the banks." That he is a mere correspondent, and only half a correspondent at that. He communicates nothing from the banks to the Department; mark that, sir!

Now, although this resolution declares, upon the character and responsibility of the majority, that such are the facts, Mr. Woodbury swears he is the organ of communication to and from the banks. Why, sir, if two steam engines upon the same track of railroad were to meet together, they could not come more directly and violently in conflict than does this resolution of the majority of the Select Committee with the testimony of Mr. Woodbury; he says, "occasionally they [communications] are made through Mr. Whitney to the banks." Why, what more can be wanted, sir, to establish the utter falsehood of that resolution? Mr. Woodbury then says, "I am not aware of any letter on record from or to Mr. Whitney." &c. Oh, no, sir! No letter "on record." That was one reason for my offering the resolution I did. If all be right, and fair, and honest, it ought to be there, sir. It should be "on record." I want to break up this secret, fraudulent, collusion connection, upon which shadows, clouds, and darkness have so long rested, between that officer and this agent. So much for the first and last resolutions of the majority, as sustained by the testimony.

But, sir, the resolutions are not consistent with each other. The first, as we have seen, explicitly declares that not "ANY" of the banks have employed an agent at the seat of Government to transact business with the Department, but the last actually acknowledges that there is an agent for some purpose. But they say he merely transmits information to the banks from the Treasury Department, &c. Nothing is transmitted from the banks themselves, through him, to the Department! No business done by him. Why, sir, he is only half a correspondent, at that rate. A correspondent to send information to a bank from the Treasury Department, but not a correspondent to communicate any thing from a bank to that Department. Sir, is that so? Is it possible that any one can have a doubt about it? Let us see.

Here is what Mr. Woodbury says; and let us see how it agrees with the resolution:

"8. Is Reuben M. Whitney the person through whom all or any of the communications, verbal or written, which are or have been made by the Treasury Department, or by you personally, to the banks of deposit of the public money, of which he is agent, or which are or have been made by said banks to said Department, or to you personally?"

"Answer. In reply to this question, if properly understood by me, I would state that most of the communications received from the deposit banks, or made to them, are direct between them and the department, though occasionally they are made through Mr. Whitney in behalf of some of them. I am not aware of any letter on record, from or to Mr. Whitney as their agent, except as named in my report of the 11th instant; though, in some instances, I think, when making some request for information in their behalf, he has shown to me letters, or held them in his hand, which he said were from them.

"When the application in their behalf has been made by him verbally, and no letter has been written by them to the department, it has been customary to make him a verbal reply, if the business was of little importance; but, if it was considered of much magnitude, a written communication has generally been sent by the department directly to the bank concerned.

"Other persons, as remarked in my report to the committee on the 11th instant, have been the organ of communicating the wishes of several of the deposit banks on several occasions, and in a manner similar to that above described as to Mr. Whitney.

"9. Are most, or all, of the communications received by you or the department, from the deposit banks, or made to them by you or the department, directly or through Mr. Whitney, contained in your communication of the 11th instant to this committee; if not, where are they?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to its being propounded. On the question, Shall the interrogatory be propounded? It was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"Ayes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, and Peyton.

"No—Mr. Gillet.

"The question being propounded to the witness, he returned the following answer:

"All the communications made to or from the department, whether directly or through Mr. Whitney, which have been found on record or on file, and which relate to his appointment or compensation as agent, are believed to be annexed to my report to the committee on the 11th instant.

"But there are numerous other communications on other subjects with the deposit banks, relating to their duties and requests, &c. both to and from them, and which probably fill several volumes, and are now at the department.

"8. The names of the banks employing said agent are, with the few exceptions before alluded to, unknown to me, except by rumor.

"Besides the Planters' Bank at Natchez, and the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati, copies of whose correspondence have already been furnished, I think that in one or two cases of difference of opinion as to claims made by the banks, through their agent, and in those alone, a written communication was shown to me by him concerning the authority confided by them.

"But the final question in those cases not having been one as to competent authority on the part of the agent to do any official act in their behalf, but as to the sufficiency of the reasons in favor of the claims or requests made by him, and which are believed not to have been acceded to, it did not become necessary to ask the evidence of his authority to be filed; and no names are recollected beyond those above stated, except the Commercial Bank at New Orleans."

He says, Whitney is "to be the organ, at times, of presenting their wishes to the Department in respect to subjects connected with their public obligations; and to procure here, and communicate, the best intelligence in his power, on the state of the money market at home or abroad; on the condition of the currency and of the exchanges; and on the supposed legislation likely to happen in Congress, either as to the banks themselves, or as to heavy appropriations to be paid by them; and, in fine, on any other topic which he may consider interesting or beneficial to his employers."

Why not speak plainly like that? Why make use of an equivocation? Mr. Woodbury swears to the facts, and why report a resolution directly in the face of the facts, which overturns all he has affirmed on the subject? Why, it is impossible to make the case, by testimony, any plainer than he has done.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, come to the next resolution. It is as follows:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department has been employed at the request or through the procurement of said Department."

How could they get Levi Woodbury to swear that? No sir, they could not. I brought him to the book, and he swore, down that resolution "toto celo." We always wanted men, under oath, to prove these facts; and, when we got them, we either made them disclose and prove them, or we made them skulk and shrink under the term "inquisitorial," or else they cravenly and conscience-stricken screen themselves behind the constitutional provision which protects a felon from testifying to his own guilt. Well, what are Levi Woodbury's words? Here is the question propounded to him:

"Have you ever given a recommendation in favor of Whitney, or has he been employed through your procurement?"

"None, said he, unless that letter of the 5th of November, 1831, can be so construed."

Mr. Chairman, that was the very thing we wanted. He would not himself say but what that was a letter of recommendation for Whitney, and that it was so meant and so intended. He could not say otherwise; it would have been in the face of reason, and in direct violation of the most palpable construction of the English language, to deny that it is as strong a recommendation as was ever penned by man for both the scheme and the agent who was applying for the office.

But, sir, what does Mr. Elia, the confidential clerk of the Secretary of the Treasury in that Department, say?

"10. Do you know of any application made by Mr. R. M. Whitney to any officer of the Treasury Department, either for a recommendation to be employed as agent for any deposit bank, or for an agency or office in that Department connected with the deposit banks?"

"Answer. I do not, further than is contained in the letter of the Secretary to him, dated in November, 1831, appended to the Secretary's answer, which I have seen."

Here, then, we see that Levi Woodbury and his clerk admit the letter of recommendation. Now, what is that letter? It was written in reply to Reuben M. Whitney's letter of the 4th of November, 1831, enclosing a copy of the celebrated letter from certain deposit banks, written by Whitney himself, proposing to convert the Treasury Department into a Bank of the United States, with State banks for its branches, and placing Reuben M. Whitney at the head of a bureau in the Department, to be assimilated to a committee in the bank, called the Committee on the Branches, thereby placing the whole fiscal concerns of the country under his care and supreme control. These were the propositions contained in that letter. That Whitney should be placed at the head of such a bureau, with these powers, and for this object, with a salary of $5,000 per annum. When these propositions reached the ears of Mr. Taney, he never condescended to reply in writing to them.

Here is what he (Mr. Woodbury) says in reply to the former application:

"To that application I made answer the ensuing day, stating what was my own opinion, and what was understood to be the opinion of my predecessor, (corresponding with my own,) that the Treasury Department, under existing laws, had no authority to constitute any such office, or agency; and if one was appointed, it must be done by the banks themselves."

Now, when Whitney approached Levi Woodbury with this letter, it should be remembered when it was, and under what circumstances. When he came to Mr. Duane upon the 15th of June, 1833, almost three months before the deposits were removed from the Bank of the United States, he applied for this agency in advance, and the first sentence of his letter sets forth—

"That he having enjoyed the confidence of the President in a great degree, &c. and knowing the views of the President on the subject of the removal of the public deposits, &c. I look upon that measure as definitively resolved upon, so far as his views and recommendations have weight and influence. I have good reason to believe that the President will forward a communication from New York to you, expressive of his views and wishes upon this subject."

Whitney further says:

"I take the liberty of tendering to you my services to execute the duties and to solicit the situation.

He further states:

"I have never spoken to the President upon this subject, but circumstances lead me to think that I should not be otherwise than perfectly acceptable to him. The only persons to whom I have mentioned the subject, connected with the Government, are Messrs. Taney and Kendall—to the former gentlemen, a week since, at Baltimore, who replied in these words: 'I have always understood, and taken it for granted, that you were to have the situation when it is created.'"

Mr. Duane replied to this letter on the 17th June, 1833, and in that response to this impudent application he raised himself in the estimation of all honest men of every party. Whitney tried to introduce himself to Mr. Duane to become Secretary of the Treasury de facto, and thereby save that gentleman all trouble for thinking of himself. Mr. Duane made a very polite reply, and said:

"Whenever the President shall express his wishes in relation to any subject of public concern, or with regard to yourself, I will so act, I trust, as to merit the respect of the President and preserve my own."

This array of high officers had no effect on Mr. Duane.

This was the last communication that passed between Mr. Duane and Whitney.

He then, sir, comes upon Mr. Taney, backed by the recommendation of six banks, but with no better success than he met with from Mr. Duane.

Mr. Taney's conduct merits the highest praise, and I must do him the justice to say that he stated, upon his oath, that the statement of Whitney, as far as regarded himself, was false; that he never encouraged him; and, in his letter to Mr. Reverly Johnson, he puts his refusal on the ground of that individual's notoriously bad character, saying "his appointment would be received, I am sure, with one general, universal feeling of disapprobation, by friends and foes. I will never mortify my friends by such an appointment, &c." Ames Kendall also denies, in his evidence, having been consulted by Reuben M. Whitney, as stated in his letter to Mr. Duane. This is a question of veracity between Ames and Reuben, in which no honest man should interfere; let it, therefore, stand as a family affair between them. But a year afterwards, when Mr. Taney was gone, Mr. Duane swept away, and Mr. Woodbury came into the Department, then we find Whitney there. I asked one of the clerks, when did Whitney first come amongst them? Soon after Mr. Woodbury was placed at the head of the Department, was the substance of the reply. Yes, sir, then it was that Reuben M. Whitney became a "pet"—that he was taken to the Department—into the bosom of the Secretary. Let these things be remembered, and that he was just setting out upon his grand Northern tour, to make a personal application to the deposit banks to employ him as their agent, and that he was hunting up letters of recommendation to carry with him; the letter of Levi Woodbury of the 5th of November was obtained, and was used for that purpose every where he went. Mr. Woodbury, as we have seen, did not pretend to deny it was a letter of recommendation. Sir, in what company was this letter found? Whitney also applied for, and obtained, another strong letter of recommendation from one, as he says, "high in the confidence of the President." Here is the language of the anonymous letter itself:

"The President and Secretary of the Treasury, I know, view this subject in the same light that I do, and will be gratified if the banks will establish such an agency; and, from his talents, experience, and fidelity, no appointment would be more acceptable to them than that of Mr. Whitney, who has already been recommended to the Department."

This is the letter, the authorship of which has been suppressed by a majority of the committee, and by this House.

That letter was not signed. It was anonymous, but was carried in company with that of Mr. Woodbury. The bank at Burlington, Vermont, before whom they were laid, said, in reply, "that in all business transactions with the Government, they [the Board of Directors] have and wish to meet their views." Now, sir, what was this which the Board of Directors considered a "business transaction with the Government?"

It was the appointment of Reuben M. Whitney as their agent. Sir, it was impossible to misunderstand this letter of Mr. Woodbury. Take the construction put upon it by the Moyamensing Bank of Philadelphia, when it was laid before that bank as a recommendation of Mr. Whitney. In a resolution of the Board referring to this letter, they say: "R. M. Whitney, Esq. coming highly recommended, &c. we do therefore employ him," &c. This was the only letter of recommendation, as it appears, before the Board, and they consider it a high recommendation of Mr. Whitney. Yet, in the face of all this testimony, we have a resolution from the majority of the select committee, declaring that he has not been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department. That, sir, is the resolution. Here is the proof. How, let me ask, can they stand together? Many of our friends have manifested no little uneasiness to me, knowing the multitude of difficulties thrown in the way of this investigation; but I can tell them, Mr. Chairman, with confidence, that, when they see how much direct positive proof we have elicited, they will admit that all we have ever said, ever thought, or imagined to have existed, will fall far, very far, short of the developments which are made. I have been astonished myself at the evidence brought to light before this committee.

A few words upon the fifth resolution of the majority, and I will pass on. In effect, this is the substance of the resolution: that it is agent, such as he is, is a mere correspondent, a mere channel to convey information to the banks, but never from the banks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the House to one other subject upon this branch of the case. You all remember the celebrated Treasury circular of the 29th of August, 1835, in which Mr. W. assumed upon himself the power to prescribe what bank notes should or should not be received in payment for the public lands, and which winds up with a threat that, upon any violation of his orders, he was authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that "his [the Secretary's] would take prompt measures!" &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you recollect how this was denied, evaded, attempted to be concealed, and how the Globe published mutilated accounts of it; and yet, sir, when we get Mr. Woodbury and even Reuben Whitney himself upon the stand, they both acknowledge it to be genuine! that it is a bona fide order, concerning upon Whitney all the power the circular purports he possessed. Here is the question, sir, which brought it out:

"32. Have you ever used the following language in any of your circulars, letters, or instructions to any of the public officers, to wit: 'I have forwarded a copy of this to each of the public receivers, and have no doubt that they will act with such fairness that no injustice will be done to any one of the deposit banks. Should it ever be otherwise, and any one of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint?' If yes, state whether you had received any such authority from the Secretary of the Treasury."

"Answer. I refer the committee to my printed letter of the 29th of August, 1835, (see appendix, 1, 2,) in which will be found the paragraph quoted in this interrogatory.

"In effecting the arrangements informed of in that letter, a fear was expressed by some of the banks that the banks and receivers might not act in perfect fairness with each other; and that some of the banks might be subject to impositions under the arrangements they entered into. I communicated the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, viewing, as I believed, the arrangements an important one for the community, and for the purpose, as I supposed, of inspiring the banks with confidence that they would not be imposed upon, told me I might commu-icate the substance of what is contained in the concluding part of the quotation, though probably in other words.

"That printed letter was forwarded to the public land receivers by me as a mere matter of information, but not of instructions."

Now, sir, that that statement of Reuben Whitney is true can be shown by the facts and circumstances of the transaction: Mr. Woodbury knowing his intention of sending the circular, and actually franked that very circular, to those receivers and those banks, knowing what it contained, as he in effect admits himself. I will cite the question propounded to Reuben Whitney himself on this subject of franking:

"34. Have you or have you not issued such circulars as are above mentioned to any other officer or officers of the Government? If yes, to whom and when? either furnish the committee with copies, or state their purport if you cannot furnish copies."

"Answer. I do not recollect to have issued any circulars, except such as were intended for the deposit banks, copies of which, in the instance referred to, were sent to the public land receivers, and for the purpose mentioned."

"35. In forwarding to the public officers and the deposit banks the before mentioned circulars, or making any other communications to them, have you at any time used the frank of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of that Department? If yes, state whether it has been your habit to do so."

"Answer. The Secretary of the Treasury franked, or authorized to be franked, two or three of the circulars furnished to the committee, marked A, one of which was forwarded to many, if not all, of the deposit banks; and of one of them, a copy was sent to each of the receivers, also franked by him; also tables, showing the condition of the deposit banks, which I have occasionally prepared, the character of which was, in all cases, made known to him, on the papers themselves being first shown to him. Beyond these I do not recollect that he has ever franked, or authorized to be franked, any communications to the banks, or to any person, whatever, of mine."

But, sir, another, and one of the strongest evidence that this illegitimate, collusive association between your Secretary of the Treasury and this deposit bank minister near your Treasury Department ought to cease. Why, sir, Reuben Whitney has access to every document, letter, and paper in that department, whether it concerns the public money, the deposit banks, or any other matter. Not only so, sir, but he will go to your department, enter the rooms of the clerks, and take from the files such original papers as he sees fit, and carry them through the street to his own room, where he will keep them till the next day, or till it suits his pleasure or convenience to return them. That, sir, is the positive and direct testimony of one of the clerks, Mr. McGinnis. It occurred, he testified, during the present session of Congress. A Senator wishing to obtain some information from the department, instead of applying himself to the Secretary, he goes at once into Whitney's room, to the fountain head of information, and Whitney goes into the clerk's office, takes down the file, and carries it to his own room. The statement of the witness is, that he said Thomas H. Benton, Senator from Missouri, wished to obtain some information from him, and he accordingly took the original files containing it, passing down stairs from the third story of the building, passed along the avenue, and then entering at another door, took them to his own room, where he and the Senator kept them all night, and it was some time next day before they were returned, when the fact was, for the first time, made known to the Secretary, who rebuked the clerk, but had not the boldness to rebuke Mr. Whitney. No, sir, it was all right, so far as he was concerned, for neither the clerks nor the Secretary dare resist him. You have humbled yourself to his power; he is above you; why, you must all bow to Reuben M. Whitney as well as to his master! Not a word of rebuke to him, sir; oh, no. The helpless, honest clerks, are crushed, but Reuben M. Whitney is retained; and, although he is not paid by the Secretary, or nonchalantly out of the public money, yet he is under the same roof, in the same building with the Secretary, may, they use the same wash basin, and Reuben M. Whitney can take almost any and every liberty he pleases. Hence his power, his employment, his exultations.

On another occasion he goes into a store, and seeing some handsome paper that took his fancy, he instantly orders some of it to be sent over, and to be charged to the department. All's right, sir, it was ordered by "Mr. Whitney." The witness, Mr. Sullivan, testified to this fact, and he produced his ledger showing the entries corroborating the fact.

Not only so, sir, but the Secretary of the Treasury has acknowledged upon oath instances where Whitney thought for the Secretary, where his talents were brought into requisition for the service of the Department, where his statements have been sent to Congress by the Secretary as his own. This is not right. We have two Secretaries—one to think and write, and another to receive the salary. Surely, the thinking one ought to be paid, and it seems the salary of the other ought to be increased, or he ought to be removed. I give my reason, sir. He must be hard run for change. Why, sir, he sent in to the committee a claim for five days' attendance, at two dollars a day, amounting to the enormous sum of ten dollars. The Congress of the United States ought certainly to increase his salary, and make it six thousand and ten dollars. But how did he get it up to ten dollars? Why, he would come to the committee room, undergo an examination of half or three quarters of an hour, or less, and then say he was compelled to leave the committee on official business. In this way he made out seven days, and sent his account, in writing, by a confidential messenger, with authority to receive the money; but it turned out that no more five days could be made out from the journal, by which he said he would be governed in this important affair, and so he gets his ten dollars. This, Mr. Chairman, is Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury! It reminds me of a little incident I heard of him. As I descended the Ohio on my way home last summer, I was informed by a very intelligent gentleman who was educated at the same seminary with him. He spoke of Levi Woodbury as the stingiest boy in the whole school, who was never known to expend one cent. One day, however, (said he,) he, in company with my informant, went to a large collection of the people, (an election, I believe,) and contrary to all expectation, he bought a ninepence worth of milk punch, and divided it with his friend. They returned to college; and when this unprecedented act of liberality, on the part of Levi Woodbury, was made known, many would not believe it. What, that he should buy a ninepence worth of milk punch, and divide it with a friend! It was incredible! And upon the establishment of the fact, there was a general illumination in commemoration of the occasion. And, Mr. Chairman, let no man disbelieve this punch story, after this ten dollar affair.

[NOTE.—On the 10th of March, several days after this speech was delivered, Mr. Peyton called for a copy of Mr. Woodbury's account, to be published with his remarks, but was informed by the clerk that Mr. Woodbury had withdrawn his account. Ten dollars saved for distribution among the States.]

Mr. Chairman, one great necessity for legislation on this subject, is the attitude assumed both by the deposit banks and by their agent. It is this: That the deposit banks are responsible only to the Secretary of the Treasury or his agent, but that they owe no responsibility to Congress. That is the position which they assume. Notwithstanding they have undertaken the charge of the deposits under the act of Congress, yet they insist that Congress has no power of supervision or inspection over them, because it has delegated that power to the Secretary. Then how does it stand? Here is your ten dollar milk-punch Secretary and Reuben Whitney, who have entire and unlimited control over the treasure of the nation, from which there is no appeal! Conceive the case, sir, of the whole being seized, and a division of the spoils about to take place. According to this doctrine, Congress has not even the power to interpose and save it! That is the position which they assume.

What does the Secretary himself tell you? That, notwithstanding from the first instructions given by the President, through Mr. Duane to Amos Kendall, special agent to visit the banks, and see upon what terms they would receive the deposits, it was expressly stipulated that an agent should be appointed, with full power to examine into the condition of them all, not to be sure, touching their private affairs; and that, notwithstanding this power was contemplated in the first contract with the original deposit banks, and the insertion of such a provision in the recent law, yet, what does Levi Woodbury say? Why, he says "I have not, and never will appoint such an agent." What is the pretension now? Why, that the banks are the principals, and Whitney their agent—a shameful perversion of terms, sir. Reuben Whitney is their dictator and their plunderer. Let me give you an instance.

Three banks in the city of New York fixed his salary at $600 per annum for each bank. The Bank of America even passed a resolution that he should have no more than that amount; but he soon compelled them to reverse their resolve, and he demanded $1,000 from each; they yielded to his demands. He is now their agent, and is in the receipt of this sum annually from each.

There is another and a still more flagrant case. The Bank of Burlington, Vermont, in reply to his importunities, almost goes on its knees to beseech him to have mercy on it; for that, owing to its remote and isolated situation, they have no need of an agent. But he renewed and repeated his requisitions, till they were driven finally to make an unconditional surrender, telling him "we have employed you, but have fixed no salary; we leave that to yourself." And he fixed it, sir, accordingly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a peculiar way of managing these matters between Whitney and the banks; and as I am in possession of it, and as every gentleman, of every party here, ought to wish to know it, I will read it for their especial edification.

President of the Bank to R. M. Whitney.

"BURLINGTON, Feb. 12, 1835.

"Your letter, dated the 23d ult., is received, on the subject of an agency of the deposit banks. I have communicated the same to our board of directors, and am instructed to say that, in all business transactions with the Government, they have and wish to meet their views and do the public business entrusted to them to their satisfaction.

"So far as this institution may be profited by an agency, as it respects business, public or private, they will cheerfully pay a sum commensurate to such advantages."

Cashier of the Bank of Burlington to R. M. Whitney.

"BURLINGTON, Jan. 25, 1836.

"Being located in the same place where a branch of the United States Bank was established, and as we are a deposit bank, where the branch has discontinued its operations, the public seem to expect that we could at once afford the same facilities and accommodations they have enjoyed when the branch was doing business. There has been, on the part of our directors, a desire to meet this expectation; and the consequence has been, that a very sensible change has taken place, politically, in favor of the Government; and as it is our desire to strengthen these sentiments, we feel that it is important to afford to our farmers and merchants the coming spring a pretty extensive accommodation, especially about the time of the wool clip.

"My wish is, that you would have an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of allowing the present amount to remain; or, rather, that the warrants in favor of the pension agent should not be made upon the deposit for next spring."

R. M. Whitney to the Cashier of Bank of Burlington.

"WASHINGTON, March 18, 1836.

"I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and went to the Commissioner of Pensions, and can assure you that you have nothing to fear from the efforts of your neighbors. No other bank will be employed by either Department, unless compelled to do so by the legislation of Congress. Mr. Everett, a member from your State, has been trying to have the pensions paid in another quarter, (Windsor, I suppose.)

"You need not fear but I will look after and protect your business."

From same to same.

"WASHINGTON, August 22, 1835.

"As it may be important for you to know, as a guide in your operations, I can state to you, that, until January next, I feel confident you may safely calculate upon the Treasury deposits being kept up to the maximum of what your bank can hold; say three-fourths of the amounts of capital."

Now, sir, does not that paper at once convince the most incredulous that this bank applied for the use of the public money for the purpose of effecting political changes in favor of the administration? It will not be denied that it did have that effect in some degree, and that the bank continued to exert its influence for like purposes, especially about the time of the elections—about the time of the wool clip—when they were told they should have liberally of the public money; the people were literally fleeced—died in the wool, sir, died in the wool. In the month of August, Whitney tells them "you shall have as much as your bank can hold" for six months to come.

I wish here to say, sir, that no man can feel more the necessity that I felt myself under, as a man and as a member of this body, to discharge what I think should be considered a solemn duty to my country, and a duty also to myself, to take the course I have done in this investigation. And, sir, I knew well what I would have to deal with. I may well say that, considering the use made of the Executive power, I am astonished we have been able to do any thing, but we have accomplished more than the most sanguine of us ever contemplated. I was assailed in the official journal, as you well remember, sir, as having made a false and slanderous statement in regard to Mr. Taney and Reuben Whitney. Mr. Taney has himself testified to the truth of my statement. But, sir, I have had more to bear, and I have borne it more patiently from others than even from Mr. Whitney. Sir, I care nothing about Whitney. If I did not think he was doing a serious public injury, his name nor his concerns would ever occupy my thoughts. I solemnly believe, before God and man, before this House and the country, that Reuben M. Whitney has been stimulated to treat me with rudeness, and with personal violence. Hence his course in the committee, where he cast, as it were, his offensive card in my face, coupled with the most insulting frowns on account of what I had stated in relation to Mr. Taney's refusing to countenance him. Out of that transaction statements have gone forth and been scattered far and wide, comments have been made, facts have been sworn to, which, Mr. Chairman, never had an existence. I am as charitable I hope as any one to my fellow-men, but gentlemen have stated what I know to be incorrect.

Sir, that my friend from Virginia (Mr. Wise) on that occasion left his chair, and walked with me when I went to Whitney, and rebuked him for the manner in which he had treated me, is not only unlikely, but impossible. Sir, before God, such a thing never happened! The gentlemen gave their statements upon oath. Well, sir; that only shows, perhaps, that they might have been at the time in a condition not to recollect any thing. I was astonished at the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Fairfield) stringing together such a set of oaths as he did, and that other gentlemen should take a copy of them to swear to; nay, more, that there should be a concerted movement upon the subject of getting those oaths upon the journal of this House. Now, that I made use of unbecoming language I will not deny, because I was highly excited at the time; but I instantly apologized to the committee. I would not have used such language, certainly, under ordinary circumstances of excitement. But, sir, that gentleman should calmly and deliberately undertake to make it a matter of record in this House, is unaccountable, and wholly unprecedented. Why, sir, the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Fairfield) strung together a set of oaths that would prove to every body in America that I was no swearer. He has strung them like a silly country girl stringing birds' eggs; hen-eggs, duck-eggs, goose-eggs, and turkey eggs—mixed with a little Yankee pumpkin—out of time, and out of place, without sense or meaning in them. Sir, I cannot account for this but in one way, as I am unwilling to attribute improper motives to that gentleman, who is one of that class of Christians who consider swearing an unpardonable sin, but can look with perfect complacency upon the robberies perpetrated upon the Treasury by Reuben M. Whitney.

I say, sir, I cannot charitably account for that gentleman's want of memory but in one way; and that was, the manner in which Dr. Glover's friends accounted for his mistake on a certain occasion. It was during the late war, on the Northwestern frontier, when the Doctor, with a small detachment, ventured out from the main army, and remained all night. About daylight next morning he was seen coming panting and blowing. "What's the matter, Doctor?" "Matter enough, (cried he,) a thousand Indians out yonder, firing all around the camp, and have killed every one of the boys!" "Is it possible! What party can it be?" "Tecumseh's party; for I heard General Tecumseh say, as plain as any thing I'll have Dr. Glover's scalp before day, by G—d." Well, sir, all the boys soon came in, one at a time, and it turned out to be nothing but the howl of a wolf which had alarmed the excellent Doctor's fears so much.

And, sir, the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Gillet,) what was his condition, that he is able to swear with such particularity on every word which passed on the occasion? He was between a wild and a shy, peeping for a place to get out, like a wild turkey out of a pen, alarmed, no doubt, at the giant frame of Reuben. He knew about as much of what passed, as the lame captain did of the battle which he did not wait to see. You recollect the case of the lame captain, sir. He was in the woods with his men, and suddenly coming upon the Indians, cried out, "Boys, here they are!" peeping under the bushes, said he, "they are very numerous, and my opinion is they'll whip us; but fight hard, retreat in good order; as I'm a little lame, I'll go now."

But, sir, I forgive these gentlemen for all they have said, or thought, or have sworn against me, because I hope they believed it.

Mr. Chairman, I have but one other question to ask, and then I take leave of Reuben M. Whitney for ever,—and that is, Who is he? How came he in the Treasury? Why is he possessed of so much power? Why, sir, gentlemen, under the 29th interrogatory, have gotten a few favorable responses, "so far as the witness: knew, individually, as to his character, for integrity and capacity." They got hold of one man, a director in the Massachusetts Bank, who would not trust him with his private affairs, from his general character. When we asked Levi Woodbury whether, from his general character, he would believe Reuben M. Whitney on his oath, even to him. Why, sir, Whitney invited an investigation into his character; he went to Canada, and Philadelphia, and Washington, and challenged the world to inquire into his conduct and standing. Yet, sir, whenever, in the committee, we approached his character, gentlemen shrunk back, and proclaimed that we had no power to ascertain whether this secret Treasury agent was an honest man and a patriot, or a rogue, bankrupt, and traitor.

I, sir, propounded the following interrogatories; which were rejected:

"32. Do you know R. M. Whitney's general character? If yes, what is his character as an honest, trustworthy man? Would you, from his general character, believe him on his oath, or trust him when he was subject, by great pecuniary temptation, to err?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Aye—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Martin, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Garland.

"33. Has he, or has he not, borne the general character, at and about Philadelphia, of having been a traitor, and one of the British emissaries who were engaged in smuggling gold from the United States of America, to pay the British troops in Canada, during the late war; and of having acknowledged and made a boast of the same to gentlemen in Philadelphia? Did he not sustain the general character in Philadelphia, after the war, of being the keeper of a gambling-house, or faro bank, in that city? Does he not now sustain the character of a bankrupt, who is defrauding his just creditors, while he is living in the prison-bonds of this city in a style of princely extravagance?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"Ay—Mr. Peyton.

"Noes—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Martin, Gillet." Now, sir, is Reuben M. Whitney fit to be trusted with the management of your treasure? Is he not a notorious bankrupt, now living within the prison bounds of this city? I have filed with the minority report a transcript, which the committee rejected, but which I obtained myself from the records, showing the amount of judgments now in damages against him in the court of this District to be upwards of $95,000. Sir, we offered to prove, not only that Whitney was a bankrupt, but that he was guilty of the most dishonest practices to defraud his just creditors. We also offered to prove a declaration of Whitney himself, that, if his creditors would not compromise with him upon his own terms, he would take the benefit of the insolvent act. We could have proved that all that splendid and princely establishment of his, belonged, or had been made over, to others, and that he did not own a dollar in his own name. And yet, sir, he gives diplomatic dinners. His Britannic Majesty's Ministers live not in a more costly and magnificent style than does R. M. Whitney. Yes; you who have sat at his board, and feasted at his table, ate the meat and drank the wine of his honest creditors. Yes, sir, on the very night of that day when Whitney took his stand in contempt of the authority of this House, in defiance of its power, he gave a splendid dinner, and many, I know, of the members of this House attended. The President elect, the Vice President elect, and all the heads of the departments, went up to do him reverence. Why, sir, he greatly surpassed your ten dollar Secretary. Nine hundred invited guests; $500 in champagne; not Woodbury's sort, but the best which the public money could command. Sir, let me ask you, if the committee had then reported him for a contempt, what condition would this House have been in the next morning to pass on his case? Would gentlemen here, with Whitney's wine thumping in their heads, with his beef eaten the night before still undigested, have been prepared to send him to prison, as a court of justice would have done, there to remain until he was willing to answer interrogatories? Reuben, perhaps, thinks, as many others do, that the shortest way to men's affections is down their throats!

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a little remarkable that even gentlemen who were on the bank committee of 1832, where his perjuries and his treason were proven, and who could not, consequently, have been ignorant of his character, were of that party. Many gentlemen doubtless went without knowing his character; some went by the force of example; others because, perhaps, they liked a good dinner more than they hated Reuben M. Whitney, though they knew his character.

Mr. PEYTON: Here read from the minority report of the bank committee of 1832:

"There was one occurrence, during the transactions of Thomas Biddle and Co. with the bank, which merits particular notice.

"An informer and witness, by the name of Whitney, who had formerly been a director of the bank, was produced, who declared upon oath, that, in May, 1834, two of the cashiers of the bank had informed him that Thomas Biddle and Co. had been in the habit of drawing money out of the bank on deposit of stock in the teller's drawer, without paying interest; and that the president of the bank had discounted two notes, one for Thomas Biddle and Co. and one for Charles Biddle, without the authority of the directors. This witness stated that he went with these officers of the bank and examined the teller's drawer and the discount book, and found the facts which had been stated to him verified by the examination. He also stated, to give additional certainty to his assertions, that he made a memorandum at the time, with the dates of the transactions; which memorandum he produced to the committee. Having thus unalterably fixed the date of the transaction, as if by some fatality, he went on to say that he immediately proceeded into the room of Mr. Biddle, the president, and remonstrated with him against the irregular proceedings, and that Mr. Biddle promised him that they should not occur again.

"In the interval between the adjournment of the committee that day and its meeting the next, a member of the board of directors suggested to Mr. Biddle that he was, about the time of this alleged transaction, in the city of Washington. On examining the journal of the board, and the letter book, it was found, by entries and letters, that, for several days previous to the alleged interview between the president and Whitney, and for several days afterwards, the president was absent, on a visit to this city, on the business of the bank, and General Cadwallader was acting as president in his place. Thus was this artfully devised story, which was intended to blast the reputation of a high-minded and honorable man, through one of those extraordinary interpositions by which Providence sometimes confounds the contrivances of the wicked, made to recoil upon the head of its inventor, who must for ever stand forth as a blasted monument of the speedy and retributive justice of Heaven.

"The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee, a majority of whom were the political friends of said Whitney, and three of that majority, to wit, Messrs. F. Thomas, of Maryland, C. C. Cambreleng, of New York, and Col. R. M. Johnson, of Kentucky, are now members of the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the charges brought against the president, of lending money to Messrs. Thomas Biddle and Co. without interest, and of discounting notes for that house, and for Charles Biddle, without the sanction of the directors, are without foundation; and that there does not exist any ground for charging the president with having shown, or manifested any disposition to show, any partiality to those individuals in their transactions with the bank.

"The following questions were propounded to said Whitney, when examined before that committee in 1832:

"Question by Mr. Watmough:

"Now have you been a resident of this country?

"Answer. I was born in this country.

"Question by same:

"Were you not a resident of Canada during the late war?

"Answer. I resided there from 1808 to the spring of 1816, when I removed to this city.

"Question by Mr. Adams:

"In what place in Canada did you reside during the late war?

"Answer. In Montreal. I went to Canada as a clerk. I afterwards became engaged in business on my own account. When the war broke out, I had a great deal of money scattered about in that country, having sold much on credit; all of which I should have sacrificed by leaving it when war was declared. I remained, therefore, having the permission of the British Government to do so.

"Question by Mr. Adams:

"Did you ever ask permission of the Government of the United States to remain there?

"Answer. I never did.

"Question by Mr. Adams:

"On what conditions did the British Government permit you to remain in Canada during the war?

"Answer. I took an oath to observe the laws of the country while I remained there.

"Question. Did you understand that to be an oath of allegiance?

"Answer. No; I did not, permanently.

"Not 'permanently.' No, sir, he only took an oath of allegiance during the war, from 1812 to 1816.

Sir, this lame apology, which places Whitney's avarice in bold relief with his patriotism, is wholly untrue. He was a traitor, who obtained the favor of the King of England, by perpetrating treason against his own country, as he did the favor of General Jackson, by perjury against the bank, of which he had been a director.

How could these gentlemen who were on the bank committee, (Messrs. Francis Thomas, of Maryland, Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Churchill C. Cambreleng, of New York,) and who voted for that resolution which affixed to his name eternal infamy, how could they honor him with their presence at that dinner?

[Here Mr. THOMAS rose to explain. Mr. PEYTON then called on Mr. J. Q. ADAMS, to know if what he had read from the report of the minority of the bank committee was not correct. Mr. ADAMS rose, and corroborated the facts set forth in the report. Mr. THOMAS replied; and then Mr. ADAMS rejoined.]

Mr. PEYTON resumed. I will not, Mr. Chairman, repeat what is better understood, and much more ably expressed, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams.) I will take one admission of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Thomas,) which will seal the fate and stamp the character of Reuben M. Whitney beyond redemption. He bears witness to the honorable bearing and unimpeachable character of the officers of the bank, and says, they are incapable of falsehood, but attempts an escape for Whitney on the ground of mistake. That is impossible. Whitney swears that Thomas Biddle & Co. "had been in the habit of drawing money out of the bank without paying interest; that the president of the bank had discounted notes for Thomas Biddle and Co. and Charles Biddle, without the authority of the directors; that, on a certain occasion, and on a given day, he went into the president's room, remonstrated with, and extorted a promise from him that he would not be guilty of such favoritism again. Now, sir, every officer of that bank solemnly swore that there was not one word of truth in any one of these charges. There is no ground for mistake; there must be perjury somewhere: the gentleman acquiesces the officers of the bank. Could the president have forgotten it, if Whitney had broken into his room, and have given him such a rebuke, and have extorted from him such a promise? Impossible. Here I drop Reuben M. Whitney's perjury. Let gentlemen reconcile it if they can, and associate with him if they choose. It is a matter of fact, about which I will not quarrel with them.

A few words more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. When the true patriot, quitting his peaceful avocations in the workshop, or the field, dropping his plough handles, or his spades, regardless of home and its endowments, tearing himself from the wife of his bosom, and shaking off the children even that cling around his knees, rushed to the rescue of his bleeding country; when the star-spangled banner, consecrated and hallowed as it was, and is, with so many and such glorious recollections, was seen streaming to the breeze, all bathed in blood, its crimson folds appealing to every American heart to rally around and defend it; when the clond of war, lurid with the cinders of the Capitol, hung over this devoted city; when, on the night of the 23d, and morning of the ever-glorious 25th, General Jackson, with the chivalry of the West, was winning imperishable renown, and rearing to the American name a monument which will stand a landmark on the steeps of Fame whilst Mississippi tells his waters to the ocean, where, then, was Reuben M. Whitney? A traitor in the hostile camp! The sworn subject and officer of a foreign Power! A British commissary, smuggling gold, and driving herds to pay and feed the British troops! Could he, with one throb of American feeling in his bosom, have remained within hearing of his country's cannon, pealing on the plains of Chippewa and Bridgewater, and thundering from the leaguered battlements of Erie, without trampling in the dust his traitor's livery, and adding one arm to those which struck for victory and his native land! Sir, he could and did; and yet this man is high in the confidence of an Executive who is mainly indebted for his station to the laurels which he won in that contest, and is enabled to defy with impunity the process of a committee of Congress! Gaines and Scott, and other gallant spirits, whose achievements brighten so many glorious pages of our history, are disparaged, censured, and sought to be disgraced, while this minion of favoritism is to be shielded and protected, in contempt of justice, and in defiance of the lawful authority of this House.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, Friday, February 24, 1837.—The bill to reduce the tariff being still under consideration, and the question being on the motion of the Hon. Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, to reduce the duty on salt—

Mr. DAVIS arose and addressed the Senate in substance, as follows:

I feel it my duty, on this occasion, to say a few words in reply to some remarks which have fallen from gentlemen on the other side, and which seemed to me to be intended personally for myself and my colleague, as representing one of the Eastern States of this Union. My colleague is abundantly able to answer for himself, and will, no doubt, do so in due time. This discussion has taken a wide range, and it has been thought worth while to open the history of the tariff act of 1828. Many of us were witnesses of the transactions referred to; and I do not regret that some time has been occupied on that subject, as it may be a means of sending forth to the country a representation of some affairs not remarkably well understood. We of the North did not very well know how to account for it, when we saw you, sir, (Mr. King, of Alabama, who was in the chair,) and other Southern gentlemen, voting to keep up heavy protecting duties, while, at the same time, you inveighed with so much severity against the whole protective policy. We were aware that there was some key to the apparent enigma, and now we have had the whole secret fully unfolded.

We could not, indeed, be so stupid as not to comprehend the general tenor of the act of 1828. What was the origin of that act? In 1827, those who were engaged in the woollens interest felt themselves aggrieved that the protective privileges secured to them under the act of 1824 had been impaired by the legislation of Great Britain, and they came to Congress asking the enactment of such a law as should restore them to the same footing as they had enjoyed under the act of 1824. No action was had at that time, but their application was renewed in 1828, and out of these circumstances grew the famous act which has not unfrequently been denominated a Bill of Abominations. I do not know who first christened it by this name. I am not personally answerable, although I do not think the name was very much misapplied. The introduction of the bill occasioned a long discussion. Instead of giving the woollens interest a little aid, it was found that the Committee on Manufactures had introduced into the bill almost everything. There was a heavy protecting duty on hemp, which nobody asked for; duties on duck, on iron, on spirits, although no petition had been presented calling for any one of them. These, and a number more, were gratuitously put into the bill; but when we came to look for what was done for the woollens interest, we found nothing at all. We asked for bread, and you gave us a stone. A high duty, it is true, was imposed on foreign woollens, but a proportional duty was laid upon wool, which completely annulled the benefit to the manufacturer. The bill was made to respond to other matters entirely foreign from its professed object. We are not so ignorant as not to know that there were mixed considerations of policy, and various interests concerned, in a measure so complicated in its character. When we saw southern members voting to keep up high duties on iron and sail cloth, and hemp, we thought there was some hidden meaning which prompted such a course. Now, as I before observed, we have the full interpretation. The policy of the South has been avowed, and we find that the object was to make the bill so very bad as to drive those who had asked for protection to vote against it. But when it came to the final vote, many of those who had most vehemently opposed the bill, suddenly turned about, and voted in its favor. This I could not do. So I, for one, followed exactly the course which, as it now appears, it was designed I should. I voted against the bill. It passed, however, to the obvious disappointment and surprise of many southern gentlemen, who had calculated on the opposition of every New England representative. I have only adverted to this history for the purpose of showing that we of the New England States, and especially the woollens interest, were selected as the scapegoat; that while the bill was constructed in such a way as to satisfy all the Middle and Western States, that interest which most needed protection, and which had earnestly petitioned for it, was entirely deserted.

Then came the bill of 1832, a bill of somewhat the same character with that which had preceded it. I deliberated long on the course which it was my duty to pursue, and, in conclusion, felt myself constrained to vote against that, as I had against the bill of 1828. When the period of my election came round, my opponents said that I had been found in bad company, and that I had stood side by side with southern men in voting against a bill for protecting duties; and it was thence argued, by a similar course of reasoning to that which has been applied in the present debate, that I was an enemy to the tariff. A man, it was said, might be known by his company, and as I had voted in the same way with avowed opponents of the whole tariff policy, I must be set down as agreeing with them in sentiment.

Then followed the bill of 1833. I was called to act upon that, also, and the journals of the Senate will show that I voted in the negative, as I had done on the two former occasions. I took occasion at that time fully to express my sentiments in regard to that measure. They are in print, and will speak for themselves. The bill, however, passed, and became a law of the land, and, for myself, I acquiesced in it, as all citizens should do; nor am I aware that my State has discovered any disposition to interfere with its provisions.

But something has been said here upon the subject of pledges. The Senator from Virginia, and some other members of the Senate, have observed that they have neither heard nor seen any recognition of pledges on this side the House to the observance of the act of 1833 as a compromise. I do not know that these remarks were intended to have a personal reference to myself, but yesterday the Senator from Virginia made the former remarks more pointed and personal, observing that he had carefully watched, throughout the debate, and had listened to hear, whether any Northern Senator would acknowledge himself to be bound by the act as a bargain, and had heard no such word from any one of them. He had heard no pledges from this side of the House. Pledges to what? What pledges does he demand? What did he expect? Is he not in favor of this bill? He says that the compromise act is nothing more to him than any other piece of paper. He approves the present bill, and will vote for it. Well, sir, and how stands the matter with his friends? Who brought this bill forward? Was it on my motion, or on the motion of those with whom I am associated? It was not. The bill has been introduced by his own friends; and the chairman of the committee who reported it (Mr. Wright) said it is obvious that about one million of the proposed amount of reduction falls within the provisions of the compromise act. Was it not, then, the deliberate purpose of the committee to report a bill which did not interfere with the compromise, and to let all who support the bill vote in favor of the determination, which has been so frankly avowed by the chairman and by the Senator from Virginia, to invade that act? If such is the fact, and if it is necessary to not a mere experiment, but has been actually brought forward here, what am I obliged to infer? Am I not compelled to believe that those who have brought it, and those who support it, mean to declare that we are not bound by the act of 1833? That, to use the language of the gentleman from Virginia, it is no more to us than a bit of parchment? If such is the tenor and tendency of their own remarks, and such the doctrine they themselves avow, then where is the propriety in calling upon us for pledges? When they avow their disregard of the compromise, do they expect that we shall pledge ourselves to regard it? If that is their expectation, then the present measure is without sense or object, that I can see. What influence is our opinion to have? Suppose we rose in our place, and declared that we held that act to be binding; would the honorable Senator from Virginia change his course? If he would, then must he not admit that this bill is a mere experiment—a test? The chairman assures us it is brought here with a view to its being passed, and gentlemen say that they are willing their sincerity shall be judged by their votes. For what, then, do they want pledges from us? It would not alter their course if we should give them. Their course is wholly independent of any opinion of ours. I cannot, therefore, make any apology for their course on this ground. I do not like to be called upon for senseless and unmeaning pledges.

But I have another word to say about this matter of pledges. My opinions with regard to the compromise bill were freely given at the time it passed; but it became a law, and I acquiesced in it, as was my duty; nor have I given any proof of a disposition to disturb it. But I know that this matter has recently been brought before the Legislature of my State, and that there is a probability of legislative action in regard to it. I am not in possession of any authority to pledge my State to a course of future action; it would not become me; it does not belong to me. The utmost that could be demanded of me would be an expression of my own opinion. It is not for me to give pledges while the matter in hand is before my State Legislature. I can now state that the opinions of that body have arrived by the last mail: I shall lay the document before the Senate, and let it speak for itself. I thought it due to myself to say thus much on the subject of pledges; and, having done so, I will relieve the Senate, and resume my seat.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

The bill to reduce the tariff being still under consideration, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

I wish, before the passage of this bill, to submit a few, and only a few, remarks to the Senate. It has been my desire to have taken a more active part than I have done in the discussions it has occasioned; but, feeling myself worn down by perpetual sitting, and being afflicted, besides, by the prevailing influenza, which disables me from attending at night, on account of the state of atmosphere produced by the multitude of lights in the chamber, I have been constrained to sit silent until now. The question I understand to be on the passage of the bill. In regard to many, and, indeed, to most of the articles it enumerates, I have no objection to the repeal of duties proposed; and had it contemplated the action of the Senate on those articles only, it would have received as hearty a concurrence from me as from any of its most zealous supporters. But, beside the items of this description, it has been deemed proper to insert various others, which cannot be touched without a violation of the compromise law of 1833. If the question turned on this bill alone, much as I regret the probability of its passage, my regret would be less, but for the declarations which have been openly made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, (Mr. Wright), who has told the Senate that he considers himself as much at liberty to look into the list of articles protected by a duty above 20 per cent. as among those below that rate, to find proper objects for the reduction of the revenue. He feels on this subject no restraint, no obligation whatever, from what is supposed to be the pledged faith of the country to the compromise act. A declaration like this, coming from so high a source, has a great weight. But, whatever may be its intrinsic importance, it does not stand alone. Another Senator, the chairman of one of the standing committees of the Senate, whose absence at this moment I regret, because I wish to report his words correctly, a gentleman then whom none is more favorable to Southern interests, and whose sagacity and influence have produced a great effect within his own State, has avowed it as his settled aim, not suddenly, but gradually, and surely, to eradicate every vestige of the protective system from our national code. From another quarter, (to which I am compelled to refer), we had an analogous declaration—say, one which goes still farther; for the Senator proclaimed that he never had felt, does not now feel, and never will feel himself bound, in the slightest degree, by the act of 1833; but, on the contrary, is at entire and perfect liberty to reduce or augment the duties of our tariff, as he may judge expedient. When I see measure like that before us, accompanied by such declarations from members of unbounded influence on this floor, I cannot doubt that it is the purpose of the administration to strike every vestige of the protective system from the statute book.

The present signal prosperity of our country is attributable in two causes: the success of the cotton interest at the South, and of manufactures in the Northern and Middle States. These interests are intimately blended. If the manufacturing interest at the North could be annihilated, there would be a destruction of the demand for three hundred and fifty thousand bales of the cotton of the South; and, if that quantity were thrown upon the foreign market, the inevitable effect would be a ruinous reduction in the price of that staple. As to the policy which has produced this state of prosperity, my convictions have been long since formed, and still remain unshaken. When I look at the diversified interests and pursuits of our people, and the impossibility of the largest portion of them supplying themselves with foreign articles of manufacture, for want of these necessary exchanges which alone can bring them into the country, it has always appeared to me, and still does appear, necessary to protect the industry of our own country. But the best friends of the protective policy never intended that that policy should be perpetual, though the acts establishing it were unlimited in point of time. All who advocated the system went upon the ground that after a certain time, (the precise period they did not attempt to fix,) our domestic manufactures would become so thoroughly fixed and permanently established that they would bear the competition of foreign products from abroad.

When this administration came into power it made warm professions of friendship to those who were the advocates of this policy; while, at the same time, it held out hopes to those on the other side of a complete subversion of the system. In regard to those professions, I do not wish, on so solemn an occasion as I apprehend this to be, to say a word which may injure the feelings of any gentleman. I must be permitted, however, to observe, that I felt some distrust of their sincerity. I thought I saw a course marked out which must lead to the utter and entire destruction of the protective system. The great question so long agitated between different portions of the Union has not been, whether in laying a bill for revenue the Government may not levy a duty which gives incidental protection to the industry of our own citizens, for this none will deny; but whether such protection can, in itself, a proper and legitimate object for which taxes may be laid. The friends of the protective policy have always maintained the latter proposition. But if the present bill is to pass, and the principles avowed by its advocates are to be carried out, the consequence will necessarily be that the whole grounds on which the protective policy rests must be abandoned, and the country given over to that vacillating course which leaves to industry and enterprise nothing sure and stable—nothing on which the public can calculate with the least security.

Entertaining these views in regard to the administration, I saw, in 1832, that a great crisis had arisen. I saw, on one hand, that we were menaced with a speedy destruction of the entire protective system; while, on the other, I beheld one member of the confederacy then on the very verge of civil war, and felt persuaded that, if that war should once be commenced, all the other Southern States would be drawn into it. For the double purpose, then, of saving the protective policy from destruction, and saving this Union from the horrors of civil war, I deemed it necessary to bring forward that healing and tranquillizing measure, in regard to which there has been so much misconception and misstatement in the course of the present debate. That measure, whatever of value or of error it may possess, originated entirely with the individual who is now addressing the Senate. At the time of its conception he was not in the city, but in Philadelphia, whither he had retired for three weeks. While there, he was called upon by a committee of manufacturers, who disclosed to him their apprehensions of the imminent danger to which the tariff system was exposed, and who asked, with anxiety, what was to be done; whether no measure could be devised to save the manufacturing interests from the ruin with which they were threatened. It was to these individuals, and not to his friends in Congress, that he first applied to know whether, in their apprehension, a long lease of the protective policy, even though on a lower scale, would not be better than the uncertain state with regard to it in which they then were. To this question not a single man (and he put it to the most intelligent individuals) hesitated for a moment to reply in the affirmative. He afterwards conferred with other manufacturers, and found that they concurred in the same view. He then communicated with his friends in both Houses of Congress; and among these he found a diversity of sentiment. Some assented to the position; but, in a consultation which was held, it was not generally agreed to. Fortified, however, as he was by the opinions of practical manufacturers, and knowing that the great evil which they had most cause to dread was vacillation, and that what they most wanted was certainty and security, and feeling so great a division of sentiment among his friends in Congress, he acted (as he always had done) on his own independent and settled conviction of what was right, and accordingly introduced the bill. I never (said Mr. C.) had any interview or conference with any Southern Senator prior to its introduction. Afterwards, indeed, those conversations took place, which naturally resulted from the effort on my part to bring other gentlemen to my way of thinking, and, on their part, to do the same with respect to me. The result was, that, in almost every instance, gentlemen from the South were induced to come up to the support of the measure, with but very slight variations. On one very important feature of the plan, however, (I refer to the home valuation as a standard of taxation, instead of the valuation in foreign ports,) I ascertained that there would be a determined opposition on the part of the South, and so saying did I apprehend that opposition to be, that I came to the House at eleven o'clock under a full conviction that Southern gentlemen would not give way, and that the bill would in consequence be lost. But the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) who considered himself, on that occasion, as representing the great Southern interest, (for a Senator from Virginia had declared in committee that whatever would satisfy South Carolina would satisfy Virginia,) rose, in a manner very agreeable to me, and stated that he would waive his objection to the bill, accompanying that statement, however, with a declaration that he did not hold himself bound by the proposed compromise so as to preclude him from the free exercise of his judgment on a future occasion.

This (said Mr. C.) is the history of that bill. All that has been said about its having been concocted by the joint efforts of the Senator from South Carolina and myself is absolutely without one particle of truth. My first communication, as I have stated, was with the manufacturers; I then submitted the plan to the late Mr. Johnston, of Louisiana, and to the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster.) The former, on consideration, gave his assent to it, the latter never did; but I was so supported by those who thought themselves well acquainted with the wishes and the interests of the manufacturers, that I felt it my duty to bring forward the measure, notwithstanding his dissatisfaction openly expressed.

Such having been the origin of the bill, let me ask for a moment what were its provisions? The first and great purpose I proposed to myself (a purpose which must be effectually destroyed if the present bill shall become a law) was to withdraw the protection of the manufacturing industry of the country from all connection with politics, and let it flourish unaffected by the vacillations of political contest. The bill then provided a biennial reduction at the rate of 10 per cent. on all duties over 20 per cent. till the first of December, 1841; in June following, one-half of the remaining excess of duties over 20 per cent. and soon after, the residue. To this bill it was objected that the manufacturing interest could never live under it. But what has been the fact? The law has now been in operation for four years, and have you heard any complaints from that interest? Can any period of four years be pointed out in which it has enjoyed greater prosperity? But it was urged, that although the manufacturers might get along till 1842, yet, when that time should arrive, they could no longer exist under the remnant of protection which would then be left them; that is, with a duty of 20 per cent. the home valuation, and the cash payment. In reply to this I said then, and I say now, that no man can tell beforehand whether this protection will be found sufficient or no. For myself I do believe that the leading manufacturing interests of the country can subsist under it; but as I said then, I now say, that if it shall be found on trial that there are one or two particular branches which cannot proceed without a greater protection, they will but form an exception to the general rule, and I entertain no doubt, judging from the good disposition which has been manifested towards the plan, that the requisite protection may be so far extended by general consent as to cover these, without the general rule being thereby practically violated. At all events, I ask is it not right at least to make the experiment?

It has been said that the compromise bill is not so binding in its authority, that you have power to touch it whenever circumstances shall appear to require its modification. And who denies this? It was admitted at the time that Congress might modify the bill if it became necessary. This none will deny. But do not the circumstances under which the bill was passed, do not the great and conflicting interests it was intended to settle, and, above all, do not the tranquillizing effects which have pervaded the country since its enactment, and the numerous important arrangements which have been entered into on the calculation of its continuance, although they may not stamp the act as inviolable without a breach of faith, yet combine to show that it would be exceedingly indiscreet in Congress to disturb an arrangement of this character? Have not other great interests of this Union been permanently compromised by acts, which are equally within the power of Congress with the law of '33? I allude, as one striking example, to the settlement of the much agitated Missouri question, by which the latitude of 36 deg. 30 min. has been established as the extreme boundary for the existence of slavery within that State. Has not Congress a right to repeal that law? But what would those Southern gentlemen, who now so strenuously urge us to a violation of our implied faith in regard to the act of '33, say to this House if it should attempt a measure like that? Should we not hear remonstrances, in the loudest tone and most earnest language, throughout the entire land? Yet what propriety is there in lending ourselves to a violation of another compromise, while we hold fast to this, which is so dear to them?

It has been asked, and with some emphasis, why the Senate has heard no pledges given by members on this side of the House? That is not exactly true; for several gentlemen have expressly said that they do feel themselves bound to observe the provisions of the compromise law. I for one have always felt myself held in honor, and by every principle which ought to regulate the conduct of a public man, to such an observance. But of what avail are individual pledges? And who is it that asks for them? Has there been any attempt on the part of the North to disturb this arrangement? None whatever. It is the party which calls thus for pledges, that is the moving, the threatening, the acting party, (with the honorable exception of the two Senators from South Carolina, the two from Tennessee, and one of the Senators from Mississippi,) and who, while giving themselves no pledges at all, are proposing measures which, on the contrary, go to set aside the compromise entirely. The North has sat by in silent acquiescence. It has made no movement whatever in opposition to the law; while the opposite party, who alone threaten to disturb the compromise, call on us for pledges to its observance! But are there, in fact, no such pledges given? What is the language of the paper which has been read to us this morning, containing resolutions on this subject, passed by a vast majority of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts? And what is the language which has been forwarded to us from the great central State of Pennsylvania? Is not she, too, possessed with the conviction that the compromise is to be held sacred? And what is the language held by the less, but still highly respectable, State of Rhode Island? Is not of the same tenor? Does it not express the same sentiment? If it could have been believed that a serious design was entertained of disturbing that arrangement at this session of Congress, you would have heard not only from these States, but from Ohio, from Kentucky, and from every other State of this Union at all interested in the protective policy. They all would have concurred in declaring, with one voice, that they held the act of 1833 as of binding authority by general agreement. These are pledges worth infinitely more than any which could have been given by individuals on this floor. If you want further evidence of what has been the general understanding on this subject, look at the universal burst of acclamation which followed the passage of the act wherever it was heard of. Look at the universal peace and quietness which has prevailed throughout the country on this subject ever since: look at the public official language of all the several branches of this Government, of the President, of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives. Do you find here no evidence that that law was to be respected, and was to be held inviolate? But what is the language we have heard on this floor during the present debate? Did not the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives), distinctly say that he felt great respect for the compromise law, and should not be willing lightly to invade it? Yet the other day, the same gentleman spoke of that law as no more than a common act of legislation, and as presenting no impediment whatever to the adoption of any part of the present bill. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, too, talked of its not being precisely a common act of legislation; yet he said, in substance, that it was to be respected and not respected. He would respect it in so far as he liked, and we would disregard it whenever it suited his views of policy. I do not consider the act as possessing this flexible character; and although I should have no objection to a reduction of duty on one or two articles in the bill which are now over twenty per cent. yet I cannot consent, for the sake of reaching this object, to hazard the whole arrangement.

The protective system is an entire system. All its parts are to be regarded in their mutual connection and dependence. The moment you touch one of them, although with the utmost possible caution, there is no saying when or where you will stop. You begin to-day with the duty on salt and on spirits; but as you have not adjusted the revenue question yet, to-morrow you may come to some other article on which it will be convenient to make a reduction; then there will be a change of the dramatis personæ—and thus you will be called upon, from time to time, to destroy the system piecemeal. Is this (said Mr. C.) the contemplated course of the new administration? If it is, then I tell all who are interested in the protective policy: I tell Louisiana, whose brown sugar is now so amply protected; I tell the woolen manufacturers of New Hampshire and Massachusetts; the cotton manufacturers of Connecticut and Rhode Island; and the iron masters of Pennsylvania, that if they consent to set the example by repealing the duties on coal, on salt, or on spirits, they will expose themselves, sooner or later, to inevitable destruction. Whenever a majority can be found to accomplish the object, the process, which now affects others, will be made to reach their own most favored and cherished interests. I say to all, the system is one. It is a system of mutual reciprocity. It partakes in its nature of the genius of the Government under which it has grown up. As such, it must be maintained, if maintained it is to be.

What would that portion of the southern delegation who are in favor of this bill have thought, if the condition of the two interests concerned in the compromise were reversed? If, instead of acquiescing in the act of 1833, and conforming their arrangements to it, instead of confiding in the sacred character of that agreement, and proceeding in their business accordingly, the men of the North had come here, and pressed the Senate for the enactment of highly increased duties for protection? What would then have been heard in all parts of this city? How quickly should we have heard the resounding voices of the southern delegation in ardent and loud remonstrance. Every where throughout the South, writers and orators would have been invoking the North to have respect to its engagements. Every where they would be declaiming against opening the wounds of the country afresh, and again plunging the nation into the danger of a civil war. And do not my friends from the South recollect that men have the same feelings in all parts of our country? Do they think they can pass a bill like this without wounding the sensibilities of that great interest which is concerned in the protective system? Is it right to do so, admitting that they possess an accidental majority? The Senator from Virginia consoled himself and his southern friends by an assurance that the protective policy has not now an ascendancy in this nation. Where the ascendancy is in this ill-governed country, God only knows; but be it where it may, I conjure gentlemen to let this subject alone. Is it not enough that they have tampered with the currency? Is our domestic industry also to be made the subject of experiment? Are men to go to bed at night, thriving laborers and prospering capitalists, and not know what they are to be when they awake in the morning? Are all the great interests of the country to be dragged into the service of mere party politics?

I adjure the Senate to rise to the greatness of American statesmen, and to atone, in some measure, for the injuries which have heretofore been inflicted on a bleeding country. There are some things too dear to be dragged into the vortex of political contest, and made the objects of party calculation. Let the protective policy remain where it has happily flourished for these four years past. There are yet but four years more, till we shall reach the expiration of the term limited by the compromise bill, and all parts of the country will acquiesce in its provisions, if they shall not now be rashly disturbed. But if this bill shall become a law, from that moment I shall hold myself absolved from all obligation to observe that compromise, and shall be ready, according as my sense of the public wishes shall point out my duty, to augment the rate of protection to a point which they may require. And, let me ask, are gentlemen quite sure that they shall retain, for years to come, the ascendancy which they imagine themselves now to enjoy against this policy? Where are the elements of that great mass which supported and enforced the American system? Scattered by party—broken into fragments. But it still exists in Pennsylvania, in the Western States, in New England, in New York itself; and it is not improbable that a new combination may arise, far stronger than any you have yet seen. Should the man, whom you of the South have contributed to place at the head of the Government, recommend in his next message to Congress a revival of the protective policy, would he not find majorities in both Houses to support him? Does any man doubt it? And are gentlemen of the South prepared to see their whole security suspended on the will of one man? I trust not.

But such is the state of my health, that I do not feel myself able to add much more. I shall conclude my remarks by a motion, the object of which is to test the opinion of this body as to the obligation of the compromise act of 1833. That motion will be to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to strike from it all those articles on which there is now levied a duty of twenty per cent. or over. I do this for no purpose of embarrassment. It is not my habit to embarrass the proceedings of any legislative body. I have been both in the opposition and in the majority; and I do not approve, and have never practised on the plan of wearying each other out by propositions merely intended to perplex and thwart the course of an opposing party. The manly, the becoming course is fairly to bring up mind to mind—patriotism on one side, to patriotism on the other; and, when the intellectual struggle is over, to yield as promptly as we have contended vigorously. The majority must ever govern.

We have had a succession of motions in relation to particular articles comprised in this bill; and as it may often happen that a gentleman will feel himself bound to vote in relation to some particular interest in a manner different from those with whom he ordinarily acts, it has come to pass that the majorities on these different portions of the bill have considerably varied. I now wish to test the Senate in a group; so that there may be no escape on the ground of individual situation, in order that the country may know whether Congress regards its faith as pledged or not to an observance of the act of 1833. I am also moved by the consideration that there are one or two articles in this bill, with respect to which my own State feels a particular interest; an interest, however, which is not confined to her, but which extends to western New York, to western Pennsylvania, and all the grain-growing States west of the Alleghenies. The article to which I more particularly refer is, with the exception of cotton bagging, the only one which gives us any personal concern in the protective policy. I allude to foreign spirits, on which it is now proposed to reduce the duty to thirty-three and a third cents, a sum exceeding the average price of the American article, which is the rival of the foreign. And under what circumstances is this reduction proposed? There is not now a civilized nation in the world whose system of duties does not amount to an absolute prohibition of the introduction of foreign liquors. Holland, liberal as her general policy is, has, for the purpose of protecting her own production, excluded all foreign liquors whatever. England excludes a large majority of them. France does the same thing; and yet, at this moment, while we are thus excluded from the markets of all the world, it is proposed to reduce the protecting duty of our own citizens on this article one-half. And when, and how, is this to be done? Of all foreign nations, England and France will be most benefited by such a reduction. Now, it is well known that, at this moment, our tobacco interest has to struggle against the rigor of their laws, which, in effect, are almost exclusive of this American product. Yet, instead of leaving in the hands of our negotiators the article of brandies, to be balanced against that of tobacco, it is proposed, without any equivalent, to reduce the duty on foreign spirits from 66 2/3 cents to 33 1/3 cents.

I shall conclude by submitting the motion which I have already named; and when the Senate brings to remembrance the good feeling which the compromise has thus far produced, the tranquility which an acquiescence in it by both sides has given to the whole country; and when they consider especially what our condition is in reference to another interest, very dear to the South, and on which the North is now assailing them, will they deem it wise to loose these bonds of peace in order that the South may in turn assail the North? Is this right? Is it wise? Does it become us as American statesmen? Is it not better that we submit to that which, after all, is but a conjectural evil, I mean the inconveniences of an excessive revenue, than at once to break down all those barriers which have guarded us against evils more than imaginary? Shall we re-open again this source of eternal contention—the tariff question? I adjure gentlemen not to throw into the political caldron, already too likely to overflow, this new element of dispute and heart-burning. I trust that, under these considerations, the majority will concur in the motion now submitted, and that we shall thus have a bill containing those items only on which there is no dispute.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 1, 1837.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, February 1, 1837.—On the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year 1837, coming up; and the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the amendments made thereto: Mr. CUSHING said that the bill before the House, making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian Department, threw open to discussion the whole policy of the Government of the United States in relation to the Indians. On comparing the bill with the estimates presented by the Committee of Ways and Means, the House would see that it embraced annuities and other payments to the Indians, under the treaty with the Creeks of the 7th August, 1790, and the treaty concluded at Greenville on the 3d August, 1795, for the general pacification of the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawnees, and others of the northwestern tribes, and so down, through intervening years, to the treaty of the 23d March last, with the Ottawas and Chippewas. The provisions of the bill covered the entire period of the constitutional being of the nation. There was not an act of our political intercourse with the Indians, which it did not directly or indirectly reach. The press it was, therefore, a fit opportunity for examining the treatment of the Indians by the United States, and their respective rights and obligations; and upon this subject he proposed to address the House.

His object, he said, in debating this matter, was not political agitation. Nor was it personal effect. On the contrary, he felt admonished that, in the performance of this undertaking, he should have to tread on difficult and dangerous ground. Nevertheless, he was impelled to it, in the first place, by perceiving that the true state of the case between the United States and the Indians, as it now exists, was not fully comprehended out of doors, at least in that part of the country from whence he came. Men speak and think of the subject just as they did seven years ago, when it was still a depending question, whether the Indians should remain within the chartered limits of the several States in which they are, or should remove beyond the Mississippi. Meanwhile, the United States had entered upon a new line of policy and of general conduct towards the Indians. Another set of facts had, in the course of events, come up, to which it was time the public attention should be turned, if any thing of a practical nature was to be done. He wished, so far as his humble means of influence might go, to contribute something to the accomplishment of that end. This was one consideration. And he was impelled, in the second place, by a desire to begin to discharge the duty which he owed, as a public man and a member of Congress, to the broken remnant of the aboriginal masters of this continent.

We, (said Mr. C.) who are members of Congress, in opposition to the administrators of the Government, have but a secondary part assigned to us in public affairs. We seldom have the power to carry through any important act. We can agitate political topics, for effect on the popular mind abroad, or on those about us here. We can make suggestions, communicate facts, propose measures. We can support those plans of the administration which we think to be just and wise, and resist those which seem unjust or unwise. In all these conditions, we influence the action of the Government chiefly by force of argument addressed to the judgment or the fears of that controlling majority in either House, which represents or executes the will of the administration. We may thus be useful to prevent evil and to promote good, to persuade, to deter, to correct, where we have no power to command. An opposition frequently exercises valuable functions in the originating and furthering of great measures, which, at length, when thus commended to general favor, are adopted and sanctioned by the administration; signal examples of which might be cited from the history of the English Parliament, as well as of Congress. In a word, I conceive that we should be wanting to ourselves and to our country, if we did not bring the acts of the Government, in which the interest of the nation, its honor, and its well-being are involved, to the test of temperate and candid debate; and I shall make no further apology for presenting my views to the consideration of the House.

What, then, is the system of policy which regulates the relations of the United States and the Indians at the present time, and what our duty, as practical statesmen, and as men of business, in reference to the Indians?

We call ourselves Americans. But we, who now occupy the country, are, in ourselves, or in our immediate predecessors, emigrants from the distant shores of Europe. We are not of the indigenous races of the continent. We constitute a vast republic, divided into populous and powerful States. Our thorough cities, our cultivated fields, our edifices, ships, commerce, canals, railways, the marks of our prosperity and the monuments of civilization, which meet the eye on all lands, bespeak the presence and the power of a great people. But the primitive lords of the soil are humble dependents on our annual bounty, mutilated, scattered, extinct, melted away in our path like a snow flake, devoured as the dew before the morning sun. The land once theirs is ours. The empire of our civilization is, by right or by wrong, honestly or dishonestly, established indelibly throughout the new world.

By what tenure of right is it that we hold our possessions? In regard to this point, there is consistency at least, if there be not justice, in the doctrine of all Europeans. Every nation, as it proceeded to make settlements in the new world, claimed its territory by the title either of discovery or of conquest. They were Christians, introducing their own race, and with it their laws, into regions occupied by pagans. Thus it notoriously was in the case of the Spaniards and Portuguese, who obtained so large a portion of this continent. The soil and its inhabitants were partitioned between them by the Papal See, and given up to their arms as to an enterprise of crusade. Columbus, the great discoverer, Cortez and Pizarro, the great conquerors, and others of their respective nations, came to the new world under mixed inducements of ambition and of religion. They fought under the banner of the cross. In this sign they overthrew the empire of the Incas and of the Mexicans, and colonized the rich regions of the south. A similar principle directed the colonial undertakings of the French, English, and Dutch. Thus, the commission to the Cabots, in virtue of whose voyage of discovery Great Britain acquired her title in America, empowered them to discover countries unknown to Christian people, and to take possession of these in the name of the King of England. Each and all of the original colonies now composing the United States, as Florida, Virginia, Massachusetts, New York, Louisiana, founded by Spain, England, Holland, and France respectively, proceeded in the assertion of their right as Christians to plant the lands previously held by Indians. However questionable may be the nature of such a pretension, still it was the idea universally followed. There is not an acre of land held by a citizen of the United States, whose title stands on any other foundation. It is the fundamental doctrine, the oldest element in the municipal law of every State of the Union.

Conformable to which has been the practice of each of the States, and also of the United States, in their legislation, and in the decisions of their judicial tribunals of every class. The several States, in the disposition of the lands belonging to them, and the United States, in the disposition of the national domain, maintain that the ultimate dominion over the soil, and the exclusive right of granting it, are in themselves subject only to the qualified right of occupancy remaining in the Indian. The latter can occupy, but cannot give a title. His deed conveys his mere occupancy; a title in fee can be derived only from the Government. To this effect are all the text books. Thus, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"All the natives of Europe who have acquired territory on this continent, have asserted in themselves, and have recognised in others, the exclusive right of the discoverer to appropriate the lands occupied by the Indians."

And Judge Story:

"It may be asked what was the effect of this principle of discovery, in respect to the rights of the natives themselves? In the view of the Europeans, it created a peculiar relation between themselves and the aboriginal inhabitants. The latter were admitted to possess a present right of occupancy, or use in the soil, which was subordinate to the ultimate dominion of the discoverer. They were admitted to be the rightful occupants of the soil, with a legal as well as just claim to retain possession of it, and to use it according to their own discretion. In a certain sense, they were permitted to exercise rights of sovereignty over it. They might sell or transfer it to the sovereign who discovered it, but they were denied the authority to dispose of it to any other person; and until such a sale or transfer, they were generally permitted to occupy it as sovereigns de facto. But, notwithstanding this occupancy, the European discoverers claimed and exercised the right to grant the soil, while yet in the possession of the natives, subject, however, to their right of occupancy; and the title so granted was universally admitted to convey a sufficient title in the soil to the grantees in perfect dominion."

And Chancellor Kent:

"This assumed but qualified dominion over the Indian tribes, regarding them as enjoying no higher title to the soil than that founded on simple occupancy, and to be incompetent to transfer their title to any other power than the Government which claims the jurisdiction of their territory by right of discovery, arose, in a great degree, from the necessity of the case. It was founded on the pretension of converting the discovery of the country into a conquest, and it is now too late to draw into discussion the validity of that pretension, or the restrictions which it imposes. It is established by numerous compacts, treaties, laws, and ordinances, and founded in immemorial usage. The country has been colonized and settled, and is now held by that title. It is the law of the land, and no court of justice can permit the right to be disturbed by speculative reasonings or abstract rights."

Such, then, is the settled law of the land in every part of the United States. The abstract justice of the principle is another question. It grew up, as Chancellor Kent suggests, out of the necessity of the case. Was it better, in the general sum of good, that millions of Christians, or that thousands of Pagans, should occupy America? That the land should be suffered to remain as a bar of wild beasts and a vast hunting field for a few scattered savages, or that it should be filled with cultivated men, and the improvements, moral, political, and religious, which appertain to refined life? I will not undertake to answer this question, to start up the good against the bad, and the expense at which attained, so as to strike the balance between civilization and barbarism. I content myself, in this part of the subject, to deal with the practical fact which lies at the foundation of our intercourse with the Indians.

This maxim of public law has directed the colonization of America, from the beginning to the present time. In the English colonies, as distinguished from the Spanish, the process of settlement was mostly a peaceful one. Generally, the colonists quietly and extinguished the title of the Indians by contract, and at such a price, however inadequate, as they were well satisfied to receive. Yet there was, I believe, no colony of any magnitude, which did not, at some period of its existence, engage in hostilities with the Indians, and acquire lands by force, and in right of war. And there was no colony which did not assume, or in practice assume, the right of exterior legislation over the Indians within its limits, leaving them, nevertheless, to regulate their own interior police, as municipal communities, so long as they continued capable of doing it. In the legislation of Massachusetts, for instance, and of New York, as well as that of the United States, the Indians are treated as a dependent, not a sovereign, nor a foreign people; as being in a state of pupillage, under wardship; and, if indulged with partial self-government, yet subject to see that self-government cease, when their condition shall seem to us to require it; or, in other words, at the will of the State, or of the United States, who by the Constitution now possess the exclusive regulation of intercourse with the Indians. And this, again, though at one time a questioned point, must now be regarded as the settled law of the land. Chief Justice Marshall says:

"It may well be doubted whether those tribes which reside within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States can, with strict accuracy, be denominated foreign nations. They may, more correctly, perhaps, be denominated domestic dependent nations. They occupy a territory to which we assert a title independent of their will, which must take effect in point of possession, when their right of possession ceases. Meanwhile, they are in a state of pupillage. Their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian. They look to our Government for protection; rely upon its kindness and its power; appeal to it for relief to their wants; and address the President as their Great Father. They and their country are considered by foreign nations, as well as by ourselves, as being so completely under the sovereignty and dominion of the United States, that any attempt to acquire their lands, or to form a political connection with them, would be considered by all as an invasion of our territory, and an act of hostility."

These principles became the subject of elaborate judicial investigation, in consequence of the controversy between the Cherokees and the State of Georgia. A summary view of the whole ground is presented in the following remarks of Chief Justice Marshall:

"The exercise of the power of self-government by the Indians, within a State, is undoubtedly contemplated to be temporary. This is shown by the settled policy of the Government, in the extinguishment of their title, and especially by the compact with the State of Georgia. It is a question, not of abstract right, but of public policy. I do not mean to say that the same moral rule which should regulate the affairs of private life should not be regarded by communities or nations. But a sound national policy does require that the Indian tribes within our States should exchange their territories, upon equitable principles, or, eventually, consent to become amalgamated in our political communities."

"At best, they can enjoy a very limited independence within the boundaries of a State, and such a residence must always subject them to encroachments from the settlements around them; and their existence within a State, as a separate and independent community, may seriously embarrass or obstruct the operation of the State laws. If, therefore, it would be inconsistent with the political welfare of the States, and the social advantage of their citizens, that an independent and permanent power should exist within their limits, this power must give way to the greater power which surrounds it, or seek its exercise beyond the sphere of State authority."

"This state of things can only be produced by a co-operation of the State and Federal Governments. The latter has the exclusive regulation of intercourse with the Indians; and so long as this power shall be exercised, it cannot be obstructed by the State. It is a power given by the Constitution, and sanctioned by the most solemn acts of both the Federal and State Governments; consequently, it cannot be abrogated at the will of a State. It is one of the powers parted with by the States, and vested in the Federal Government. But, if a contingency shall occur, which shall render the Indians who reside in a State incapable of self-government, either by moral degradation or a reduction of their numbers, it would undoubtedly be in the power of a State Government to extend to them the axis of its laws. Under such circumstances, the agency of the General Government, of necessity, must cease."

"But, if it shall be the policy of the Government to withdraw its protection from the Indians who reside within the limits of the respective States, and who not only claimed the right of self-government, but have uniformly exercised it, the laws and treaties which impose duties and obligations on the General Government should be abrogated by the powers competent to do so. So long as these laws and treaties exist, having been formed within the sphere of the Federal powers, they must be respected and enforced by the appropriate organs of the Federal Government."

Mr. Cushing said that, having thus developed the public law, and the constitutional right applicable to the Indians within the territory of the United States, he should now proceed to another branch of the question of national policy involved in the subject. Under various treaties with the Indians, at every epoch of our history, the United States have assumed the duty of protecting them; we have labored to maintain peace among them; we have anxiously endeavored to civilize and elevate them; we have admitted their right of occupancy; we have proceeded in the extinction of their title by treaties, containing liberal stipulations for their permanent advantage; our national intercourse with them has been dictated in general by a pacific, just, and paternal spirit, becoming the character of the United States.

Upon observation of the state of the Indians, in the aim of consulting their political welfare, it has been perceived that three courses offered themselves to the choice of the United States.

In the first place, the Indians might be prompted or allowed to organize themselves into political communities, within the limits of the States in which they should happen to be, and independent of the local jurisdiction of such States. Some of the southern tribes, from the admixture of white men, or from other causes, did in fact make a great and visible progress towards civilization, and had manifested an aptitude and a disposition to continue as organized nations on the soil of their inheritance. They had been favored in this by the United States. Yet the difficulty attending the execution of such a plan were serious and embarrassing in the extreme, even if at all surmountable. I admit (said Mr. C.) the magnitude of those difficulties. I defer to the truth of the remark of Chief Justice Marshall, just quoted, that the exercise of the power of self-government by the Indians within a State, has ever, in the policy of this nation, been contemplated as temporary; that, as a general rule, when it becomes inconsistent with the political welfare of a State that an independent power should exist within its limits, this power must give way to the greater power which surrounds it; and that sound policy requires of such lesser power either to part with its territory upon equitable considerations, or eventually consent to become amalgamated in the larger political community. I recall to mind the corresponding remark of Chancellor Kent, in regard to the Indians in the older States, that "To leave the Indians in possession of the country, was to leave the country a wilderness, and to govern them as a distinct people, or to mix with them, or admit them to an intercommunity of privileges, was impossible under the circumstances of their relative condition." These difficulties, I repeat, in the way of leaving the Indians to the exercise of independent political sovereignty within the limits of a State, are serious and embarrassing, even if they be at all superable. They have led to the adoption in the older States of—

In the second place, the organization of the Indians into municipal communities merely, acting under the guardianship and supreme legislative control of the State. Such is the present condition of the few remaining Indians within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Thirdly, the removal of the Indians from within the limits of the individual States, and their establishment in the unoccupied territory of the United States west of the Mississippi. This must be regarded as the systematic policy of the present administration. When I speak of it as the policy of the present administration, I do not forget the fact that the idea of the removal of the Indians was entertained at an early period in the history of the Government. The compact with Georgia proves it; and, under the administration of Mr. Monroe, especially, the idea began to assume a distinct shape as a political measure. But the adoption of the policy, as a settled system, belongs to the last eight years; and the responsibility of it, for good or for evil, for honor or for dishonor, rests with the present administration.

That system, as now in the course of execution, received the sanction of Congress and of the Executive in the act of the 23d May, 1830, for the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi, which provides as follows:

"Sec. 1. It shall and may be lawful for the President to cause so much of any territory belonging to the United States west of the Mississippi, not included in any State or organized Territory, and to which the Indian title may be extinguished, as he may judge necessary, to be divided into a suitable number of districts, for the reception of such tribes or nations of Indians as may choose to exchange the lands where they now reside, and move there."

"Sec. 2. It shall be lawful for the President solemnly to assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made that the United States will for ever secure and guaranty to them and their heirs or successors the country so exchanged with them; and, if they prefer it, that the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made and executed to them for the same."

"Sec. 7. It shall be lawful for the President to have the same superintendence and care over any tribe or nation in the country to which they may remove, as contemplated by this act, that he is now authorized to have over them at their present place of residence."

The system has received the further sanction of Congress in the act of the 11th July, 1832, having for its object the appointment of Commissioners to visit and examine the country set apart for the emigrating Indians west of the Mississippi, and to report to the War Department a plan for the improvement, government, and security of the Indians.

Now, under the authority of these acts of Congress, the President has proceeded to negotiate treaties with the Indians for their removal to the West. Some of them have already gone. Others, including the more numerous and important tribes, are in the course of removal. The contemplated examination of the territory assigned for their reception has been made. Plans for the government and security of the removed Indians have been presented, and have been approved by the War Department. Many millions of money have been appropriated in execution of the several treaties of emigration. In short, the systematic removal of the Indians, I again say, is the settled policy of the existing Government of the United States.

Mr. C. said that if he had enjoyed the honor of a seat in Congress at the time the law of 1830, which gave method and system to the policy of removal, was enacted, he could not have yielded his assent to the measure. He applauded the eloquence, the courage, the zeal, the ability with which the law was resisted. He should have joined with the opponents of it in considering its policy too questionable, the visible and immediate wrong too flagrant, the neglect or violation of the pledged faith of the United States too palpable, the hazards of war and bloodshed to ensue upon its adoption too certain, to justify him in voting for its enactment. He thought he perceived in the disastrous events which were now transpiring in the South, the very consequences then predicted, as likely to follow a systematic attempt to drive the Indians at once beyond the Mississippi.

Now, in seeking after measures of practical good for the benefit of the Indians, (continued Mr. C.) I start from these premises. I perceive it to be the settled law of the land, in the jurisdiction as well of the United States as of the several States, that the soil of this continent belongs of right to us. It is ours to take, to possess, to convey. I perceive it to be the settled law of the land, that either the United States or the several States, as the case may be, now hold, or may assume, the government and ultimate control of the Indians. Finally, I perceive it to be the settled policy of those who now administer, and who will for a time, at least, continue to administer the affairs of the Federal Government, to remove the Indians out of the States, and to collect them by themselves west of the Mississippi. Is there a single member of this House who supposes that the Government of the United States will retrace its steps in this matter? The tide of emigration is flowing to the West. It is impelled by the public force of the nation. Will its reflux waters be made to roll back in their channel? Can they? We know, we must know, that the process of removal cannot be arrested. However lamentable it may be, we cannot recall what is past. We cannot prevent its consummation. It is the existing, inevitable, unchangeable fact.

What remains for us then, as practical statesmen, to do? It seems to me a self-evident proposition, too plain for argument, that, instead of wasting our sympathy for the Indians upon impossible objects, we should cast about for the means of protecting and serving them efficiently in the new homes beyond the Mississippi we have compelled them to accept. I cannot bring my mind to approve the policy of removal, particularly in the time and mode of its actual execution. But I acquiesce in the fact which is. I hazard something, perhaps, in making this avowal, but I should be unworthy of my place here, if I were content to swim passively along for ever in the current, without venturing at any time to act independently upon my own judgment; and I feel a deep conviction that it is become a duty to direct my own efforts, and so far as my example or counsel may have influence, the efforts of other friends of the Indians, into the only practicable path of beneficence which the providence of God has left us to tread. We cannot prevent their emigration. Let us unite in smoothing the way before them; in protecting them at the end of their journey; and in elevating them, if we may, to the rank of civilized men, capable of participating in the advantages which our social and political institutions bestow.

Mr. C. said he was confirmed in these views by the considerations offered in the elaborate report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, presented at the last Congress, by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. H. Everett.) He would ask the attention of the House to two or three sentences from that report.

"All must now see and admit that the relations heretofore so much desired by the Indians and their friends, cannot be sustained in future in their present situation. Whatever may be the wishes of the Government, and even whatever may be its rights and physical power to enforce those rights, yet the attempt to enforce them might be attended with consequences not less disastrous to the Indians than to the harmony of the States."

And again:

"Whatever difference of opinion may heretofore have existed, the policy of the Government, in regard to the future condition of those tribes of Indians, may now be regarded as definitively settled. To induce them to remove west of the Mississippi, to a territory set apart and dedicated to their use and government for ever, to secure to them there a final home, to elevate their intellectual, moral, and civil condition, and to fit them for the enjoyment of the blessings of a free government, is that policy."

I declare my acquiescence, then, (said Mr. C.) not in the original justice, but in the present fact, of the removal of the Indians. Doing so, I direct my mind in pursuit of their good according to the new condition of things, imposed upon us by the course of events. I look to the administration, which holds the efficient power of the country in its hands, to see what are the plans of the Government. I find them to be, what the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs indicates, as manifested in past years, and especially as communicated to the present Congress by the Acting Secretary of War. His report develops the designs of the administration as follows:

"Connected with the general subject of our Indian relations are two measures, proposed by the Commissioner, which I deem of great moment. They are the organization of an efficient system for the protection and government of the Indian country west of the Mississippi, and the establishment of military posts for the protection of that country and of our own frontiers, in addition to those now authorized by law."

"These measures are due to the numerous tribes whom we have planted in this extensive territory, and to the pledges and encouragements by which they were induced to consent to a change of residence. We may now be said to have consummated the policy of emigration, and to have entered on an era full of interest to both parties. It involves the last hopes of humanity in respect to the Indian tribes; and though, to the United States, its issues cannot be equally momentous, they yet deeply concern our prosperity and honor. It therefore behoves us, at this juncture, seriously to examine the relations which exist between the United States and the inhabitants of the Indian country, to look into the duties which devolve on us, and to mature a system of measures for their just and constant execution."

"In almost every treaty providing for the emigration of an Indian tribe, the impossibility of preserving it from extinction, if left within the limits of any of the States or organized Territories of the United States, and thus exposed to the advances of the white population, is expressly recognised. The advantages which the tribe will derive from its establishment in a territory to be exclusively occupied by the United States, are, uniformly guaranteed and the paternal care of the United States, are uniformly insisted on. In the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, the wish of the tribes to be allowed the privilege of a delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States is expressly mentioned; and though not accorded to by the commissioners of the United States, yet they insert it in the treaty. 'That Congress may consider of and decide the application.' In the late treaty with the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, it is expressly stipulated 'that they shall be entitled to a delegate in the House of Representatives, whenever Congress shall make provision for the same.' It is not to be doubted that the hopes thus held out to these tribes had an important influence in determining them to consent to emigrate to their new homes in the West."

"Although some of the Indians have made considerable advances in civilization, they all need the guardianship of the United States. To leave them to the barbarism of their own institutions, with the inadequate assistance of an agent, and the slight control of the general superintendent, would be imprudent as it regards ourselves, and unjust toward them. Under such a system, hostilities will frequently break out between the different tribes, and sometimes between them and the inhabitants of our frontiers, attended, in both cases, by the usual consequences of savage warfare. To fulfil, in their true spirit, the engagements into which we have entered, we must institute a comprehensive system of guardianship, adapted to the circumstances and wants of the people, and calculated to lead them, gradually and safely, to the exercise of self-government; and, at as early a day as circumstances will allow, the expectations authorized by the passages above quoted from the treaty with the Choctaws and Cherokees should be fulfilled. Indeed, from the facts stated by the commissioner, it is scarcely to be doubted that the Choctaws are already in a condition to justify the measure. The daily presence of a native delegate on the floor of the House of Representatives of the United States, presenting, as occasion may require, to that dignified assembly the interest of his people, would, more than any other single act, attest to the world and to the Indian tribes the sincerity of our endeavors for their preservation and happiness. In the successful issues of those endeavors, we shall find a more precious and durable accession to the glory of our country, than by any triumph we can achieve in arms or in arts."

Mr. Cushing said that he recognised in the sentiments of this report the upright and accomplished mind from which they emanated. He commended the general purposes it disclosed. Of the details of the plan it would be premature to speak now; they would become a subject of discussion hereafter, as connected with a bill, which the Committee on Indian Affairs had just presented, in accordance with the designs of the Government. He would, however, solicit the attention of the House at this time to an important provision of our treaties with the Indians, very properly referred to by the Secretary of War. The treaty with the Delawares, concluded at Fort Pitt, on the 17th September, 1778, in the very crisis of the war of the revolution, contains the following article:

"ART. 6. And it is further agreed on between the contracting parties, should it be found conducive to the mutual interest of both parties, to invite any other tribes who have been friends to the United States to join the present confederation, and to form a State, whereof the Delaware nation shall be the head, and have a representative in Congress."

And in the treaty concluded with the Cherokees at Hopewell, on the 28th November, 1785, is the following:

"ART. 12. That the Indians may have full confidence in the justice of the United States, respecting their interests, they shall have a right to send a deputy of their choice, whenever they think fit, to Congress."

And in the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, with the Choctaws, of the 27th September, 1830, is the following:

"ART. 22. The chiefs of the Choctaws have suggested that their people are in a state of rapid advancement in education and refinement, and have expressed a solicitude that they might have the privilege of a delegate on the floor of the House of Representatives extended to them. The commissioners do not feel that they can, under treaty stipulation, accede to the request; but, at their desire, present in the treaty, that Congress may consider of and decide the application."

Finally, at so late a period as the 29th of December, 1835, in the treaty of New Echota, with the Cherokees, is this article:

"ART. 7. The Cherokee nation having already made great progress in civilization, and deeming it important that every proper and laudable inducement should be offered to their people to improve their condition, as well as to guard and secure in the most effectual manner the rights guaranteed to them in this treaty, and with a view to illustrate the liberal and enlightened policy of the Government of the United States towards the Indians in their removal beyond the territorial limits of the States, it is stipulated that they shall be entitled to a delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States, whenever Congress shall make provision for the same."

Now I cannot permit myself (said Mr. C.) to consider these reiterated stipulations as mere tricks of diplomacy, dishonest arts, false pretences held up to allure the Indians into treaties of cession and of emigration. This idea, continually suggested to them, has been: You shall become as we are; you shall be organized into a political community, under the guaranty and safeguard of the United States; you shall be heard in the great council of the American people. I desire to see this promise of the nation fulfilled, either to the letter, or, at any rate, in spirit and substance. I hope the Government acts in good faith in this matter. I know it has the power. I adjure it to exert an efficient will to accomplish its avowed plans of humanity and justice in behalf of the emigrant Indians.

The fate of the Indians, in every part of the United States has been a deplorable one, from the first day of our intercourse with them to the present hour. In Maine, the tribes so conspicuous once in the wars of New England and of Canada are sunk to a community of humble fishermen. In Massachusetts, in Rhode Island, in Connecticut, the Mohicans, the Pequots, the Narragansetts, names of pride and of power, have dwindled to a wretched remnant. In New York, how few survivors of that great and famous confederacy of the Six Nations! The Delawares and their kindred tribes have disappeared from Pennsylvania and Virginia. In the newer States, we see that process of decay or of extinction now going on which is consummated in the old ones; the Seminoles in arms on their native soil, fighting, not for life or land, but for vengeance, as I vowed, it would seem, like the Pequots, to a war of self extermination; the Creeks hurrying, in broken bands, to the West; the Cherokees, the most cultivated of the southern tribes, pausing over their doomed exile, like the waters of the cataract, which gather themselves on the edge of the precipice, ere they leap into the inevitable abyss.

Is there no responsibility devolved on us by this state of things? That we are wholly responsible for it, I can by no means admit. The condition in which we see the Indians has arisen from the fact that they are savages; that they are savages in contact with cultivated men; that they have not institutions of civilized life to guard their nationality and their property against the frauds and the vices of rapacious traders and land-pirates, nor the arts of civilized life wherewith to gain subsistence. These are obstacles to their advantage, which we, as a people, in our efforts for their advantage, have perseveringly, but as yet vainly, endeavored to overcome. Wars between them and us have resulted almost inevitably from our contiguity. Yet those wars are not imputable to any general spirit of unkindness on our part; and we have strenuously endeavored to prevent their arming against themselves to protect them against the frauds and injustice of the lawless of our own people, and to impart to them the blessings of civilization.

Still, indirectly, it is clear, we have to answer for the present degradation of the Indians, since we sought them, not they us; and if no Europeans had come hither, the aboriginal inhabitants of the country would have retained their independence and their pristine sovereignty. Abstractly considered, our conduct towards them, and the doctrines of public right which govern it, are marked by many traits of injustice. You take possession of their country by what you call the right of discovery, or by conquest. You pay them for it, say you? Yes, you purchase land enough for the domicile of a nation with a string of beads. And it is impossible to adjust to the standard of abstract justice a dominion built on the bones and cemented by the blood of vanquished and extinguished tribes. You must offend against their natural rights, when your power could not otherwise stand. They feel, as did the Indian described by Erskine: "Who is it," said the jealous ruler of the desert, encroached upon by the restless foot of transatlantic adventure; "who is it that causes this river to rise in the high mountains, and to empty itself into the ocean? Who is it that makes the loud winds of winter to blow, and that calms them again in summer? Who is it that rears up the shade of these lofty forests, and that blasts them with the quick lightning at his pleasure? The same Being who gave to you a country beyond the water, and gave ours to us; and by this title we will defend it," said the warrior, throwing down his tomahawk on the ground, and raising the war cry of his nation. These are the feelings of subjugated men every where, civilized or uncivilized. They are the feelings which produce the scenes now occurring in Florida. They are the feelings in violation of which our empire in the new world was founded. Yet, will you abandon the land now by nativity yours, the homes of your kindred and your affection? You will not! But your dominion over the country has no root in abstract equity, and it is extended and upheld only by your superior strength and art, not by their gratitude or their attachment for benefits received. And it behooves you to make reparation for the injury your very existence here inflicts on the Indian, by promoting, in all possible ways, his welfare, civilization, and peace.

Every consideration of policy calls upon us to conciliate, if we may, the Indians within our jurisdiction. We have compacted together in the West emigrant Indians from various quarters, tribes unfriendly or inimical to each other, sections of tribes reciprocally hostile, and all embittered, more or less, against us, by whom they have been driven from their own ancient abodes, and stripped of their long descended independence. Can savage warriors, the captives of battle, transported to the West, as chiefs of the hostile Creeks have recently been, prisoners of war in irons—can such men, constituted as they are, fail to nourish the vindictive and jealous feelings which belong to their nature? Will we take no pains to remove or allay these feelings of irritation? Will we deal justly with them hereafter? Will our equity and our mercy be manifested as signally as our power? Will we secure these victims of our destiny in their new lands; guard them against the intrusion of our own people, and front hostility among themselves? Redeem our promise of protection and political fellowship? It is but the question whether we shall enjoy peace and prosperity on our western frontier, or whether the Indian shall send his yell into the heart of our settlements, ravage our lands, burn our dwellings, massacre our wives and children. Would we rally his tribes to the flaming sign of war? Would we see the thirsty prairies soaked with the mingled blood of the red man and the white? If not, be warned in time by the spectacle of desolation and carnage in the South.

Is not East Florida laid waste? Have not millions upon millions been expended already in the as yet unavailing endeavor to subdue a fragment of the Seminoles? But what care of money? It is the sufferings of our own fellow-citizens, the lives of the brave men of our army and militia, perishing amid the pestilential swamps of that fatal region, the destruction of the deluded Indians themselves, the tarnished honor of our country, and not the treasure exhausted in the war, which I deplore. How many generals have left that field of war, baffled, if not defeated? Nay, is not the whole army of the United States thrown into distraction, and half dissolved by the contentions of rank, the competitions of service, the criminations and recriminations which have sprung up in such rank abundance, like some noxious growth of the tropics, out of the soil of East Florida? And if the desperation of a few Seminoles, either by their own efforts or the contagion of their example, can excite a war that shall summon to the field regiment after regiment of troops, to the amount, it is reported to us, first and last, of some twenty-five thousand men, what would be the consequence if injustice or mismanagement should kindle a similar flame among the Cherokees, the Creeks, and the great body of the emigrant Indians? God forbid that such a calamity should descend upon our beloved country.

Dictates of duty in this matter are not less imperative than arguments of policy. The Indians are in our hands. They have been sunk to what they are, if not by us, yet through us. We have assumed the guardianship of them, and have pledged ourselves, by stipulation after stipulation, to watch over their welfare. I invoke the faith of treaties, I appeal to the honor of the nation, I demand of its truth and justice, if there be any sense of right in civilized communities, that we act decidedly and promptly in the execution of some well-digested plan for the benefit of the Indians subject to our authority. Let us not speak to them only as conquerors, and in the language of relentless rigor; but to the victor that shall overawe and control, conjoin the justice that shall command respect, and the clemency that shall conciliate affection.

Mr. EVERETT said he felt called upon to reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Cushing,) to set himself right before the country. That gentleman had quoted a passage from the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, presented by him (Mr. E.) in 1834, in which it is said that the removal of the Indians to the west of the Mississippi was then the settled policy of the Government; and from the general tenor of his remarks it would seem that he relied on the quotation as an approval of the grounds on which it had been adopted, and as sanction for the manner in which that policy has been since executed. He desired that no such impressions should go forth to the country. That report was entirely a business article: every topic was studiously avoided that might revive the angry discussions of the past, or give rise to them in future. The committee found the policy definitively settled by the act of 1830, and in progress of execution. That such was the settled policy of the Government, is stated simply as a fact; and, that being settled, naught remained but to carry it into execution. The controversy between Georgia and the Cherokees, that gave rise to that act, was then past, and the committee did not, on that occasion, desire to revive it; nor did he now, notwithstanding what had since occurred, intend to revive it; let it go. Finding that policy thus definitively settled, it was the direct object of that report to carry it fully into execution. But, sir, by what measures, and in what manner? By measures consistent with the principles of good faith, and in manner consistent with the principles of humanity, and by such only. I have now nothing to say against the policy: my only complaint is solely against the measure by which it has been, and is now in execution. I complain that it has been executed in violation of national faith, and of the principles of humanity, by fraud, by force, by war. I refer to the Seminoles and Creeks. In relation to the Seminoles, I submitted my views to the House at the last session. I adhere to them. We have attempted to force upon them a treaty by which they were not bound. They resisted, and still resist it. I then earnestly desired that measures of conciliation should be attempted. It did not meet the approbation of the House or of the Executive. They must be whipped, was the expression used here. An executive order was issued to reduce them to unconditional submission. Four generals have been in the field; each has given place to a successor: the order remains unexecuted.

A small portion of the Creeks becoming hostile, a sweeping order was given to remove the whole nation, hostile or friendly; by force, if necessary. The treaty of 1832 secured to the Indians a right in their reservations, and to remain upon them—a right as perfect and as sacred as that by which any man holds the farm on which he lives. Yet, sir, this, notwithstanding, on the irruption of hostilities of a part of the nation only, this sweeping order was given. No previous inquiry was made into the causes of these hostilities, to ascertain whether they did not originate from us. No, sir; the order was given, and put in execution as a military measure. It now appears that the first fault was our own; that the fraudulent and oppressive conduct of the whites was the cause of the Creek hostilities. Speculators had obtained forged deeds of their lands, driven them from their homes, reduced them to starvation, to desperation. Sir, under such circumstances, would not white men rise in arms?

[Mr. HOLLEY of Georgia, called on Mr. EVERETT to state the evidence on which his statement, "that the frauds committed on the Creeks was the cause of their hostilities,"

Mr. E. said that he was not aware that any one would, at this day, question the fact. For the evidence he would refer the gentleman to the documents published, and particularly to the famous Shorter letters, detailing the particular manner in which the forged deeds were obtained, and the extent of the forgeries. A band of from twenty to fifty Indians would be collected in the woods, who would personate the surrounding Indian reserves, and, for a trifling reward, give deeds of their lands. And, under such deeds, certified by a Government agent on the spot, the Indians were driven from their settlements. That such acts would and had produced the Creek hostilities, was his inference.

Mr. H. after stating that the hostilities did not break out in the sections of the country where the frauds were committed, called on Mr. E. to designate the parts of the Creek country where the frauds were committed.

Mr. E. said he thought he was entitled to call on the gentleman to state in what part of the Creek country the frauds had not been committed.]

I will now call the attention of the House to the manner in which the removal of the Creeks is conducted. Whether they are regarded as friendly or hostile, they are entitled to be treated with at least common humanity. I say nothing of the removal of some thousand or more in irons; possibly necessity may require it—possibly they may have been of the hostile party, or of those whom force alone could compel to leave their country; necessity may have required it—pass them by. I speak of the great mass of the population, of men, women, and children. Since the debate of yesterday, I have had put into my hands an appalling description of their sufferings—of what are probably their sufferings at this moment. The recital is enough to make one's blood run cold. It is a letter from a gentleman at Fort Gibson, published in the Arkansas Gazette. The name of the writer is not given; but the letter carries on its face internal evidence of its truth; and we are relieved from the fact that the Gazette is an administration paper. I will ask that it be read at the Clerk's table.

"FROM THE WEST."

"Extract of a letter from a gentleman in the West to his friend in this place:

"DECEMBER 25, 1836.

"There is now arriving at Fort Gibson, and on the road between that place and the Mississippi river, near 14,000 Creek Indians, under course of removal, by the Government of the United States, to their new country on the Arkansas river. The removal is made by a company of contractors, who receive a stated sum per head for each Indian delivered to the officers of Government appointed to receive them at the line of their new country.

"These contractors are bound to subsist them on their journey; and the removal of the Indians is, to them, a matter of speculation. It therefore becomes their interest to rush them on, regardless of either comfort or convenience to the Indians. And, in fact, those contractors could not reasonably be expected to consult the comforts of the Indians to such extent, as their own individual expense. Therefore, the policy of removing them by contract is a bad one, as is well known to every one who is at all familiar with Indian removals.

"Those people have necessarily, from the impoverished condition of many of them, to move slowly; and perhaps more so than was anticipated by the contractors previous to their starting; consequently, they may not be able, without incurring much individual expense, to extend to the Indians even the indulgence of some that common humanity requires; and whether they comply with their obligation in this case or not, I am not prepared to say; but be that as it may, no portion of American history can furnish a parallel of the misery and suffering at present endured by the emigrating Creeks. They consist of all ages, sexes, and sizes, and of all the varieties of human intellect and condition, from the civilized and tenderly nurtured matron and misses, to the wild savage and the poorest of the poor.

"Thousands of them are entirely destitute of shoes, or covering of any kind for the feet; many of them are almost naked; and but few of them have any thing more on their persons than a light dress, calculated only for the summer, or for a very warm climate; and the weather being warm when they left Alabama, many of them left their heavier articles of clothing, expecting them to be brought on in steamboats, which has as yet been only partially done. In this destitute condition they are wading the cold mud, or are hurried on over the frozen road, as the case may be. Many of them have in this way had their feet frostbitten, and, being unable to travel, fall in the rear of the main party; and in this way are left on the road, to await the ability or convenience of the contractors to assist them. Many of them, not being able to endure this unexampled state of human suffering, die, and, it is said, are thrown by the side of the road, and are covered only with brush, &c. where they remain until devoured by the wolves.

"How long this state of things will exist is hard to conjecture. It is now past the middle of December, and the winter, though cold, is by no means at its worst stage; and when the extreme of winter does fall upon these most miserable creatures, in their present suffering and desperate condition, the destruction of human life will be most deplorable.

"The American people, it is presumed, are as yet unacquainted with the condition of those people; and it is hoped that, when they do become acquainted with the facts, the philanthropic portion of the community will not be found wanting in their efforts to alleviate, as far as practicable, their extreme suffering. They are in want of almost every article in common use in a civilized community, particularly clothing, and any thing of that kind would be highly acceptable—such as coarse gowns, shirts, coats, pantaloons, shoes, &c. which, if given during this winter, might be the means of saving many lives.

"It should be borne in mind that the Creeks now on their way have voluntarily removed from their homes, in Alabama, before the time at which they could be positively required to move; and that on promises made to them, some of which have not, and in all probability will not, be complied with; and, after agreeing to remove, they left their country in such haste, that many of them were not able to make sale of their property; and those who did effect sales, it is said, did not receive more than half value for the property sold.

"It is thought, by many persons, that the Creeks now on their way, and arriving in this country, have been recently hostile to the whites, and that they have been removed by force of arms from the country east of the Mississippi; but such is not the fact. Apothlahola and his people, now under course of removal, have been, with but few exceptions, friendly to the whites, and aided them in the defeat and subjugation of Nehemathla and his 2,500 followers, who were brought on to this country early in the fall, and who are at this time hostile in feeling, not only to the whites, but to Apothlahola's party. Furthermore, Apothlahola has with him the families of near a thousand of his warriors, now serving with our army in Florida.

"If the removal of the Indians had been made by officers of the Government, whose commissions would rest upon a faithful execution of their duty both to the Government and to the Indians, (as was the case in the removal of the Choctaws some years since,) the case would have been very different from what it has been in this case. The condition of the Indians would have been better, and the actual expense to the Government would have been less; much more indulgence as to time could have been extended to them by the Government, than could be given by private individuals; they would have been more comfortable, and consequently less liable to sickness and death, and to the terrible suffering which they at present have to endure.

"I will here remark that, to each separate party of four or five thousand of those Indians, there is attached, as agent of the Government, an officer of the army, which officers have no doubt discharged their duty in the matter to the fullest extent of their power. At any rate, not the least complaint has been heard to have been made against any one of them; and they are said to stand high in the estimation of the Indians, and have had considerable turmoil with the contractors.

"It is not my purpose to cast any reflection or censure in any particular quarter, but there is a fault somewhere, and it is to be hoped that the inquiring community will look to the causes which have led to this great extreme of human suffering."

On the statement made in this letter I shall make no comment. I make no charge against the administration as having intended or countenanced this state of things. I fear, however, that they have not taken all proper precaution to prevent it. It is stated, and I am glad to know it, that the officers of the Government attending the emigrating party are not in fault. They, it seems, have done every thing in their power. The fault is in the contractors. I hope no such case will again occur. It is our duty to prevent it, if possible. I would not place economy against humanity. I should be willing to treble the amount of the appropriation, if necessary, for the comfort of the emigrants. Abolish the removals by contract; subject them not to the avarice of contractors.

Mr. PARKER moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to modify and amend it as to strike out all the general appropriations made therein for the Indian tribes, and insert in their place specific appropriations founded on the estimates for which the money is required and stated to be due.

Mr. HOLSEY said the gentleman from New Jersey has moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to specify on the face of the bill a particular amount of appropriation for each item of expenditure for the removal of the Creek Indians. I am opposed to this motion on two grounds. First, because the details upon which the aggregate appropriation is founded, have already been furnished by the commissioner of the Indian bureau, printed, and laid upon the table of each member, before the bill was taken up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Secondly, because the execution of the treaty stipulations being dependent upon facts which this House do not know, and cannot ascertain until the time of the actual removal of the Indians, it would not only embarrass, but even prevent the execution of some of the articles of the treaty. Upon the first ground, the House will perceive that it is not called upon to vote a sum total of the public money without a knowledge of the integral parts which compose it. They have been spread before us with a minuteness sufficient to satisfy the most scrupulous, and a certainty to which a riser prius pleader could not take exception—a certainty not only to a common intent, but in every particular. There is a special count per head for removal after the line of march is taken up; another for rations whilst in camp preparatory to removal; a third for rifles, ammunition, blankets, blacksmiths, &c. &c. (Here Mr. H. read from the estimates of the Commissioner of the Indian Department, the various details, and said) Gentlemen had called for specifications. Tedious as they are, I have given them, because they were demanded, and will ask in return the measure of legal justice, a recovery secundum allegata et probata. But the gentleman from New Jersey is content with the items and their corresponding expenditure, but insists that they should be brought into the bill. A glance at the treaty presents insuperable objections. By the 13th article, each Creek warrior to be furnished with a rifle and ammunition, and each family with a blanket. As the number of these articles must necessarily depend upon the number of warriors and families at the time of executing the treaty, a specific amount for these purposes must run the hazard either of excess or deficiency. Again, sir, you insert in the bill a special amount ($28 50) per head to defray the expenses of subsistence and transportation. Shall your emigrating contractors have no less, or will you give them no more? The same may be said as to rations whilst in a preparatory state to removal. But I will not multiply instances. I have already enumerated enough to show that the Executive Department, being charged with the execution of the treaty and the removal of the Indians, and these objects being influenced by facts and contingencies which the Legislature can neither know nor control, specific appropriations for particular items can only tend to clog or defeat the main end and design of the bill, the removal of the Indians, and the fulfilment of the national obligations.

But, sir, the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Everett) has assumed positions in regard to our Indian relations which, as one of the representatives of Georgia, I cannot permit to pass unnoticed upon this floor. While he admits it is the settled policy of the Government to transplant the aborigines beyond the Mississippi, he maintains that the portion of the Creeks recently removed to the West have been torn from their birthright and their homes, in contravention of the national faith solemnly pledged in the treaty of March, 1832. He interposes the same objection to the passage of this bill, which provides for the removal of the remaining portion of the tribe; arrays the frauds perpetrated upon them in the sale of reservations by our own people as the causes of their late hostilities; and whilst pouring out the melting charities of his heart, the deepest sympathies of his soul, for the injuries and sufferings of the degraded sons of Ishmael, reserves for his own race the freezing admonition that those who sow the wild must reap the whirlwind; who unchain the tiger must abide his fury as he walks upon his destroying path. Sir, I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Vermont, both in sentiment and opinion. I boldly avow my attachment for the race from which I have descended, and with whom I have united in the civil state for the purpose of defence against foreign invasion. I have no tears to shed for the savage who buries the tomahawk in the mother's breast, and imbrues his hands in her infant's blood. I rejoice that American arms have been enabled to arrest the barbarians in their march of blood and conflagration, and to transplant them beyond the jurisdiction of the States. The honorable gentleman from Vermont has entrenched himself on the high grounds of the treaty, and opened his batteries upon the Government for a violation of its provisions, by removing the Indians against their consent. A single fire will dislodge him from his position. By the laws of nations a state of war abrogates pre-existing treaties. If the Government continues to fulfil the remaining clauses of the treaty, it is only from a principle of humanity, and not from any considerations arising from good faith to the Indians. If they have raised the tomahawk and scalping knife for the adjustment of their wrongs, they cannot complain that the musket and the bayonet have been made the umpire of our differences. The treaty was therefore cancelled by the commencement of hostilities, and their removal a military operation essential to the peace and safety of the frontiers. But the gentleman from Vermont has said that he has evidence in his possession to show that the frauds committed in the sales of Indian reservations were the causes of the recent aggressions on the part of the Creek nation. I demand not only the evidence of fraud, but proof that if any were committed, they were the causes of hostilities.

(Here Mr. Everett stated that his opinion was formed from the report of Col. Hogan, an agent appointed to investigate the allegations of fraud.)

The honorable gentleman prejudices not only the charges of fraud, but how far they may have led to the war—subjects which are now under the investigation of commissioners appointed under a resolution of the last session of Congress. If, as he supposes, the alleged frauds were the causes of the war, we would naturally expect to find the seat of war in the districts where they were committed. But the history of the Creek war is directly at variance with the gentleman's supposition. In McHenry's district, where alone there is a single allegation supported by the least color of proof, the natives maintained their friendly relations with but few exceptions. In the district certified by General Sanford, an officer deservedly high in the confidence of the Government, and of elevated and irreproachable character, and where I call upon the gentleman from Vermont to lay his finger upon a single case of fraud sustained by a shadow of evidence, the war had its rise, progress, and end. Thus it seems where there was fraud there was the least aggression, and where there was no fraud the war raged in all its horrors. Sir, were I to seek for the sources of the war with the Creek Indians, I should dive deeper into the recesses of the human heart, and look beyond the sale of Indian reservations. Without reverting to the discovery of the continent, and the nature of the causes which have produced the existing relations between the two races, I assume it as a fact, verified by daily experience and observation, that there exists between them a deep, national animosity, which, upon the borders, is continually manifesting itself in open violence. It is in vain, sir, that you may look for a state of tranquillity between two people so opposite in character as savage and civilized man. In vain may you look for it between the red and the white man, burning under a sense of mutual injuries for centuries. I repeat it, sir, hostilities will ever mark the line of your frontier. They spring necessarily out of existing relations, and a state of peace is but a temporary suspension of hostilities. Sir, treat as you please, act as you please, reservations or no reservations, fraud or no fraud, the removal of a warlike tribe of Indians, like that of the Creeks, becomes, from the nature of things, a military measure. They will not go as subjects; revenge must sweeten the bitter cup of their departure. Why, sir, you might give them ten times the value of their lands, both by treaty and private contract, and it would not affect the result. It is the tempest of the human soul, and you cannot bribe it. Neither the ingenuity nor the power of man can hush it into silence. As the hour of removal approaches, portentous clouds begin to darken the horizon, and the note of preparation is the electric fire which rends them asunder, and calls down all their fury.

In spite of all your treaties, your justice, or your magnanimity, they will not tamely relinquish your soil to your possession. For it they will exact not only your gold, but your blood. Gentlemen are grossly deceived, who imagine that in the absence of this tribe would peaceably have emigrated beyond the Mississippi! The supposition betrays an entire want of knowledge of the Indian character, and of causes which have been operating for ages past.

But, sir, my honorable colleague (Mr. Dawson) has imputed this war to the Government as its author. This is a grave charge, and requires examination. Sir, I had supposed that the Executive chief of this nation was the last man upon earth on whom this reproach could be cast. The blood and tears of helpless innocence, whilst falling the victims of Indian barbarity, will never cry to Heaven against him. (Here Mr. Dawson explained, by saying that he did not mean to implicate the President, but those through whose agency the clause for reservations in the treaty had been inserted.) I am happy to find my colleague disclaim all imputations upon the Chief Executive. The charge was made and reiterated against the Government. Now, sir, I am at a loss to find the Government, in the formation of a treaty, without the President. He forms the treaty, and the Senate approves or rejects it. When the Government is censured for the formation of an improper treaty, I take it for granted the President is implicated. But my colleague has disclaimed it, and I will press it no further. I hope, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey will not prevail, and that the House will pass the bill.

Mr. DAWSON, of Georgia, said the course which the debate had taken on the bill before the House had made it his duty, as one of the representatives of Georgia, to ask the indulgence of the House, for a short time, that he might be heard upon some of the facts stated by gentlemen, and briefly to reply to some of the insinuations, charges, and allegations which had been made in relation to that part of the Union from which he came. The range of this discussion had been wide, and to his mind, (Mr. D. said,) in a great measure unauthorized by the objects of the bill; questions and subjects having but little connection, if any, had been introduced.

Gentlemen had spoken freely and sympathetically touching the policy pursued in relation to the Indians, and especially the Creeks, and had plainly intimated, if not charged, that humanity had been violated, and the character of the country blackened by acts of cruelty to them; that the conduct of the citizens of Georgia and Alabama to these Indians had given origin to the late war, which, it seems, has not yet entirely subsided, and, in its consequences, the butchery of men, women, and children, depredations, and desolation of property.

Mr. Speaker, permit me (said Mr. D.) to say these allegations contain not the true causes of the war. It is a mistake, a very great mistake; it is not so. Truth and justice unite, and deny that Georgia and Alabama were in fault in this matter to such an extent as to justify so grave an allegation; and in their vindication, and especially those of my constituents who have been denominated the people of the frontiers, and against whom it has been said the dire calamities which were perpetrated on the eastern and western banks of the Chattahoochee river, during the last spring and summer, were partially chargeable, I may say, without being influenced by State pride, a more honorable and high minded population inhabit no portion of this Union, and for the fulfilment of their duties as good and worthy citizens, politically and morally, are not inferior to any other portion of the confederacy. The charge that their conduct forced the Indians into a state of desperation, and caused the bloody and savage acts which they committed, is not true or just, nor can it, with any propriety, be made. Sir, the people of that section of the country are benevolent and generous, and possess, at least in an equal degree, every sympathy common to our nature, and which excites noble and honorable acts, and would extend the influence of these virtuous feelings as far as any people on earth. And here, in all kindness and good feeling to the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Vermont, who, on yesterday and to-day, addressed the House with so much sympathy in behalf of the aborigines, and who depicted, with so much pathos, the oppressions and cruelties which had been inflicted on that race, I can say no man indulges a more sincere desire to alleviate their condition, and improve their minds and their morals, than I do; and the gentlemen will pardon me for reminding them that the tide, the first wave of which began to flow on the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth, (1620,) and beat on that rock which now occupies, as a curiosity, the centre of the town of Plymouth, and is to this day respected as sacred, is still flowing, and will finally urge this race beyond the Mississippi, without leaving a remnant behind. The waves of this tide have, in its floods, left the remembrance of oppressions and seeming, if not actual, cruelties towards the people of the forest, which the history of the New England pilgrims and their descendants has recorded. On the pages of that history scenes are painted not less abhorrent to humanity or less appalling to the sickly imaginations of the present than those scenes of cruelty and oppression to which such frequent reference has been made during this debate. May I permitted to ask, where are the mighty tribes of Indians who once occupied the delightful regions of New England, and from the "mountain top" limited their extent only by the surrounding sky, and who, in their native freedom, sported on the beautiful rivers, and who spread so much terror and consternation among the first white settlers? They are gone, sir; and the places which knew them once will know them no more. And by what power were they forced, at least, from the land of the pilgrims?

Sir, I will not cry out cruelty, inhumanity, or injustice, or indulge in a needless and unnecessary tirade about the policy pursued in that section, in that period and since, towards the people, whose condition we cannot improve; it would, perhaps, be unkind so to act or to speak, for necessity, no doubt, prescribed the policy of that day; the same causes would now produce similar effects. I will, however, remind gentlemen that the same tide which, I might say, was put in motion by the Puritans, in its floods, has spread desolation over the natives of the forests—first in the East—and it will not ebb, I apprehend, until they are utterly annihilated; the idea is unpleasant, yet it is clearly the result to be gathered from the past history of this country, and the indications of the future. Let not the East, then, reflect on the policy of the General Government, or the States, in relation to the aborigines; necessity and policy prescribe the course of all, mingled with and regulated by justice and humanity.

I trust the House will pardon me for alluding, at this time, to the legislation of Georgia, and her course towards these people: her laws, when understood, will be approved—her statute books will show the protection and securities guaranteed to the Indians. Their persons and property are as inviolable as those of the whites; personal wrongs committed on them by the whites are punished by the same law, and to the same extent, as if committed on a white man.

As to the indignities towards the Indians, the patience with which Georgia awaited the fulfilment of the compact of 1802 will show. And it is worthy of remark that, notwithstanding the various tribes which have resided in that State from the revolution to this day, her history is not stained by a single act of cruelty towards that people; nor has an Indian suffered the penalty of the law for its violation, which a white man would not have suffered for the same offence. Nor has the policy of Georgia, within the last forty years, and I believe never, nor have the acts of any portion of her citizens involved this Government in a single border war. But, sir, for a few years past individuals, and perhaps numbers of very good men, have labored under a delusion and belief that Georgia had acted towards the Indians within her limits with great rigor and oppression. This is not true, to the extent alleged: in fact every act of the State had been justifiable and demanded by the state of our Indian relations. No State, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. D.) in this Union has exhibited more magnanimity and indulgence towards the Indians. How long have the Cherokees been in the peaceable and quiet occupancy of the lands of Georgia, within her constitutional limits, and guaranteed by the General Government in the compact of 1802? More than a half century, sir. What has arrested the growth of Georgia for so many years, and kept her in the rear of the old thirteen? Her kindness and generosity to the Indians, sir! Which of the States, originally forming the Constitution of this Union has borne such an incumbrance upon its prosperity? None, sir—none.

Is it not then unkind and ungenerous, yea, unjust and exciting, to be charged at this day, by those who have swept the Indians from their soil years ago, with unrelenting extermination? But the cry has been raised of cruelty and oppression, and the madness of the day must have time to cool. I trust, sir, I may be pardoned for the digressions into which I have been drawn by this debate.

To return to the causes of the late war. It has been asked, if the conduct of the citizens of Georgia and Alabama did not produce the war, what did? I answer, the treaty, and the consequences proceeding necessarily from it. Yes, sir, the treaty entered into at Washington city, by the United States and the chiefs of the Creek nation, in 1832. My opinion is, and so is the opinion of all who fully understand all its parts, that out of the terms of that treaty grew the primum cause of the misfortunes, butcheries, and desolations which the people of Georgia and Alabama suffered within the last eighteen months. Let me explain. The reservations, the Indian reservations, sir, turned the Creek country into a market, overt and covert, for sales and contracts, honest and dishonest; for frauds, limited and extensive; and to this market speculators of all sizes, classes, and characters, individually and in confederacy, and those who were too honest to act improperly in person, sent their men. From these reservations spring the contracts and sales, honest and dishonest, and all the frauds about which so much has this day been said. And these frauds chiefly, and perhaps an unwillingness on the part of the Indian to go west of the Mississippi, produced the late war. Hence, my assertion is true, that the provisions of the treaty created the causes of the war—the frauds, the war—the reservations, the frauds—the treaty, the reservations. Hear the second article of that treaty; it reads thus: "The United States engage to survey the land as soon as the same can conveniently be done, after the ratification of the treaty; and when the same is surveyed, to allow ninety principal chiefs of the Creek tribe to select one section each, and every other head of a Creek family to select one-half section each, which tract shall be reserved from sale for their use, for the term of five years, unless sooner disposed of by them." &c.

The 3d article says: "These tracts may be conveyed by the persons selecting the same to any other persons, for a fair consideration, in such manner as the President may direct; the contract shall be certified by some person appointed for that purpose by the President, but shall not be valid till the President approves the same; a title shall be given by the United States, on the completion of the payment." Who cannot see, at a glance, that this treaty, concocted, arranged, planned, and ratified here, in the city of Washington, threw open, wide and broad, the doors for speculation, fraud, and corruption? And, sir, I have no doubt one of the contracting parties saw it, and knew it, and it seems, endeavored to provide against it; for the 3d article, which contemplates a sale, says "these reservations may be sold, for a fair consideration, in such a manner as the President may direct; the contract shall be certified by some person appointed for that purpose by the President." &c. Georgia or Alabama did not create this mother of so many evils; no, sir, it took its origin in the city of Washington, and was the production of those in the departments of this Government, and who should be answerable for the dreadful and heart-rending calamities, frauds, speculations, and infamous combinations for unworthy purposes, growing out of it? The answer is palpable.

And, sir, who has not heard it and seen it in the public prints, that this treaty had been made a means, an engine, an instrument in the hands of Governmental agents, in combination with individuals and companies, for, in many instances, dishonest speculations and fraud? Yes, sir, these things are public; and, in my view, it is clear that this treaty, with its reservations, has been used for the mercenary interests of others than a portion of the people of Georgia and Alabama. Yea, North and South, and East and West, and this centre, Washington city, the place which gave birth to the treaty, are said, and I have no reason to doubt it, to have recipients and partakers of these fraudulent speculations. The day, I trust, will come, when the curtain shall be removed, and the authors, active and dormant, in these dark deeds of infamy, shall be dragged forward on the scene; when the whole of the facts connected with this treaty and the frauds shall be developed with damning proof against the guilty, and ample justification and approval of the honest speculators or purchasers, when the world shall know where to attach the blame, to apply the finger of scorn, and the accents of indignant reprobation. Then we shall find who has pocketed the proceeds of frauds carried into successful operation by means of this measure of the Government, the treaty. And yet, sir, notwithstanding the many actors in these atrocities, exclusive censure has been directed to the contiguous States of these frauds, and they alone exposed and branded as the originators of the evils which have followed. Let every one bear his share of the blame, as well as his portion of public indignation, whether he be in office, high or low, or occupying a private station; they who are equally guilty of fraud should be equal in every thing else.

To change the conclusions which have been drawn by myself and others, in relation to the causes of the war, it has been said, and I think by my colleague, (Mr. H.) that the white population on the frontiers and the Indians are generally in a state of hostility with each other; as a proposition, it may be true, but in relation to the late Creek war it was not so; for I have no recollection of any acts of oppression to the Indians, or of hostilities from them. The Indians were peaceable until the consequences from the treaty began to develop themselves. Frauds, it is said, were committed in relation to the reservations, which could be effected only by a combination of the certifying agents; and, unless the agents connived, a fraud could not be easily practised. The removal of suspected agents, by the President, took place in order to protect the Indians; but, sir, notwithstanding, frauds were perpetrated, the Indians were swindled, and they, at least a part of them, became desperate, particularly when the man or men which their Great Father the President had sent for their protector, had become a traitor to their interest, and was instrumental, as has been charged on this floor, and elsewhere, in defrauding them.

Men from every section, almost of this wide confederacy, concentrated in the Creek country about this period—and for what purpose did they go? To take the advantages which the provisions of the treaty unfortunately presented for speculation in Indian reservations. They did make it a source of speculation, and plunged innocent and unoffending men, women, and children, of Georgia and Alabama, on each side of the river Chatahoochee, in all the horrors of a bloody and savage warfare, by their impious and eager thirst for gain and profit; and when they had consummated their speculations and frauds, in which some Georgians and Alabamians participated, they return to their homes, and add to their infamy, by slandering and calumniating the people on the frontiers, whom they had already too much injured, by libelling them as being the instigators and cause of the dreadful consequences of their own acts of injustice.

Sir, there has been an immense machine in motion in relation to these frauds, and similar speculations, in every section of the country where the public lands are for sale. Where can its location be, sir? I have heard it said, probably in the city of Washington. One thing seems to be most certain, that it is in operation; but who manages the handle, and regulates its mighty action, is beyond discovery. Speculation is the order of the day, and those who have engaged in it, as individuals or companies, are becoming rich—whether active or dormant partners; and those who have committed the frauds upon the Indians in the Creek country, whether they were agents or officers of the Government, individuals, or companies, or otherwise, are, in a great measure, by the use of the treaty and its unfortunate and unwise provisions, the cause of the late Indian difficulties.

The gentleman from Vermont had very eloquently and feelingly depicted these frauds, and had also presented to this House a deplorable picture, as drawn, of the condition and situation of the emigrating Creeks; and also by the anonymous letter which he has caused to be read by the Clerk. Suppose all this to be true, no censure should be attributed to Georgia or Alabama, for they had no more connection with these matters than any other States in the Union; it is a matter in the exclusive control of the General Government.

(Mr. EVERETT arose, and asked Mr. D. to permit him to explain.)

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. E. said) had misapprehended the scope of his remarks. He certainly did not intend to make any imputation against the character of any State; and thought his expressions had been sufficiently guarded to exclude such a construction. He had, in general terms, charged the Creek frauds on the whites; he had not designated to what portion of country they belonged. He was well aware, as the gentleman from Georgia, that they did not belong exclusively to the adjoining States; that persons of high standing elsewhere were concerned in the frauds and the removal; and that it would be in the highest degree illiberal and unjust to characterize any State by the improper conduct of a few individuals; and he could have no doubt that the conduct of these speculators was held in as deep reprobation in Georgia and Alabama, as in any part of the Union.]

Yes, sir, (said Mr. Dawson.) there is no doubt of that fact, and I am gratified at the explanation. The letter, sir, which has been read before this House, detailing the condition of the emigrating Creeks, whether true or false, had no relation to the States from whence they had removed; nor could it originate censure against those States which had suffered by their murders, arson, and robberies. If censure were due, it properly attached to the Government, or its agents, as this article of the treaty will clearly demonstrate: "Art. 12. The United States are desirous that the Creeks should remove to the country west of the Mississippi, and join their countrymen there; and for this purpose it is agreed that, as fast as the Creeks are prepared to emigrate, they shall be removed at the expense of the United States; and shall receive subsistence whilst on their journey, and for one year after their arrival at their new home." &c.

The Government is thereby bound to remove the Creeks, and to subsidize and protect them, and to pay all the expenses of removal; and to support them and supply them for one year after their arrival at their "new home." These are obligations and duties belonging to the Government, and for their fulfilment and discharge ample appropriations have been made by Congress. If these duties and obligations have been neglected; and if it be true that these people are in the miserable condition represented, that their sufferings are such as have been portrayed, the fault must be on the agents of the Government. The contractors for removal, I understand, have fulfilled their contracts; no cause of censure justly applies to any State; the Government is responsible.

Sir, needless sympathy seems to have been excited, in consequence of the few hostile Creeks having been emigrated in chains. This is true, and was an act just and proper, and the officers of the Government deserve no censure for this; justice and humanity prompted it; it was due to the safety of the defenceless women and children of the frontiers, and for the protection of the property of our citizens in that section, which was then a scene of desolation, conflagration, and murder; and, sir, it was an act of kindness to the Indians themselves, thus to force them to their new home, and prevent them from remaining and avenging their mistaken and savage propensities by acts of cruelty and murder against the whites; and it gave them an escape from the vengeance of a justly incensed and excited community, who had been roused to desperation by the murderous acts of these very emigrating Indians. It was an act of pure grace and favor, for, by the laws of the land, these murderers of women and children, and desolators of property, and destroyers of the public mails, had forfeited their lives, and deserved death. But, sir, the generous, and noble, and forgiving feelings of our nature permitted them to escape the vengeance of the violated law. Let no man speak of the indignation of the injured Georgians and Alabamians leading to cruelty; the emigration of these Indians, after the murders they had committed, the robberies and conflagrations they had perpetrated, being permitted by an injured people to escape, and to have taken up their line of march for the West, amidst in view of the smoking ruins of Roanoke, amidst the remains of which now lie the bones and ashes of fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters, innocent and unoffending women and children, who were murdered by the deadly rifles of these emigrants, or perished in the flames of the conflagration. Mr. Speaker, their permission to escape is wondrous, and speaks volumes in favor of that portion of this Union, and will command applause. Such an indulgence to the ignorance and savage ferocity of the men of the forest can be found in the history only of Georgia and Alabama.

There is still a part of the people remaining, and the appropriation contained in the bill before the House is to effect their removal; let me, in the name of an exposed and injured people, urge that it should be made, and these Indians removed. Then may the men, women, and children, of that suffering portion of the Union, sleep secure, and be relieved from all the fears and apprehensions of savage atrocities.

Mr. EVERETT said he was gratified that he had made the occasion for the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Georgia on his left (Mr. Dawson.) If any thing could have reconciled him to some acts of that State now passed and gone by, it would be the tone, the temper, and the manly bearing of that gentleman. He had listened with admiration to the instant, the impassioned, and able defence of the character of his State, called out on the mere (mis) apprehension that it had been assailed. The honor of that State was in safe keeping so long as that gentleman retained a seat on that floor.

The gentleman had not, however, contented himself with repelling the supposed attack, but he had crossed the line, and carried the war into the North. He had significantly asked if the Indians had no charges to bring against New England? Sir, I would that I could say no. Some things were there transacted of which New England has no reason to be proud; but some allowance is to be made for the peculiar opinions of that day, and some for the advance of the age. The acts done then would now be sins against greater light and knowledge. In relation to the Indians, there are some pages in the history of New England which I wish had never been there; some that I wish could be obliterated. I wish the modern process of expunging could be applied to them by this body, or by any body elsewhere.

[Mr. HOLSEY asked Mr. E. to repeat the words, not having heard distinctly.]

I said that there are some pages in the history of New England that I wish could be obliterated; and I now say I should be glad to see the modern process of expunging applied to them—that black lines should be drawn around the page, and across it written "expunged by order of the Senate." This, sir, would be applying the process to some good purpose. I have then only to say that it will be time enough to quote the wrongs of New England as a justification when these wrongs are justified.

I have been charged by the gentleman from Georgia on my right (Mr. Holsey) with an exclusive sympathy for Indian suffering, and none for those of the whites—none for the men, women, and children murdered by the savages. That I have felt strongly the injustice perpetrated against that race in all time, but more flagrant of late, I will not deny. But, sir, what occasion have I given for the residue of the charge? It is this: that I have not resented content with exciting attention to the immediate cause—to the excited savage alarm—but to those who have excited him to those inhuman acts. He who unchains the tiger, takes the responsibility. The savage is the instrument of cruelty in the hands of him who excites him to war. I will notice one other remark of the same gentleman. He has stated that the natural relation of the Indian to the whites is that of war. That such is the inherent disposition of the Indian, on any proper occasion I would make the issue; that we have been always the aggressor, I do not say; but that we have been so more often than they, I think our own history will fully sustain. In judging them, we weighed them in even scales with ourselves. We have made no allowances for the difference of temperament and feelings of their race; what should not provoke, we deem it highly unreasonable that it should rouse the savage to revenge. The occasion, however, is not appropriate for the further discussion of this question.

[General GLASCOCK'S remarks on this subject have been heretofore published, and will be found at page 152.]

Mr. LEWIS said he rose in a state of severe indisposition and suffering, under which he had labored for the last two days, to protest against the common cry of frauds, frauds, which resounds from so many quarters of this House whenever an appropriation is asked to suppress the hostilities, or to effect the removal of the Creek Indians. He said it was most strange that this cry should again be heard, on this occasion, when a considerable portion of the appropriation asked was, in fact, for the purpose of the investigation of the very frauds against which gentlemen so bitterly complained. One would suppose that, if such a holy horror of fraud actuated this House, there would be no difficulty in passing this appropriation; that every means would be adopted to facilitate the investigation which is now going on; and that the clamorous indignation of gentlemen would be withheld, until they received the report of the commissioners charged with the investigation.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) if these accusations of fraud were, or could be, confined to the miserable perpetrators who had engaged in them, he certainly would not say a word in their vindication, or attempt, in any manner, to avert from them the withering blast of public reprobation. He had no sympathies in common with them, whether they were, or were not, his constituents; but he asked whether the acts of a band of lawless swindlers, he would not call them speculators, should draw down the indiscriminate denunciations of the House upon the great mass of respectable settlers who reside in that portion of Alabama? Are these frauds to be a standing reproach to the entire community? Are these settlers, who, if gentlemen are right in supposing the late Creek war to have been produced by the frauds practised on the Indians, are they to be deprived of all sympathy for their losses and sufferings, and even their just claims on this Government to be prejudiced and drowned in such vociferations of fraud? He trusted not.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) it will be recollected that the first complaint that was heard on this floor against the very frauds of which gentlemen speak, was from the people of that portion of Alabama, and the adjoining portions of Georgia. Yes, sir, from a very large and respectable portion of the settlers, who were in the immediate vicinity of these outrages upon law and honesty. Sir, it was these people who first demanded the investigation which is now going on. The House could not fail to remember the urgent petition which he (Mr. L.) presented at a late period of the last session, coming from so large a number of these people, charging the existence of these frauds, and demanding the most prompt and thorough investigation. What stronger proof do gentlemen want to convince them that, if such frauds have been practised in that section of country, they are no where visited with more unqualified condemnation and indignation, than by the very people among whom, and in outrage of the feelings of whom, they were perpetrated.

Nor must gentlemen think that, because these frauds were committed in Alabama, they were therefore committed wholly by Alabamians. Sir, it is like all other cases of frauds in the purchase of Indian reservations, and wherever Indian reservations have been purchased, the fraudulent, not only from the adjoining, but from more distant States, have flocked together, and formed companies to engage in the common work of cheating the Indian. If I were asked, in the absence of a report on this subject from the commissioners, if fraud existed, I would answer affirmatively, if inquired as to the theatre of these frauds, I would say in the Creek country of Alabama; if questioned as to the individuals by whom these frauds were committed, to what State they belong, I would say not to any one State, but possibly to all of them, to the United States. Many of the individuals belonging to these companies, and among them probably the most unscrupulous, because the least known, doubtless did not then, nor do they now, live in the State of Alabama. Gentlemen, therefore, in denouncing the authors of this general system and harvest of fraud, may, in some instances, denounce their own constituents as well as mine; but, in so doing, they give a location to their censure which, I have no doubt, will be found to be most unjust to the people of that portion of Alabama. Yes, sir, if the facts are ever fully reported to the country, I have no doubt it will be found that Alabama has borne more than her due portion of censure on this subject.

I trust, however, sir, that in future discussions on our Indian affairs, there will be less of this random assertion of general fraud; that gentlemen will withhold their further denunciation until they shall see the report of the commissioners on this subject; and I hope that this report will be received before the close of this session. I also hope that, when that report is received, it will be found that public rumor has magnified the extent, if it has not the heinous character, of these frauds; and that the Indian war grew out of causes of a more general character, out of the Seminole war which was then raging, and the reports of which were daily reaching the Creeks; for it is a fact well known, that the Creek war commenced at that very point in the nation from which the Seminoles mostly sprung; at a point the most contiguous to the Seminoles, and among that portion of the Creeks most nearly allied to, and having the most sympathy with, the Seminoles.

Be these suggestions, however, as they may, Mr. Speaker, as no member has taken a more decided course than myself in urging the investigations, which are going on, into these frauds, so no member will be more gratified at the disclosures they may produce. If of innocence, they will remove unjust suspicion and censure; if of guilt, they will give a just direction to public detestation and scorn. In these sentiments I know that I am sustained by more than nineteen-twentieths of the people most contiguous to the scene of these alleged frauds; and if there is a stronger or deeper detestation of these frauds and their authors in one part of the country than in another, it is in the immediate vicinity where they have been perpetrated.

Under these convictions, Mr. L. concluded by saying that he had felt himself authorized to reprobate the loose and indiscriminate manner in which frauds had been imputed to the people in that section of Alabama. As the representative of that people, he had gone as far as any gentleman on this floor in the investigation of these frauds. He was just carrying out the will of those he represented; and had he pursued a different course, upon a point so immediately involving the honor of his constituents, their indignant reprobation would, as it ought, instantly put him down.

Mr. GRENELL said he had not intended to address the House on this bill. He knew it would pass. But, since the rejection of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Williams,) he had, on reflection, deemed it to be his duty to vote against the bill, and for reasons which he would briefly state. It provides for the removal of several tribes of Indians to the distant West; and, in order to prevent great public evil, the amendment proposed that no Indian should hereafter be removed from the east to the west side of the Mississippi by contract. If (said Mr. G.) this provision had been adopted, forbidding the removal of bands by bargains with individuals for a stipulated sum per head, and it were made the duty of the Executive to effect it by officers of the Government, whose gains should neither be increased nor diminished by the service, or the manner of its performance, the bill would be less objectionable.

This bill (said Mr. G.) does not specify the manner nor the terms on which this great operation is to be performed. But we know what has been the course of the Government in the recent removal of large bands of the Creek nation, and a different process and different terms are not to be expected, unless prescribed by Congress. The present appropriation had been based upon estimates from the Department, for the removal of Indians and subsistence on their passage, by contract, at the price of $25.50 per head. Such had been, and was still to be, the system of removal. He desired a change of that system. In this great process of Indian emigration, the peace and honor of the nation were involved. The tribes named in the bill, he knew, were to go from their ancient inheritance, the homes and graves of their forefathers. This was settled. A large portion of the Creeks had already been transferred to their western abode, and the remnant of that tribe were soon to follow. Of the emigrated party, some had been in arms against us. Those remaining are in alliance with us, and, in conjunction with our army, are hunting a handful of Seminoles through the hammocks and everglades of East Florida—about 5,000 in number; this band of Creeks is to be removed under the provisions of this bill, in the manner their brethren have been. Mr. G. said he did not claim that a distinction should be made between one tribe and another, or one portion of a tribe and another. Nor was it with any reference to the previous conduct or relations of the tribes towards our citizens, that he urged a change in the system of Indian removals. He insisted that these should be effected in a manner just and merciful; and the Government was bound to do this by every principle which should characterize a civilized and Christian people.

The mode of removal by contract, if liable to abuse, is unworthy of a people of our character and resources, and should never be adopted from any notion of economy; and that it is so liable, must be obvious from the very nature of the system. You bargain with individuals to transport and subsist, on the long passage, bands of savages, for a specified sum per head for each member of a family or tribe. And what is to be expected of the contractor? What are his temptations? The more cheaply he can support them, and the shorter the journey, the greater will be his profits. Is it not to be feared, then, that these contractors will hasten the passage, and limit its expenses, to the wrong and suffering of the Indians, men, women, and children, committed to their charge? It is their removal which the Government demands; that accomplished, it takes no further thought for them; they will be given over to the tender mercies of the contractors. These consequences are to be apprehended from the character of the present scheme of Indian removals.

But (said Mr. G.) we have information on this topic, and are not left to conjectures, to vague apprehensions, nor to any deductions drawn from the love of gain so common among men. We have such information as should at least put us on our guard, and admonish us against a plan of Indian emigration so liable to abuse, so fruitful of evil. He referred to an account given in a letter published in an Arkansas paper, which was read yesterday, of the condition of an emigrating party of Creeks on their way to their allotted territory in the West. It had very properly been brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Everett.) None could hear, without emotion, its shocking details of the helpless and hopeless sufferings of those Indians. Their journey was in a cold and inclement season. Multitudes, it is said, were destitute of comfortable clothing, barefooted, and in rags; numbers pining with sickness, or dying on the road, while the sad procession, men, women, and children, were hurried forward by their contractor masters with unfeeling severity and speed.

Now, sir, these things come to us from the very scene of the transaction. There is no apparent motive to falsify in the story. False statements would easily be detected. Our own citizens give us the heart-chilling narrative, and it stands uncontradicted; and I am led to believe not half the tale of wrong and suffering has been told; for Indians have poor means to make known their griefs. They have no newspaper press to proclaim them to the world, and few friends fearless enough to speak for them to the Government and the country. Otherwise, we might hear of them still sadder tales of woe. If the Government can suffer them no longer to remain within the limits of the States, it is bound to remove them in the most humane manner, and to provide guards against all abuse of the removing power. There should be left no temptation to the removing agents to withhold proper supplies, or to hasten the progress of the bands, regardless of comforts, health, and life. And here was the place to secure to them the last offices of mercy and justice, in their reluctant departure from their ancient homes. On Congress, not the Executive, should devolve this protecting power. I have suggested the course fittest, in my judgment, to be pursued. Responsible officers, civil or military, should have the charge of this difficult and delicate operation; and we may have good assurance of their fidelity. Emigrating Indians who have complained of the severity of contractors, have spoken well of officers of the army, disinterested as they were in the results of the measures of removal. It might cost the Government more to remove by its own officers than by the intervention of contractors; and I think it ought to cost more than had been paid to the latter. The expense is quite a minor affair. It is impossible, under such contracts, to avoid imposition. The best men cannot always be found to perform this service; and those who are determined to make a profitable job, at any sacrifice to the emigrating savage, would offer to contract for less than the just and humane man. This is the common course of things, attested by all observation and experience; and hence the necessity of a change, on the ground of humanity.

But there are, in this matter, considerations of public policy that cannot be disregarded. We are removing the tribes from the east, to a country far west of the Mississippi, and we place them in one great community of savages. Some go by direct coercion, and some in fetters; and perhaps this severity cannot be avoided, if the policy of the Government is to be carried out. They will be a fierce and powerful race. Their removal, then, should be effected in a manner to leave in their mind and memory as few causes of irritation as possible. They will not discriminate between the injuries inflicted by acts of the Government, and those proceeding from an abuse of power, in the hands of its agents, but will lay up the wrongs endured from either. And who that considers the instinct of savage passion can doubt that, on the slightest occasion, the treasured resentment for a thousand wrongs will burst forth in war and massacre upon our defenceless settlements?

It has been urged in the course of the debate on this bill, that the Creeks, by making war on our citizens, had forfeited all benefits secured to them under the treaty. Sir, we are now discussing the claims of humanity, of enlightened policy in reference to Indian tribes. These always hold good, with or without treaties. This Creek treaty secured reservations of land to ninety principal chiefs, and each head of a Creek family—valuable provisions to them, as was supposed. But it would seem that these benefits, to a great extent, have been wrested from them, through every variety of fraud and circumvention, by white men, citizens of the United States. War ensued. It has been denied that these frauds produced it; yet, their existence was once questioned. But the dreadful hostility is to be traced to these wrongs, as its primary and principal cause. Such is now the general admission. And its true, it was marked with all the atrocities incident to a savage conflict—plunder, burning, and carnage. In view of these facts, gentlemen have asked, if all our feelings of compassion are reserved for the suffering Indians! and if we have none for suffering whites? As if a just concern for a tribe of Indians, men, women, and children, in their final passage to their new domain, was incompatible with a kind, protective sympathy and care for those unfortunate families of our citizens who have fled or fallen before the tomahawk and knife of the savage.

Sir, this Creek nation are subdued, have submitted; they are at our mercy, and I frankly and strenuously maintain that, notwithstanding their recent hostility and outrage, this Government owes it to its own character and to the soundest policy, to remove them to their Western territory in a peaceful and humane manner, and not in a spirit of vengeance. Sympathy for the sufferers by Indian warfare! Who does not feel it? For myself, I aver that every page in the early history of my native State, and especially of that part of it from which I come, has taught me lessons of sorrow and sympathy for the victims of savage hostility, that can never be effaced from my heart. But I cannot suffer such emotions to mislead my judgment on a grave question of legislation between us and these tribes. Nor would I deal with them as we might justly do with a civilized nation which, in contempt of treaties, had made war upon us. This Creek war on their part was without justifiable cause. But I ask, did this Government, or any department of it, take care that the nation should have the full benefit of the reservations of land secured by the treaty? Is this Government wholly clear in this matter? Did we have the true spirit and design of the treaty, fulfil it on our part? Was our conduct towards them in this matter perfectly guardian and paternal? And shall we take advantage of their infraction of the treaty for such cause and under such wrong, and make it the ground and occasion, not only of denying to them all its provisions, but of a violent and forcible removal, or expulsion at the point of the bayonet? True, their cause should have been laid before this Government, and the Executive would, or should, have taken instant measures to redress them, to do them justice, and to detect and expose the men, high or low, who had defrauded them. We are, however, to consider that the Indians know nothing of the science of diplomacy. They mistake their remedies. They have no agent, of their race, near this Government, to make known their grievances, to remonstrate against oppression, injustice, and outrage, committed by its citizens; no press to speak for them to the world. Goaded, disappointed, and defrauded in a matter of property, they know not how to claim right and justice of the distant Government, nor to institute the slow process of negotiation; but they think only of revenge. Nor are they careful to seek out the individual perpetrators of the wrong, but, with sudden fury, fall upon the race to which their oppressors belong, and indiscriminate vengeance is the consequence.

On account of the war, then, so waged by these untaught savages—children of Nature—gentlemen are to regard all the privileges solemnly guaranteed to them by treaty as forfeited; and not only so, it seems to be thought good enough for them to be dragged to the West in any way a body of contractors may think most easy and profitable. Certainly the subject has been discussed as if the removal was, and ought to be, a war operation. And if severity and suffering ensued, it was no more than the Indians deserved for their barbarities. The crime and cruelties of a few warriors are to forfeit the kindly regards of our nation for the feeble, the helpless, and innocent beings of the tribe. No, sir, suffering and helplessness and innocence here give no occasion for sympathy! I cannot entertain these views or feelings, but I have a deep conviction that we owe it to public peace and policy, to ourselves as an enlightened, powerful, and Christian nation, transacting with feeble, ignorant, and degraded tribes of men, to exercise mercy in this last act of putting them away from us for ever.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

In the House of Representatives, January 9, 1837.—Mr. ADAMS having presented a petition for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia, and the question being "Shall this memorial be received?"

Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, said that he had just voted against receiving a petition presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) but he had been overruled by a large majority of the House. The petition was received and laid on the table, there to sleep the sleep of death. No sooner is this done, than the same gentleman offers another petition of the same character, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, coming from a portion of the people of Massachusetts represented by him. I have been (said Mr. U.) a silent witness of the proceedings had at the present and preceding sessions of Congress on this exciting subject; but I now rise to assign a few reasons for the vote I have just given, and for the vote which I shall again give against the reception of the petition now presented.

Slavery in the United States exhibits two distinct aspects. The one is national, the other local. It is national, so far as the Constitution of the United States makes it the basis of representation and taxation, by requiring three-fifths of the slaves to be added to the whole number of free persons. It is also national, so far as the constitutional provision requires those slaves who escape and flee to the non-slaveholding States to be delivered up; and so far as the legislation of Congress, in pursuance of this or any other article of the Constitution, operates upon the subject. It is local, so far as the legislation of the States controls the subject. The constitutions and laws of the States which tolerate slavery, and prescribe the treatment of the slave, defining the relations he bears to the State as a person, and those between him and a master as property, are local. Congress has no jurisdiction over these local regulations, and can no where alter or abrogate them, unless he be in this District. The laws of Virginia and Maryland, which have instituted slavery in this District, and which now uphold it, are local, and not national. Their effect is confined to the Ten Miles square, and they operate upon the people within the District exclusively.

Now, sir, I desire to know what right (for I shall consider the question as one of right,) the people of Massachusetts have to petition us to repeal or modify the local regulations and laws which do not operate upon them, or within their territory, but which govern a different people, who do not complain, and who may be entirely satisfied, and wholly opposed to any change. We are told that we must receive and act upon this and all similar petitions, lest we subvert the sacred right of petition. I deny that there is any right of petition, where the grievance complained of does not operate upon the petitioners. I admit that you may receive any petition through courtesy, without regard to its object, or the quarter whence it comes; and in the general it would be best to do so. But the attempt is made to force these abolition petitions upon the consideration of Congress as a matter of right; and it is against that attempt, upon such a pretext, I protest. Sir, these petitioners, as I conceive, are officiously intermeddling with the affairs of other people, when they had better mind their own business.

If the people of Massachusetts are dissatisfied, and feel aggrieved by the existence of slavery in any one of its national aspects, they have a right to petition for redress, and we are bound, whenever petitions come before us, as of right, to hear their complaints, and to decide upon them. The right of the citizen to petition is moral and political, and imposes a corresponding obligation on those to whom the petition is addressed, to hear and decide. These rights, however, are not of that class denominated perfect or legal, because they cannot be judicially enforced. If any portion of the people of Massachusetts were to petition us to modify or change the laws prescribing the mode for reclaiming fugitive slaves, or pray us to recommend to the States an alteration of the Constitution, so as to place representation and taxation upon the basis of free white population exclusively, I should feel it to be a duty to receive and consider such petitions, because they relate to national topics—to matters affecting and operating upon the people of Massachusetts, growing out of the existence of slavery. But when the people of Massachusetts, or of any other State, begin to pry into the local regulations of another people, and to complain of them, I feel no obligation of duty to listen.

I will illustrate the distinction I have endeavored to present by putting a few cases. Suppose the inhabitants of Europe, or any portion of them, were to petition us to repeal our tariff laws and to raise revenue by a direct tax on land only, would we be bound to receive and act upon such petition? Certainly not. Why? Because our system of taxation, whatever it may be in reference to foreign nations, is local, and their people have no right to interfere. The operations of this Government with foreign States is such that our laws may often affect the interests of foreigners; and, if they should affect those interests injuriously, and in violation of the laws of nations, foreigners thus injured might rightfully petition us for redress; because the welfare of mankind requires obedience to the principles of international law, and by the tacit consent of all civilized nations these principles have been adopted in such manner as to make them one people in respect to the code of nations; and hence a foreigner who suffers from a violation of these principles, has the same right to petition for redress that a citizen would have. But this would give the foreigner no right to petition on a subject touching our domestic regulations, and, if he did so petition, it would be optional with us to receive or reject; and if we did the last, he could not complain that his rights were contemned.

Suppose the petitioners who now come before us had addressed their petition to the Legislature of Kentucky, praying for the abolition of slavery in that State; would the Legislature of Kentucky be bound to receive and act upon it? Certainly not. Why? Because slavery in Kentucky is a local domestic regulation, in reference to the people of Massachusetts. Kentuckians possess just the same right, by petition, to call on the Legislature of Massachusetts to change her laws in regard to apprentices, paupers, or infants, as the Yankee (and I use the term in no offensive sense) has to call on Kentucky to abolish slavery. If Kentuckians were to, forward such a petition in the most respectful terms, if it was received and read, after its contents had been briefly stated by the mover, it would be an act of courtesy, and not of suit right. If year after year petitions of the same kind were forwarded, and that, too, after the first had been considered and disposed of, the Legislature to whom they were addressed might justly say to the petitioners, "You have evinced an unbecoming impotency, an over anxiety to interfere in our domestic and local affairs, and however praiseworthy your motives, as it is not a matter of right on your part, we will no longer submit to annoyance. We reject your petition without hearing it read, the mover having briefly stated its contents."

Of the soundness of the foregoing principles I think it will be difficult to create a doubt; and I presume, if my remarks are met in debate, an attempt will be made to show that slavery in this District is not a local, but a national matter; and hence concerns every portion of the American people. I admit, if it be not local, but national, then the petition offered should not only be received, but it ought to be referred, and duly considered. How is slavery in this District converted into a national, instead of a local question? Is it because the Congress of the United States, being a national body, may legislate concerning it? The nationality of the body does not prove that its legislation in its operation and consequences must be national and general. It is a proposition too clear to admit of dispute, that all our Legislatures, both State and national, pass hundreds and thousands of acts, local and private, which do not affect the whole State or nation. It is preposterous to assert that, because Congress is a national body, it can in no case legislate for local or private purposes. In the general its local and private legislation is in furtherance of some of the constitutional powers vested for general national purposes; and whenever that is the case, I admit that the principle which governs such legislation is of national concern, and that all or any of our constituents have a right to be heard on this floor in relation to the principle, by petition, memorial, or remonstrance. Thus, an act allowing a pension to A. B., although private, may involve a principle of national importance. The legislation of Congress over the District of Columbia, so far as the rights of property of the citizens are concerned, is a very different thing, and no way analogous in principle to the passage of a private pension law. The legislation for this District with a view to protect the citizen, unconnected with the Government, in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, does not possess a single national aspect. It is exclusively local, and confined to the Ten Miles square, and has no operation whatever upon the people of Massachusetts, unless they should happen to be visitors here. Congress, by the Constitution, has the exclusive right to legislate for this District, and it may be said that such a power would never have been conferred but for a national purpose. Concede it, and nothing is gained from the concession against my argument. All that the Constitution intended by the grant of exclusive legislative power to Congress over the District, was to place the members of Congress, the Executive head of the Government, and all its officers, necessarily congregated at one point, beyond the control and influence of State laws, which in many cases might have been made harassing and oppressive; so much so as to prevent their strict attention to official duty. To escape the danger which might have resulted from State legislation over the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the General Government, the Constitution conferred the power of exclusive legislation over the District on Congress. So far as the power is exercised for the benefit of the officers of the Government, and to enable them to proceed with the discharge of their duties free from extraneous and deleterious influences, it may be national. But when it is exercised for the protection of the property, or for the purpose of declaring what shall or shall not be property in the District, it is strictly local, and not general or national; and the laws which emanate from its exercise, for the benefit of the people of the District, are as unconnected with the people of the States, as are the laws of the several States with the people of any other State.

The fact that the people of Massachusetts may come here occasionally as visitors, gives them no right to petition Congress for a change in the local laws passed for the benefit of the people of the District. If that fact is made the basis of their right to petition, it would equally authorize them to petition the Legislatures of every State tolerating slavery, for its abolition; for they have a right to visit in all the States, and are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens" in the State to which they go.

I will put another case illustrative of my idea. It will show that the people of the same State, in many cases, have no right to petition their State Legislatures concerning public matters in their own States. A township or incorporated city imposes taxes, or makes regulations for the government of the people within the township or city. The inhabitants of a distant township hear of the proceedings, their philanthropy is excited, they perceive, or fancy they do, great oppression, and memorialize the Legislature to put an end to prevailing abuses in the township or city about which they have heard much, but within whose borders they never were in the whole course of their lives. How ought the Legislature to treat such a petition, especially when the people of the township or city subject to the oppressive laws made no complaint? The proper response, in my opinion, would be to say to the petitioners, "You are conceited, you have a high opinion of yourselves and a mean opinion of your neighbors, and you presume to judge of laws and regulations of which you have no experience, more correctly than those who feel their operation. We are not disposed to encourage your vanity. We reject your petition without reading it, being briefly informed of its contents."

In my constituents were to send me a petition in favor of abolishing slavery in this District, and request me to present it to this House, as an act of courtesy to them. I should offer it; but as an act of duty to the people of this District, whose representative I am, being constituted such by the Constitution, I would vote against its reception. I am a representative on this floor having a three-fold duty to perform: first, I am to legislate for the whole nation, and to watch over the general interests of the whole people; secondly, I am to keep an eye upon the local interests of my particular State and district; and thirdly, I am to attend to the local interests of the people of this District. I mean to make all these duties harmonize. If any of my immediate constituents should ever so far forget themselves as, by petition or otherwise, to instruct me to change the laws and usages of the people of this District, I mean to tell them, that although I am indebted to their kindness and partiality for my election, when elected, I feel myself bound to legislate for the people of this District upon my own observation of their situation, and my knowledge of their wants, as derived from my conversations and association with them. I look upon that as my duty under the Constitution, and I will never consent to be made the instrument by one portion of my constituents to subvert the rights of another portion. To my mind there is something absurd in the idea of any set of men or women undertaking to interfere with the local laws of a separate people five hundred or a thousand miles off.

But, then, the motives of the petitioners in this case are so pure, it is a pity not to hear them in the cause of religion and freedom! The Saviour of man did not propagate his religion by petitioning legislative assemblies; and the lesson in favor of freedom, which the abolitionist teaches, is to break up the long-established practices and laws of one people, not at their instance, or by their consent, but at the absolute will of a distant people, no way affected by the laws which are to be subverted! Why, sir, if this game is to be successfully played, there is no telling where it will stop; and the next thing we may hear of will be a petition from New England to establish the blue law code in this District, and render it unlawful for a man to kiss his wife on Sunday! I beg the New England gentlemen and ladies to desist, or to tell us how far their consciences will require them to go, in petitioning Congress to reform the sins of this District.

I have endeavored to present the grounds of my vote. If you receive the petition, if you are bound to receive it, then, sir, you should refer it and act upon it. My word for it, as long as the decision of this House, just given, stands as the judgment of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) will convict you of the grossest inconsistency, in refusing to refer petitions of this sort to the appropriate committee. We say to the petitioners, "you come before us as matter of right, but from motives of policy we will make no response." Sir, such a course is a mockery of their rights, if they have them. I have endeavored to show that the people of Massachusetts have no right to petition on the subject; and there never will be an end of this exciting question, until Congress sustains my views.

Mr. REED of Massachusetts said he differed entirely in opinion with the gentleman who has last spoken, (Mr. Underwood,) and as he had the charge of a number of memorials of similar character to the one now under consideration, he begged leave to say a few words upon the subject.

Let it be remembered that these memorials, so obnoxious to some members of this House, pray for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. They go no further. The gentleman from Kentucky, who has just sat down, has given a labored argument to prove that the people of Massachusetts, and of course the people of any other State in the Union, have no right to petition Congress to repeal or modify the laws in relation to slavery in this District. "He denies the right of petition when the grievance complained of does not operate upon the petitioners." He denies that the right, secured by the Constitution, peaceably to assemble and petition Government for a redress of grievances, applies to the present case, because the evil complained of, if any evil exist, is only a national evil, and is no personal grievance to the petitioners.

I cannot for a moment assent to the positions of the gentleman. To my mind they are subversive of the right of petition, and of the rights of a free people. I highly respect the gentleman and his opinions, and am quite sure he views the subject in a very different light.

In my opinion, the right of the citizens of a free and representative Government to petition their representatives for a redress of grievances, is a perfect right. It exists independent of the Constitution. It must exist where the people are free, and where it does not exist there is despotism. I am aware, that, from abundant caution, this sacred right of petition is secured by the Constitution. The right so secured is not limited or enlarged by the security. It is a perfect right, which we must never permit to be impaired by ingenious arguments, to avoid the consideration of an unpleasant subject. "I would be doing evil that good might come." The right is the same, whether the evil complained of be national and remote, or direct and personal.

By the Constitution of the United States, Congress exercise exclusive jurisdiction, in all cases whatsoever, over the Ten Miles square, and that territory is the District of Columbia. Can language be more explicit? The jurisdiction of Congress over this District is exclusive, and extends to all cases whatsoever.

Congress have the sole government of the District. The House of Representatives are a part of Congress, and are the representatives of the people of the United States. Will it be denied that the people whom they represent have a right to petition them for redress of any grievance over which they have jurisdiction? Suppose it were admitted that slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia was a national evil, but that the evil was remote in its effects upon distant parts of the country, could it be said that it was no evil or no grievance because not aggravated and direct? Is not each portion of the country a part of the nation? Can any part suffer, and the remaining part not be aggrieved? The part of the Constitution which gives exclusive jurisdiction over this District to Congress, was not a mere form or accidental; it intended that it should be governed solely by the nation and the representatives of the nation, and the people, whose representatives we are, all have a direct interest in its government, its honor, and its prosperity. If, therefore, in the opinion of any portion of the people of any part of the country, the laws of this District are bad, they are aggrieved. It is a national and personal evil, and they have a right to petition for redress.

The gentleman asks if the inhabitants of Europe, or any part of them, should petition us to repeal our tariff, should we be bound to receive and act upon such petition? And, again, should the petitioners address a petition to the Legislature of Kentucky, praying for the abolition of slavery, would Kentucky be bound to receive any act upon it? I perfectly agree with the gentleman, that if the inhabitants of Europe or Massachusetts should so far forget themselves as to offer such petitions, neither this House nor the Legislature of Kentucky would be under any obligation to notice them. For one plain reason: we have no jurisdiction over the people of Europe; nor has Kentucky any jurisdiction, so far as their State Government extends, over Massachusetts. Of course the petitioners could have no grievances for which they could claim redress, and have no right to interfere with the grievances of others. Not so with the District of Columbia: it is exclusively governed by Congress; it is a part of the nation, and if illy governed it is a national and individual grievance, and those who feel it have a right to present to us a petition for redress.

I consider the question one of vast importance, as vitally affecting the liberties of the people and the sacred rights of citizens. I regret that great principles must be settled under some excitement, and under an apprehension that no relief could be afforded if the petition was received. I can but think the true construction of the Constitution is so plain, and the right of every citizen to petition so clear, that nothing further is necessary but barely to state the principles upon which they are founded; and I forbear to say more upon the subject.

I have been gratified by a vote of this House this day, allowing a petition like the one now before us to be received. I trust we shall not reverse that decision. I do hope, regarding, as I most sincerely and anxiously do, the harmony, peace, and welfare of the United States, North and South, and West, that these memorials will not be thrown in the faces of the memorialists, nor thrown under the table, nor nailed to the table. I hope they may be received, and not rejected by force, and violence, and insult; and when received, that they may be committed to a committee of this House. If the petitioners are in error, let the error be shown by a plain and dispassionate report, and by an argument which they cannot refute or gainsay. Persecution and violence will never put down a good cause, or even a bad one. I hold the people have a right to petition, and that there is a corresponding obligation on our part to receive them, to refer them, and to decide in favor or against them, according to our sound discretion and best judgment.

Petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia are not of modern origin. They have been presented annually for many years past; and until last year they have been presented and referred and treated precisely like other petitions, and have produced very little excitement in this House, or elsewhere. I hope we shall return to our former usage, and avoid all unnecessary excitement upon this important and vexing subject.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Senate, Thursday, February 9, 1837.—On the bill to limit the sales of public lands to actual settlers.

Mr. DAVIS said, in substance, that he had, unfortunately for himself, been detained from the Senate most of the time while this measure had been undergoing discussion, and had lost the benefit of the remarks of gentlemen who were well acquainted with the subject; but as it was a measure of great public importance involving great interests and a vast amount of property, he had felt anxious to express his sentiments in regard to it. He hoped he might at this late period be indulged in adverting to some of the leading objections (for he should attempt no more) which had pressed themselves upon his mind.

The public domain, said he, is almost boundless in extent, and its value can scarcely be estimated. It is at least several hundred millions of dollars—a treasure greater than was ever possessed by any nation as public property. I consider it as common property, belonging to the people of the United States, and to the whole people. All have a deep interest in it, and have a right to know what disposition is made of it. If it were money, the public would be watchfully alive to the preservation and appropriation of it to the common good; but it is not of the less value, nor is it the less useful, because it consists in what may be converted into money.

The opinion was put forth a few years ago that the new States alone had a right to the land within them, and as fast as new States were admitted into the Union the right of the United States to such lands was extinguished. We now hear almost daily on this floor pretensions set up of large rights in such States. Members here talk of our lands, and claim, in one form and another, exclusive privileges and advantages for their own constituents. The Senator from Arkansas asserts that any and all persons have an unquestioned right to occupy the public lands. The man who squats, as the phrase is, or seizes the public lands without color of right, and against the laws of the United States, is not only contemned, but no language of enormity is sufficiently adulatory to express his merits.

Sir, I repeat, the public lands are public and common property, belonging to the whole people, and the whole people have a right to the benefit of them; and my principal motive in rising is to protest against partial and unjust legislation; to deny the right of the Senate to bestow them upon a class of favored individuals.

It is well known that the original boundary of the United States on the West was the Mississippi river. The country lying east of it, and between the Atlantic and the British provinces, was achieved by the common treasure, sacrifices, and blood of the revolutionary war. This is the region declared by the treaty of '83 to be free, sovereign, and independent. This was the great work of the old thirteen—the noble achievement of three millions of colonists, without funds, and almost withoutarms and annihilation, against the colossal Power of Great Britain. It was the noble daring of lofty spirit; and will go down to all ages as a marked proof that a people resolved to be free cannot be subdued.

Of this territory, all west of the Alleghenies and north of the Ohio river was, with the exception of some military posts, then a vast wilderness. Indeed, the whole valley of the Mississippi was substantially so. Each State claimed limits co-extensive with the charter granted to it as a colony by the Crown of Great Britain. When these charters were granted, the geography of the country was very imperfectly understood, and the grants, for the want of accurate boundaries, interfered with each other, covering often the same territory. This gave rise to conflicting claims in all parts of the country, some of which are not adjusted to this time. The charter of Massachusetts, for example, stretched across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, and so of some other States. Virginia claimed to the lakes. In 1783 all these conflicting claims were adjusted by deeds of cession from several States to all the States of this wild territory north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, for the benefit, as the deeds express it, of the States, and it was to be held and enjoyed for the benefit of the States, the United States not being named as such. This is the manner in which it became common property, in which each State was thus interested, and it was pledged for the redemption of the public debt. While the deeds of cession thus make it the property of the States by language which admits of no evasion or misconception, they also provide for the division of it into States, and their admission into the Union when the territory should be inhabited.

It is thus rendered entirely clear that the new States were not to be the owners of these lands, for the pledge of them to pay the public debt, and the declaration that they should be held for the common benefit, are inconsistent with such a claim.

The lands west of the Mississippi and in Florida were purchased by the United States from France and Spain, and we paid for them twenty millions of dollars out of the public Treasury. The title to this vast domain is also equally clear. In addition to this, enormous sums have been paid to extinguish the Indian title.

The title, therefore, of the United States cannot be made questionable. The public lands are common treasure, and must be dealt with as such. The United States have always so treated them, and I must be allowed to recur to the general course of policy which has been pursued to show what has been public sentiment.

A system of selling and settling them was at once, after the cession, adopted, the details of which I need not enter into, beyond what is necessary to prove that the public interest was guarded with watchful vigilance, and all attempts to give it away or to encourage intruders firmly resisted. As far back as 1795, and that the subject of pre-emption rights was brought before Congress, and the Committee on Public Lands reported that, inasmuch as illegal settlements on the lands of the United States ought not to be encouraged; and, as yielding to the said claims (for pre-emption) would interfere with the general provisions for the sale of said lands, in their opinion, the prayer of the said petitions ought not to be granted; that is, the petitions of persons asking for pre-emption rights, because they had entered without authority upon the public lands.

In 1801, the Committee on Public Lands reported—
“That certain petitioners represented that with much labor and difficulty, they had settled upon, cultivated, and improved certain lands, the property of the United States, between the waters of the Scioto and Muskingum rivers, and had thereby not only enhanced the value of the lands upon which they had respectively settled, but of other lands in the vicinity of the same, to the great benefit of the United States, and prayed for a pre-emption right to those lands at two dollars the acre,” (then the minimum price of public lands.)

Your committee are of opinion that, as there are many others in the situation of the petitioners, if the indulgence prayed for be granted, it ought to be general; but, whatever may be the hardships sustained by the petitioners, and however great our disposition to relieve them therefrom, believing, as the committee do, that granting the indulgence prayed for would operate as an encouragement to intrusions on the public lands, and would be an unjustifiable sacrifice of the public interest, report, as their opinion, that the prayer of the petitions ought not to be granted.”

In 1806, I find another report on pre-emption rights, which concludes thus:

“An indulgence in the present instance would encourage abuses in future, and might eventually lead to an entire abandonment of the existing land system, in exchange for one wholly incompatible with the idea of deriving revenue from the sale of public lands, and, by encouraging migration beyond its natural and necessary progress, create an interest hostile to the general welfare of the Union. It might be observed, further, that, by an extension of this right to the claimants, we enable individuals to select and engross the most eligible spots, in points of situation and soil, and thereby destroy all competition in the public sales.”

How prophetic these remarks were, will be seen in the sequel. In 1812, the committee, in regard to pre-emption rights, hold the following language:

“The committee are of opinion that promiscuous and unauthorized settlements on the public lands are, in many respects, injurious to the public interests; good policy forbids that any encouragement should be given to such intrusions. It was prohibited by the Congress under the Confederation, and has been made penal by an act under the present form of government. Congress cannot, in the opinion of the committee, grant the prayer of the petitioners in its full extent, without destroying the effect intended to be produced by the law prohibiting intrusions on the public lands. To legalize a direct violation of the law must, by obvious consequence, encourage future violations.”

This law is now in force, and this report was made by Mr. Morrow, of Ohio, a gentleman well acquainted with the public land and the interests of the United States. By a departure from the wise policy, all the pernicious consequences which he so distinctly pointed out have been realized.

In 1824, the Committee on Public Lands again reported as follows, in regard to pre-emption rights:

“The committee are of opinion that an extension of these principles would be injurious to the Government as well as to those who may hereafter become the purchasers of public lands, and probably to those who may venture to settle upon Government land without authority hereafter.

“It cannot be perceived by what principle persons having no color of title, should, after lands on which they have settled were known to belong to the United States at the time of making such settlement, claim the pre-emption right to such lands.

“Should the Government sanction applications of this nature, an inducement would be offered to persons of an enterprising disposition to anticipate, in every quarter, the Government in its sales of the public lands, and to settle upon and improve the most valuable tracts of land, which they would claim at the minimum price, whenever such lands were brought into the market by the authority of the United States.

“Purchasers of lands, finding themselves prevented from acquiring good lands, would abstain from purchases, and resort to illegal settlements, in the hope of obtaining that at the minimum price, which they could not obtain at fair and open sale.

“Thus, a competition would be excited among a certain description of our population to locate themselves upon the public lands, without regard to lines or boundaries, and with very little respect for the rights either of the Government or their Indian neighbors.

“A system of indulgence to those who trespass, by making unauthorized settlements upon the public lands, after those lands are known to belong to the United States, would, in the opinion of the committee, be productive of much perplexity to the Government, as well as of injury to those concerned in the purchase and settlement of the public domain.”

Without troubling the Senate further by reference to the doings of Congress, I may here remark that this was the whole doctrine which guided and regulated action here in regard to the public lands until 1830. A deaf ear was invariably turned upon all entreaties to grant what are denominated pre-emption rights. None stood more firmly against them than the members from the new States. The injurious consequences were foreseen, and our predecessors comprehended how difficult it would be to retrieve a false step. In 1820, the minimum price of public lands was reduced from two dollars to a dollar and a quarter an acre, and all credit abolished, which system is now in operation.

In 1830, the first pre-emption law, which extended to the public lands generally, was passed, under pretence of quieting the possessions of a few poor people who had established homes upon the public land, and asked for a few acres, at the minimum price, which they had cultivated about their houses. The argument addressed to the humanity of Congress prevailed. The speculators, in the guise of poor men, seduced Congress. It seemed just in itself; and we will now see what have been the results of that law, and learn something from experience. If the public documents speak the truth, it has been the means of awakening cupidity, and has served to disguise and cover up the most disgusting frauds, perjuries, and peculations. This law, in its terms, provided for retrospective cases only, for cases where settlements and cultivation had been actually made, and was designed to secure to the poor man his home, not to invite new settlers, or to enlarge the domains of the rich. A pre-emption law, as it is styled, gives to the occupant the exclusive right to enter for himself, to become the purchaser of a given quantity of land, on which he has made his improvements, be its quality or value what it may, at a dollar and a quarter the acre, which is the lowest price at which public land is sold. The least quantity which the United States, in their singular liberality, proposed to let a pre-emptor have was 160 acres, one quarter of a section—the public lands being surveyed into sections, or squares of 640 acres each.

This act of 1830, it was supposed, would apply only to the relief of a few cases of poor people, who had penetrated the public land, and commenced the process of clearing farms. But, sir, Mr. Brown, the late Commissioner of the Land Office, was required to state, at the last session of Congress, how much revenue had been derived from the public Treasury by this act. His answer was, that he had no certain data by which to estimate it, but he added:

“Considering the many tens of thousands of claims that have arisen under it, and the prevailing desire, in the meanwhile, to invest money in public land, the conclusion seems fair that the selected spots would have been sold for a price proportioned to their excellence, if no such law, nor any improper conspiracy, had existed. The estimate of three millions of dollars, which I had the honor to submit to you on the 25th of January last, appears to me now to undervalue, much rather than to magnify, the difference between the receipts for pre-emption concessions and the sum the same lands would have brought into the Treasury.”

Under this law, where two persons had made improvements on the same quarter-section of land, it was decided, as they could not both have it, that one should have what is familiarly called a float, that is, a right to enter his quantity upon any of the surveyed and unsold public lands; thus giving to him a vast range, and an opportunity to select the most valuable spot.

The Commissioner, in speaking of the manner in which these floats were obtained, says:

“The virtuous and patriotic citizens of Louisiana have been disgusted and alarmed by the extent to which fraud and perjury is asserted to have been carried on in the manufacture of such claims within that interesting State, threatening to cover a large portion of the most valuable lands that have been surveyed.”

“The law, as its title imports, is in favor of settlers. But pretensions have been set up by persons dwelling in town with their families, and there following mercantile pursuits, while they caused a little show of improvement, that scarce deserved the name, to be made for them by others; no proof being produced of their personal superintendence or direction on the spot. Cultivation by slaves or hirelings in 1833, and one or the other, or a growing crop on the place on the following 19th of June, have been assumed as fulfilling the required conditions.”

“Among the pretences to cultivation, there have been disclosures as follows, viz: where the cutting and burning a small patch of cane; where an enclosure, not entitled to be called a fence, around a space only large enough for a small garden, and the planting a few culinary vegetables; and where scattering an undefined quantity of turnip seeds or grass seeds, and, in one case, planting a few turnips or onions, have been claimed as cultivation to meet this condition.” Again:

“If the propriety were conceded of making the pre-emption policy a part of our land system, there would be still no evident fitness in extending the concession to a full quarter-section of land. An allowance of half that quantity of the very best land is surely munificent; and, if presumed poverty be one of the considerations for the grant, it may be observed that many a good farm in the West contains no more than an eighth of a section.” Again:

“The temptation to abuse the charity of the Legislature is so radically intermixed, and so inextricably interwoven with the operation of the pre-emption laws, that I should despair of laying before you altogether effectual means for the prevention of fraud on the part of claimants. It seems to me a hopeless task to project any modification of existing enactments that shall silence perjury, and defeat the devices of sagacious speculators, so long as their ingenuity shall be sharpened and stimulated by the prospect of immense gain attending their success.”

Such are the extraordinary and disgusting developments made by the officer who was last year at the head of the General Land Office, and whose means of intelligence cannot be questioned, and such is the effect of legislating the public domain into the hands of individuals. It offers such temptation to an easy acquisition of wealth, that it superinduces every species of fraud.

I will now ask attention to some parts of a statement made by the Attorney of the United States for the western district of Louisiana, in regard to these floats and pre-emption rights:

“I will here mention a construction of the law which was adopted by the officers at Opelousas, and most of the pre-emption floats have been admitted under that construction. Two persons living on a quarter section, or who pretend that they do, on lands not worth a cent an acre; men who can neither read nor write; men who have never seen a survey made, and know nothing about sections or quarter sections of land; and who, in point of fact, live five, ten, and, in many instances, twenty miles apart, go before a justice of the peace as ignorant as themselves, and swear to all the facts required by law to make their entry; this, too, in a section of country never surveyed by the authority of the Government, nor any competent officer thereof. Would it be believed that any officer of the Government would admit an entry under circumstances like these, upon the oaths alone of the parties interested in making them, and upon lands not surveyed, approved, and returned by higher authority? Can it be possible that an entry of that kind can either be in conformity with law, justice, or right?

“I state, of my own knowledge, that many of these pre-emption floats are precisely in the situation above detailed. I am authorized to name Colonel Robert A. Crane, of Louisiana, who states, positively, he knows many of them to be founded upon the same corrupt perjury—persons swearing that they lived on the same quarter section, when, in truth, and in fact, they never had lived so near each other as five miles. It is not believed that there are thirty honest pre-emption floats in the whole district of Louisiana; and yet, since the 1st of January, 1835, up to the 27th of May, they have passed at the land office at Opelousas at least 350. And who are the owners of these floats? Principally one, and not more than three, speculators. Since the 1st of January of this year, up to the 27th of May, day after day, week after week, I might say months after months, a notorious speculator (and who must have been known as such to the officers of the land office at Opelousas) was seen occupying that office to the almost total exclusion of every body else. No other person appeared to understand how to get pre-emption floats through, and no one did succeed until an event which will be stated below. He could be seen followed to and from the land office by crowds of free negroes, Indians, and Spaniards, and the very lowest dregs of society in the counties of Opelousas and Rapides, with their affidavits already prepared by himself, and sworn to by them before some justice of the peace in some remote part of the county. These claims, to an immense extent, are presented and allowed; and upon what evidence? Simply upon the evidence of the parties themselves who desire to make the entry? And would it be believed that the lands where these quarter sections purported to be located, from the affidavits of the applicants, had never been surveyed by the Government, nor any competent officer thereof, nor approved, nor returned surveyed? I further state that there was not even a private survey made. These facts I know. I have been in the office when the entries were made, and have examined the evidence, which was precisely what I have stated above.”

Such has been the result of the experiment of the law of 1830, made for the benefit of a few poor settlers. It has swept away more than three millions of dollars from the public chest, and introduced a system which corrupts and demoralizes the citizens to an extent surpassing belief. It comes to us fraught with all the evils prophesied of it, and has already invited hordes to seize upon the public property, including the hope that new laws of this description will be passed. Indeed they come boldly to our doors and demand them. This city is now filled with greedy claimants; not your poor and helpless individuals, who have raised a log cabin over their heads in some nook of public property, but men who enter the fashionable walks of life, and boast of their fortunes.

And yet this law of 1830 was guarded and protected by oaths, and required proofs. The settlement and the cultivation must be proved under oath, and to have occurred before 1829, to entitle the claimant to the benefit of the act. But, sir, what is cultivation? Any act upon the soil; raising a handful of vegetables of a few weeks' growth; sowing a little grass seed, which is up in a few days. What is occupancy? Feeding a horse upon the soil has been claimed as such. And such miserable frauds, aided by the perjury of hired and interested witnesses, have been employed, with the connivance of public officers, under a benevolent act, to steal the most valuable parts of the public land. Such has been our sad and appalling experience under the law of 1830.

Now, sir, what is the character of the bill on your table? A thousand fold worse than the act of 1830. It is a pre-emption, for the exclusive benefit of the States in which the public lands lie. A monopoly in their hands; an appropriation of the public lands to their use, to the exclusion of all others; a gift of this vast treasure to the citizens of those States. And can I vote for such a profligate disposition of public property? How can I meet my constituents and justify such an act? You have hardly the modesty to disguise this bill, by holding it up as a measure for the benefit of the poor; but gentlemen stand boldly forth, and contend that every man's farm should be made up to at least 1280 acres out of the public land. Ay, more, that he shall have the right to select from no less than twenty-one sections of 640 acres each, the best parts and portions to make up his complement, at a dollar and a quarter the acre. And more, you do not confine him to lands surveyed, but permit him to range in regions never yet exposed to sale, and to select the richest gifts of nature. Nor is your bill confined to retrospective action, but whoever will may go and seize the public domain. And what do you require of him? Oaths and proofs of occupancy and cultivation; such substantially as were required by the act of 1830; provisions just as easily evaded. And titles were manufactured under that act in vast numbers, by the oaths of perjured witnesses and the certificates of false magistrates. If you were robbed of three millions of dollars under that act, what may you not expect by thus opening the flood-gates to the cupidity of the greedy and avaricious?

We have, I know, heard much fulsome panegyric lavished upon the hardy pioneers, as they are styled; much of their sufferings, and much of their perils and bravery. But, sir, who invites them to these sufferings? Who asks them to seize the public land? For whose benefit is it? The laws of the United States forbid their entry upon it, they restrain by heavy penalties all intrusion, they declare all such persons to be trespassers and liable to indictment. These intruders are, therefore, disturbers of the public peace, and by interfering with the Indians they provoke hostilities, and create the very wars in which they affirm they have suffered, and then claim our compassion. It is my firm belief that if these disturbers were kept within lawful bounds, we should have no hostilities with the Indians.

But, sir, if fighting is meritorious, have we no fighting men to be provided for? Are those who achieved our independence forgotten? Do Bunker Hill, and Lexington, and Saratoga sink into forgetfulness before the exploits with Black Hawk and Ocoila? We have heard much too of the poor settler, and that there are some of this class on the public land is doubtless true. If they and they alone can be provided for by being quieted in their possessions they shall have my vote. Show me a bill for them, which will bar frauds and speculation, and it shall have my most hearty support. But what sort of a bill is this for poor men, which proposes to let each person who may choose to take up for himself or to annex to his estate 1820 acres of the most choice spots of the public land? Cannot something short of an estate equal to that of a nobleman satisfy the poor? The poor, sir, are used as the stalking horse to disguise the measure; its features are, however, too apparent to mislead any one. But if the poor are to be provided for, then I claim that all are alike entitled. I regret it, but we have many poor, too poor even to be able to make the long journey to your public land. They are meritorious, and they suffer all the privations incident to their unfortunate condition, and I claim for them a share of the public bounty if the public property is to be distributed. There is a great class of widows and orphans, aged and infirm, whose condition makes a strong appeal to your humanity. Let your bounty reach them and gladden their sorrowful hearts, instead of adding to the boundless acres of the rich planters.

We have been told that great numbers of respectable people have emigrated, and settled upon the public lands, in the expectation that a pre-emption law would pass for their benefit. The Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Hubbard) says that he knows of a great number, and that a large majority of the Territorial Council of Wisconsin are squatters. I doubt not it is true, and that they have left their poor neighbors behind them in New Hampshire. They are doubtless men of comfortable means; and why do they go to Wisconsin to settle upon public lands which have neither been surveyed nor brought into the market, when there are millions on millions of acres which have been surveyed this side of that Territory, which are of superior quality for agricultural purposes, and which they might lawfully enter and own at a dollar and a quarter? This boundless region does not satisfy the ambition of these poor men who are seeking a home. They pass by all this as unworthy of their notice, and light upon regions where they may have the first choice, and not wait to get rich by the slow process of ordinary accumulation. These are the poor men knocking at our doors for pre-emption rights.

But this is not all. We have proofs here that they are hawled and associated together to resist the laws of the United States, and to maintain their claims against all opposition. They have constitutions, as they term them, and for what? To stand together and maintain their possessions. To set at defiance the title of the United States to their own property. To make war upon all persons who shall dare to bid for these lands at the sales made by the United States, and by such high-handed violence to secure to themselves great tracts of country, the most valuable portions of the public domain, at the paltry sum of a dollar and a quarter the acre, though it is well known that purchasers stand ready in many instances to give a hundred fold more. Many of these settlers, it is said, are banded with the speculators by an agreement to divide the booty; and when the rights are thus once secured in a place, like birds of prey, they rise up and light upon some other favored region to convert it to private property by the same process of lawless violence.

I was informed by a gentleman, last winter, who lived at the Grand Rapids, in Michigan, among the Ottawa Indians, that the south bank of the rapids was owned by a squatter, who had obtained a section of 640 acres, at a dollar and a quarter the acre, and that it is worth, at this moment, without any important improvements, half a million of dollars. I could not easily credit the word of a man of the strictest veracity, until I saw, by the treaty made with these Indians, and ratified here at the last session, that a section on the other bank was estimated to be worth a much greater sum. This is not an isolated case of the accumulation of vast wealth by the erection of a bark cabin and the planting of a few peppers or tomatoes. The end, aim, and purpose of the great body of pre-emptioners is to make themselves rich out of the public property. It is, in a word, to defraud the United States in the manner described in the documents from which I have read.

I have recently conversed with a distinguished member of the other House, from the West, who passed through Wisconsin during the last summer, and he informs me that the path leading through the public lands was, for a large portion of the way, skirted by a furrow or two of the plough, which turned off at intervals; and entered the prairies or the openings. On inquiry, he found that this was the proof of occupancy and possession. Those who had done this considered themselves as having established pre-emption rights to all enclosed by the furrows. Some went round a thousand, some more, and some less, acres, and some marked out, in this way, many lots. Almost all the choice land had been thus seized in anticipation of the passage of the law of pre-emption act. He added, that when one crossed the furrow of another, this was called jumping, and then a fight with deadly weapons ensued.

I have seen also a letter, giving an account of a treaty made in Wisconsin the last summer with the loways, who lived on the loway river, west of the Mississippi. The lands upon this stream are represented to be of extraordinary fertility; and, after the general terms of the treaty were agreed upon, the commissioners proposed that a stipulation for a speedy removal of the Indians, and a surrender of the territory, should be inserted. When this proposition was interpreted to the Indians, the writer, who was present, declares there was among them a general laugh, which was viewed as a singular comment upon a grave proposition, and an explanation was requested. They instantly replied that the proposition for such an article was absurd, and wholly unnecessary, as they had no possession. They affirmed, what was ascertained to be true, that, before they assembled to make the treaty, the pre-emptioners had begun to run their ploughs round the land, and no sooner had their agreement to negotiate been made public, than the whites began to take possession of their cabins, and they did not doubt they were now occupying every one of them. The author of this letter is a gentleman, well known as a respectable citizen of the United States.

I have now said enough to show what is the general character of pre-emption rights—that they fill the minds of sharpers with golden dreams, and that the poor are the last class of people who are to be benefited by them.

If this bill passes, the public lands are gone, irreclaimably gone; for such will be the rush upon them, and such the reliance upon future legislation of this character, that this Government can never re-assess its authority. I have heard that the number of persons waiting on the public domain for this law may be estimated at fifty thousand; whether it be more or less is not material, for it is known to be great. When we hear that the Government itself of Wisconsin is of this class, we can have little doubt of the character of the population. Now, sir, I again ask, what necessity is there for such a partial, unjust measure? Why should we in this manner waste the public treasure, and corrupt the morals of the citizens? Why should we do injustice to the whole country by lowering the value of real estate? Are not the landholders, the farmers, of the old States, to be regarded? Can we not change the price of the public lands without its being felt by a correspondent change in the value of real estate from Maine to the farthest West?

It seems to be thought here that the farmers of the old States have no right to open their mouths, if you legislate away half the value of their estates, which have been acquired by long, patient, and laborious industry. They may be left to take care of themselves, or to abandon their homes, and scramble for a share of the public property; for they seem to attract little of the sympathy that is so liberally extended to those who grasp at the alluring booty. Are not the rights of the farmers of the older portions of the new States to be regarded? They have bought and paid for their lands to the United States. Can it be just to them to give away adjoining lots? You indirectly acknowledge that it would not; for you bribe such persons, by allowing them to enlarge their farms to very extraordinary dimensions. But why are we urged to pass a law thus full of injustice?

The great and leading argument is, that the Treasury is too full of money, and it is better to annihilate a source of vast revenue, than to possess the money. Better to throw away public property than to keep it! Better to give it to a few, than that the great whole should have the benefit of it! Sir, you may talk of the poor; of the necessity of settling the public lands; of the gallantry of the pioneers; of their sufferings, their respectability, and whatever else the human mind may invent in its proneness to fiction, but you can never reconcile the people to such an argument. You can never satisfy them that it is better to waste the public treasure than to apply it to public uses; that it is better and more just to pamper a few with it, than to let the whole feel the blessings which a Government may secure by an administration for the benefit of all.

If there should be a surplus of revenue, (which the Secretary of the Treasury denies, and which the committee that report this bill deny, for they have recommended the rejection of the bill to renew the deposit with the States,) why should it not follow the surplus of last year? Is not this better than to cast it into the sea?

But there is still a wiser and a better measure; one that at all times has strongly recommended itself to the consideration of the country: I mean the bill which has repeatedly passed both Houses by a large majority, and has met with an insurmountable obstacle in the veto of the Executive—the land bill. This act provided for the distribution of the avails of the sales of the public lands among the States, upon just and equitable principles, to aid them in their great cause of education and internal improvements. It was in conformity with the terms of the cession of those lands, for they were given to the States, and not to the United States.

And, sir, if this salutary measure had been adopted, what signal blessings would it have conferred upon the States? Who does not see that it was every where needed, and that the hearts of the people would have been gladdened in all the country, by such a just distribution of a treasure acquired by the common blood and sacrifices of the American people? A more munificent, wise, and just act, was never devised within these chambers. This money would have been applied by the States to lighten the burdens, and to increase the happiness of the people. I know of nothing in which the poor are more emphatically blessed than in enlarged means of education, or in which the whole people are more clearly benefited than in the extension of internal improvements, which bring the products of labor by cheap and easy means, to the markets of the country. Such was the general design of this beneficent act; and while I lament that any causes should have arrested its progress, I do not despair of yet seeing a returning sense and more just regard to public rights in this matter.

Can any one for a moment hesitate between the land bill and the act before us? They both relate to the public property: the one proposes to dispose of it for the general good; the other to advance the interests of a few clamorous individuals, most of whom are greedy speculators; the one to enlighten the public mind and to promote the public convenience, the other to create an odious monopoly in the hands of a few, while the great public is excluded from all participation in its own property; the one to ease the Treasury of its burdens, by returning to the people what is their own; the other to build up a class of favored individuals at the expense of the people. The one creates a sectional, undisguised monopoly, not of privileges alone, but by taking what belongs to us of the old States, as well as those of the new, and giving it to others. Can there, ought there to be a moment's hesitation in choosing between these measures? If the Treasury is too full, (which your Secretary in his report and estimates denies,) shall the people have their own, or shall a favored few be pampered with it?

Have we reached a crisis which demands the absolute sacrifice of the public lands? What would be thought of an individual so profligate as to commit his property to destruction? It would be deemed a sin so gross as to provoke the displeasure of Heaven. And we need not be surprised if we soon reach a period when the people will look back with incredulity upon this era, in which we are puzzling ourselves to devise ways to get rid of the revenue. They will be amazed that so little wisdom existed here as not to apply any surplus that possibly can exist to great and useful purposes; but above all, they will credit no man with sincerity who argues that it is necessary to sacrifice the public property, for you cannot persuade men that their condition is above amendment; that they need nothing more; that public money cannot yet be expended so as to promote their happiness.

But if, from political prejudice or any other cause, the land bill is objectionable, still we may easily reduce the revenue without throwing the public property overboard. Why not limit or stop the sales of the public lands? Why not offer a limited portion of those which have been surveyed, instead of exciting the cupidity of the greedy, by offering a choice of the whole domain? There surely can be no difficulty in reducing the revenue from public land if it is necessary. Small financial talent can bring that about, and leave the public property to meet future emergencies. The Treasury can never be so plenary as to require blood-letting.

But another matter has been pressed with extraordinary zeal, and, I fear, more for effect than any other purpose.

This chamber has literally resounded, ever since the opening of the session, with denunciations of speculators in lands. The pre-emption law of 1830, I have shown, disguised and gave effect to the most disgusting, injurious frauds among speculators, that have ever been perpetrated, and this bill opens a passage a thousand times wider and safer for the workers of iniquity. I have, therefore, been greatly surprised that those who denounce speculators should be found among the advocates of this measure. Let those who have defrauded the poor Indians, and through them plundered the United States, answer for their gross misconduct. No denunciations for them can be too heavy, no punishment too severe.

But what have those persons done who, for the most part, have purchased the public lands, and paid this troublesome revenue into the Treasury? Just what the United States have invited them to do. We have a law of long standing, which requires, after the public lands have been surveyed, that they shall first be offered at public auction, and those which will sell at more than a dollar and a quarter shall be thus disposed of. It further provides that, whatever remains of the quantity thus offered, any person may enter in any quantity not less than one-eighth of a section, and become the owner by paying the price into the land office of the district where the land lies. All persons are alike invited, both to attend the sales and to make entries of what remains. The great body of the public lands have been sold under the provisions of this law, and the purchasers have done precisely what we have invited them by law to do, and precisely what all honest purchasers before them have done. You offered your land on your own terms, and they have paid all you demanded. This is the extent of their offence; and does it become us, while that law stands on the statute books, and while the public offices are kept open under public authority from Congress, to stigmatize those who give us just what we ask? who deal openly, fairly, and honestly? If you have too many purchasers, if the land is too rapidly taken up, then alter your law; change your terms, instead of denouncing the purchasers. You can make terms that will put a stop to the sales. It will become us to spend our breath in scolding about those who have done nothing but comply with our terms, nothing but to conform to the laws made here.

It is further urged that the public lands have excited a disposition to speculation and trade which ought to be suppressed, because it is injurious to the country. That an extraordinary spirit of trade and speculation is abroad admits of no doubt; and that its ends will not contribute to the general prosperity is perhaps equally certain; but I cannot agree that the public lands have been the exciting cause. Nothing seems to me more unfounded.

The origin of this state of things may be found in the attempts of the Executive to regulate the currency of the country. These attempts, all agree now, have been futile and positively injurious, and so will all attempts to regulate speculation prove. Every one thinks he can clearly see proofs of overtrading in others; but there are few, I believe, who do not entertain the opinion that their own affairs are judiciously conducted. They need no regulation themselves; indeed, they are willing to submit to none; for that is a matter that belongs exclusively to their private judgment; but their neighbors may wish property to be regulated. The Executive may put his hand upon them, because they buy or sell a little too much. It is a kind of undeniable public injury which may be corrected by the interference of Executive power, and there is no harm in applying a regulator to the judgment of others. To ourselves, it is not necessary, as our opinions are as good as the king's. But I said speculation did not find its origin in the public lands, but in the removal of the deposits. That extraordinary measure gave the death-blow to the Bank of the United States, and established the belief that such a bank hereafter was to be dispensed with. What a host of banks have risen upon its ruins! What a sea of paper has inundated the country, under pretence of suppressing bank notes! In 1820, the bank capital in the United States was estimated at $145,192,268, and it is now believed to be little, if any, short of $400,000,000. Banks have been every where created, with an amount of capital that would have startled the public mind before this war began. Where is the boasted hard money currency? Who sees it? Who feels it? It jingles in the press, and nowhere else. But what has been the effect of this remarkable creation of banks? It has every where greatly added to the amount of circulation. The very evil complained of exists in a vastly more efficient and all-pervading character. Wherever new banks have been created, there hopes have been excited that money could be reached, and there these hopes have begot the spirit of speculation. A new batch of bills was to be thrown out, and those who would add to their mass of wealth, and those who would mend broken fortunes, or amass riches by sudden acquisitions, seized these opportunities to lay hold of the means. The success of one has stimulated another, until the contagion has spread, with the spread of banks, over the land. This system, I fear, has grown to be an alarming evil; and whenever distress and suffering shall overtake us, as it bids fair to do speedily, then will the eyes of the public be turned to this place for relief, and the just power of the States, instead of being respected, will be trampled under foot. Pennsylvania, democratic Pennsylvania, has already appealed to this power to aid her other State banks.

Let not the public lands be charged with exciting this gambling spirit. The only reason why you sell the public lands is, because they are supposed to be cheap, and if you think them so, it is easy to ask more. Let the currency alone; place your surplus money with the States instead of piling it up in your pet banks, so that it rises above their capital, and the people will soon learn how to do business, and you will find little cause to complain of speculation; but so long as you undertake to regulate it, and fit that regulation to suit the fortunes and wishes of favored capitalists, so long you will hear complaints, and just complaints, of the partial and oppressive action of this Government.

But with what force can those who censure speculation advocate this bill? It proposes to legalize the most stupendous speculations that the country has ever witnessed. If we cannot extricate ourselves from the petty law of 1830; if that has enlisted an army of 50,000 men to band themselves together to insist on pre-emption rights against all law and all color of right, what number do you think this bill will array upon the frontiers? I tell you, sir, that the whole power of the United States will exert itself in vain against the current. Your public domain will be lost; instead of three millions, your bill take from you three hundred millions. The temptation is such as never addressed itself to cupidity; and the speculators, those who can run furrows and hire the strongest force to make violence and to resist violence, will be the chief participants in the plunder. He who can raise the strongest clan, and flourish the most knives, will acquire the greatest possessions.

The bill also invites and protects fraud, for you authorize a person to enter upon his two sections, to make his cultivation, and to hold the land, but he is to have no title for five years. Whoever, therefore, chooses to defraud his creditors, may salt his money down in these lands, and it will be beyond the reach of the law; for the title will be in the United States, while the actual possession and full enjoyment will be in the pre-emptor. This will be one of the most convenient modes ever devised of abstracting property from the reach of creditors.

But there is another reason more extraordinary than any of which I have hitherto adverted. I cannot but the frankness of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) when he says earnestly and too emphatically to be misunderstood, it is time the federal title to the public lands was extinguished; the time is coming when we will have them. These are plain declarations—"we will have them." The old States, then, are to have no part or lot in the public lands. The children hold themselves justified in seizing the estate, in robbing the ancestor while alive; and those who propose this complain of all who buy land at the legal price as greedy speculators; as men preying upon the public prosperity, and enriching themselves at the expense of the settlers. This can only mean that what goes into the public treasury is grudged to it. It is time for the public to rouse up and look to this usurpation, if there is such a determination abroad. It is time for the old States to awake from their repose, and see that their inheritance is not sold for a mess of pottage. These public lands afford a most alluring temptation to those who seek for popular favor, and the old States must rest assured that they will constitute a political capital to trade upon, and he who will offer them upon the most favorable terms will hope for most popular favor in the West. The halls of Congress have long furnished ample proof of this. Sir, I hope the time has not come when the people are to be purchased by largesses; when, in imitation of the corrupt days of Rome, favor is to be gained by a distribution of corn or money. Yet, from the signs here, I have long feared the approach of evil. I hope, sir, that people place a higher value upon public liberty; that they will consent to be the followers of no one who does not, by his conduct as well as sentiments, show his respect and regard for the institutions achieved and established by the revolution of independence. Men that can be bought and sold by petty hopes of pecuniary advantage are unworthy of the great public blessings they inherit.

The Senator from Missouri, I agree, understands the sentiments of his part of the country better than I do, for he has long been a sagacious observer of public opinion. It is enough for me that he declares the purpose exists to assert title to the lands in the new States. It is enough for all who value their property to look to it with vigilance, when one of his standing and influence declares that the federal title shall be extinguished. The new States, I trust, are more wise, just, and patriotic, than the suggestion would imply.

I have, sir, glanced at some of the important matters connected with this measure, and I cannot view it in any aspect in which it presents itself, that is not pregnant with vicious consequences; and though I fear it will be unavailing, I earnestly hope the bill may be rejected.

IMPROVEMENT OF CUMBERLAND RIVER.

REMARKS OF MR. WHITE, OF KENTUCKY.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In the House of Representatives, Monday, February 27, 1857.—The House being in Committee of the Whole upon the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers—

Mr. WHITE (of Kentucky) offered an amendment providing for the establishment of a port of entry at the mouth of Laurel river, and an appropriation of forty-five thousand dollars for the improvement of the Cumberland river, between the mouth of Laurel river and the city of Nashville, to be expended according to the report made by Col. Albert, of the Engineer Corps, of a survey executed in the year 1835.

Mr. W. said: With all due respect to the admonition of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Whiteley) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. Lee), warning the committee of the impropriety and great danger of allowing any amendment whatever to this bill, he felt it his duty to offer the amendment under consideration. And he must be permitted to say that he could not but admire the extreme modesty and generous liberality of the earnest appeals of those two gentlemen, when he reflected upon the various items contained in this bill. The committee will discover, by an examination of the different appropriations proposed in this bill, that, although there are twenty-six States in the Union, each entitled to a fair and just proportion of the public expenditures of this Government, two-thirds of the amount appropriated by this bill is to be expended in the States of Ohio and New York; and out of the remaining third, Tennessee and Kentucky are to receive the paltry sum of ten thousand dollars. And yet, notwithstanding this manifest inequality and injustice, the representatives from those two States are modestly asked to sit still, and fold their arms, and quietly look on, and see themselves robbed, without raising a voice in defence of their just claim for a small pittance out of your overflowing Treasury, or daring to express their indignation and forbearance towards this bill, as it now exists, lest you may jeopard its final passage, may lull others to sleep, whilst you carry on your insatiable plunder upon the National Treasury, in which my constituents hold a common stock. But, (said Mr. W.) if I cannot reach your sense of justice and equity, I intend fearlessly to expose your injustice. It is objected by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Whiteley,) that this amendment ought not to be adopted, because the appropriation has not been reported by a standing committee. My reply to this objection is this: unfortunately for the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, either from a want of intellect in their members, or from a want of sagacity in the presiding officer of this House to discover it, or from some other cause, not political, just at this time, for me to speculate upon, it so happens, out of the eighteen members who compose the standing Committees of Commerce and Ways and Means, whose duty it is to examine and report upon propositions of this kind, not one of them is from the State of Kentucky, and but one from the State of Tennessee, and he constitutionally opposed to all appropriations by the National Government for internal improvements. I do not mention this as a complaint of personal neglect. Being one of the youngest members upon this floor, in years as well as political life, I did not expect or desire to be placed upon one of those important committees. Yet I do consider that great neglect has been done towards those two States, in not placing some one of their older members upon one of these committees, through whose hands three-fourths of the business of this House has to pass. Mr. W. would ask this committee to consider that it is not from any want of intrinsic merit in the measure proposed by this amendment that it does not come recommended by a standing committee, but from a want of deliberate investigation and just consideration of those committees to whom this subject was referred the session before the last, as likewise this, by express resolution.

Sir, if this committee will take the trouble to cast their eyes over a list of the members composing those two committees, they will perceive that sixteen out of the eighteen are selected from the Atlantic States, and but two west of the Alleghenies; one from Ohio (Mr. Corwin), and one from Louisiana (Mr. Johnson), both of which States are amply provided for in this bill. Sir, it is an old and true saying, that "charity begins at home; and with their two committees, in the manufacture of this bill, it has remained at home. If it has passed without the limits of the various States in which the different members of the committees reside, at all, its visits are like angels' feet and far between. Whilst every stream of any importance emptying into the Atlantic, and every creek and branch running from the States of Ohio and New York into the Northern lakes, is to be ornamented with a splendid and magnificent harbor, large and valuable streams in the interior States are wholly forgotten and neglected.

Mr. WHITE said that this amendment was not offered by him as a mere matter of form to make a display of his name upon the journal, expecting it to be voted down as a matter of course. No, sir, it is offered as a matter of substance and of just merit; and if he should succeed (as he felt confident he could, if he could retain the attention of the committee) in convincing this committee that this proposition would bear a rigid scrutiny, and a triumphant comparison, tested by merit, with any object contained among the almost innumerable items of this bill, he expected it to receive the favorable action of this committee, although it did not come before you recommended by the standing committee of Commerce, or Ways and Means. If he should fail in maintaining its intrinsic merit in comparison with other objects, he should feel it his duty to acquiesce in a vote of rejection.

Mr. WHITE said that, as the committee had not, during this session, had the benefit of a report from any standing committee upon this subject, and as there seems to be a lamentable ignorance in relation to the size and importance of this stream, he would briefly state, for the information of the committee, that, in the year 1835, there was a survey made of this river by one of the United States engineers under a resolution passed by this House, the report of which survey made by Col. Albert, of the Engineer Corps, he now had before him—a report drawn with great labor, highly creditable to the intellect of its author; minutely describing the length and size of the river—its advantages for navigation—its obstructions—the character of soil in the counties contiguous to its banks—the various minerals as well as agricultural products. He said he would not weary the committee by reading the report; but if any gentleman doubts the importance of this river, and desires information, he will discover, by an examination of this report, made by one of the first officers in the service of the Government, that the Cumberland river, from its source to its mouth, is 500 miles in length, (longer than any river within the limits of the United States that empties into the Atlantic east of the Alleghany mountains) running through bodies of land for the distance of three hundred miles that will bear a successful comparison for fertility and variety of products with any part of the globe—abounding in minerals of almost every description—coal banks inexhaustible immediately upon its margin—salt, manufactured to the amount of a half million of bushels annually at the various works, the most distant not exceeding thirty miles from the river, which quantity could be greatly increased if an additional market were opened by the improvement proposed; a stream admirably adapted by Nature for navigation, with but few natural obstructions. The sum asked to be appropriated by this amendment is estimated by the engineer who executed the survey as being sufficient to remove the obstructions between the mouth of Laurel and Nashville, a distance of near 200 miles. This report recommends in the strongest terms the great advantages to be derived from the improvement of the navigation of this stream, at so little cost to the Government.

This subject, together with this report, has been referred to some standing committee of this House each successive session since the execution of this survey, and has uniformly received the favorable action of some committee of this House each session preceding the present; but from press of business, or some other cause, the passage of the appropriation for this object has always failed. Before the survey alluded to was made, during the session of 1833-4, a bill passed, appropriating thirty thousand dollars to the improvement of the Cumberland river in Kentucky and Tennessee; but, unfortunately for the people who reside in Tennessee and Kentucky above Nashville, the expenditure of that appropriation was confined exclusively to that portion of the river lying below Nashville. By a rigid and most singular construction of the Constitution, so much of that appropriation as was intended by Congress to benefit his constituents, as well as the entire population occupying the country above Nashville, fell a victim to the Executive veto, based upon the newly discovered idea that no appropriation by the General Government could be constitutionally applied above a port of entry. He said he wished it distinctly understood by the committee he did not read the Constitution in this way; he wished no such inference drawn from his having associated the erection of a port of entry with the appropriation asked in his amendment. He did not believe that any act passed by Congress could either enlarge or diminish, add to or take from, the Constitution; but the Chief Magistrate, whose sanction has to be given to this bill before it becomes a law, does; and in order to obviate his objection, and secure the signature of the President to this bill, he had inserted a clause in the amendment providing for the establishment of a port of entry at the mouth of Laurel river, the highest point upon the Cumberland river proposed to be improved. This is his apology to the committee for presenting this singular anomaly, this strange association, of the creation of a port of entry with an appropriation for the improvement of a river. Notwithstanding the two subjects are somewhat incongruous, yet the necessity of the case demands that the incongruity should be overlooked. For his own part, he did not intend to stickle about a nice point of order in voting for this amendment, nor should the committee, under the peculiar circumstances of this case. His constituents are by no means a fastidious people; they want this appropriation, they greatly need it, their prosperity much depends upon it; if they cannot get it in the ordinary way, they are willing to resort to the extraordinary; if they are without the limits of the Constitution, and cannot gain admittance through any other channel than a port of entry, they are willing to enter in at that door. They regretted, to be sure, to learn that while the Constitution was construed so as to embrace within its arms States all around, and even a portion of their own State, they should have been declared without its pale. They rejoice, however, there is a way opened for them to come in; and, although it seems to them a crooked way, they are disposed to avail themselves of the offering. Being convinced that every member of this committee was satisfied of the importance of this river, and the justice of this appropriation, he hoped that neither a strict construction of a point of order, nor the objection, growing out of a want of recommendation from the standing committees, will close this only remaining avenue left his constituents to get back again under the protecting arm of the Constitution.

He said he was frank to acknowledge that, in making up his mind upon any proposition brought before this House, a favorable recommendation from a standing committee had a considerable influence in forming his judgment. Yet he was not willing to yield a passive obedience to the report of a standing committee, and vote for or against a measure in accordance with their recommendations. He cared not how he acquired the facts, if he considered the measure right, and deserving, by its merit, his favorable consideration; he gave it his vote even if it should not be endorsed by a standing committee.

It will be recollected by this committee that he had, in more than one instance in the last two days, pursued this course. Upon the proposition to appropriate twenty thousand dollars to the repair of a fortification at the mouth of the Connecticut river, although offered as an amendment, without the recommendation of a standing committee, he gave this amendment his sanction, because he deemed it needful. At the same time, he was not partial to a general system of fortifications as a means of defence. He did not regard them as the most important branch of the great system of national defence. A few were absolutely necessary for the protection of large cities, situated upon the coast, to secure the entrance of large harbors; to guard the mouths of large rivers. But in a country like this, after all, the main reliance for defence is upon the patriotism and valor of the citizens, and the facilities afforded by good roads, canals, and navigable rivers, for the rapid concentration of men and supplies to any and every point of our extensive frontier. In time of peace, fortifications were expensive, requiring a standing army to keep them in repair, and preserve them from ruin. Not so with navigable rivers, canals, and roads. They were alike useful in peace and war; affording important facilities and benefits to agriculture, manufactures, and commerce.

He wished the chairman of the Committee on Commerce (Mr. Sutherland) to bear in mind that he voted against the proposition to strike out of the Navy bill the appropriation of four hundred thousand dollars, necessary to complete and launch the magnificent ship of the line PENNSYLVANIA. He called the recollection of the gentleman from the North to the fact of his having voted, only a few days since, for four hundred thousand dollars to build four sloops of war, although offered by way of amendment, and not recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. He said, a few words in relation to the claims of Tennessee and Kentucky upon the justice of the General Government, and the neglect with which they had been treated, and he was done. It will be remembered that Tennessee and Kentucky, the two States interested in this amendment, pay annually a large amount in taxes upon consumption into your Treasury; that they are altogether consuming States, and import nothing; that they have not a ship afloat upon the ocean, and derive not one cent of direct benefit from all your foreign commerce, for the protection of which you spend millions annually; and although there may be seventeen millions of revenue collected yearly in the city of New York, as has been boastfully displayed before this committee by the member from that city, (Mr. Lee,) and zealously urged as an argument why New York was justly entitled to more than an ordinary share of the disbursements of the public money, yet the merest scionist in political economy knows that these duties are always paid (and that too with heavy interest) by the consumers. Sir, Kentucky and Tennessee have been members of this Confederacy near a half century; during which time how many millions have they contributed to your Treasury, and how many hundreds have they received back again? How many cents have returned to Kentucky? Not one cent. Tennessee, I believe, has received forty-five thousand dollars since she was acknowledged as a State. It will not be contended that there are any two States in this Union more loyal, more devoted to the true principles of this Republic. None are more prompt to vindicate and contend for the rights and honor of this nation. None are more ready to take up the line of march to meet foreign aggression, no matter upon what border of this widely extended country it may approach. This Government has never yet drawn a bill upon their patriotism that has not been promptly discounted, nor upon their valor, that has not been most nobly redeemed.

He would not detain the committee by reciting the many splendid victories achieved by their daring courage during the late war; their noble deeds are matters of history; their fame is above the reach of eulogy or detraction. No, sir. He said he repeated, neglect, injury itself could not alienate the affections of the people of these two States from the Union. They have long and patiently borne both. Under all political changes, their attachment has remained unimpaired. You may check and embarrass their progress in wealth, as you have done; you may impoverish them by your mistaken policy; or, to speak in plain and honest language, by your unpardonable neglect and wilful injustice; yet you cannot weaken their attachment to this Government; they will continue to cling to the Union "as their best, their greatest, and last hope." Yet he demanded of the candor of this committee if they ought not, whilst they were scattering millions upon millions of the surplus treasure upon the seaboard, and upon the lakes, to return upon meritorious and useful objects of appropriation a small division of the perpetual drain from those two States into the national treasury? He said it was not his habit to indulge in complaints; but, he must repeat, he felt that these States, and especially Kentucky, had been treated by this Government with cold neglect, with crying injustice. He said he did not stand here asking charity at the bar of this House; he scorned the character of a beggar; he was no mendicant for bounty, no petitioner for alms; his constituents would spurn him from their presence when he returned home, if he would dare fill such a character upon this floor. He stood here as one of the representatives of the people of this nation; and, in the name of his constituents, he asked for justice, nothing but sheer justice. He called upon gentlemen from the North and from the East to bear in mind that, during the last session, as likewise this, he had voted for the appropriation of millions for the increase of the Navy, for the erection of fortifications, for the building of light-houses; and now the small petition of forty-five thousand dollars is asked, as the only appropriation for all purposes to two States, and the murmuring sound of opposition is heard from the North, from the gentleman from New York (Mr. Lee), from the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Smith), and from the West from the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Whittelsey). "Be to the Bride." Sir, he said, the gentleman from Ohio must permit him to say, least of all did he expect opposition from that quarter—the representative of a Western, adjoining State, whose lake borders are now whitened by the bones of Kentuckians who perished gallantly defending the wives and children of the gentleman's constituents from the savage cruelty of the Indian. He had occupied the attention of the committee much longer than he intended when he rose. He knew the great mass of unfinished business on hand, and but a very few days remained to dispose of it; but, before he took his seat, he would say, by way of assurance to those who felt a deep interest in the success of this bill, and as a guaranty of his sincerity of purpose in offering this amendment, and that he was actuated by no sinister design, that, whether his amendment was sustained or not by the committee, he would still vote for the bill. He wished it understood that the justice and liberality of a Kentuckian were not confined to the narrow limits of a congressional district, not circumscribed by the boundary of a State, but commensurate with the just wants of every part of this wide spread Union.

WIDOWS OF REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS, &c.

REMARKS OF MR. TAYLOR, OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, December 23, 1837.—Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, having submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the third section of the act entitled "An act granting half pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands or fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1836, so as to extend the provisions of that section to all widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution whose husbands were entitled to a pension, excepting cases of second marriage after the termination of the war.

And the resolution having been read, Mr. TAYLOR addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before taking the question on this resolution, I ask the indulgence of the House while I submit a few remarks. I had prepared a resolution, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act to those widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution whose marriage took place previous to the close of the war; whereas, the act of the last session gives a pension only to those widows whose marriage took place previous to the expiration of the last term of military service of their husbands; but having received some communications upon the subject, and upon further reflection, I have been induced to alter it in the manner as now presented. I have done so from a deep conviction that if there is justice or propriety in extending the pension system to the widows of pensioners, as now provided by law, there is equal justice and propriety in extending it in the manner proposed; and, indeed, sir, I may say there would be great injustice in withholding it.

The act which it proposed to amend, I believe, passed without opposition, or at least with great unanimity. There was manifest in the House a strong disposition to extend the pension system to the aged widows of the soldiers of the Revolution; and I am inclined to the opinion that, if more time had been allowed, more deliberation bestowed upon the subject, the act would not have been as limited in its provisions as it now is. I believe I may say, without fear of contradiction, that no legislation by Congress meets more decidedly and cordially the approbation of the people of these United States than does that which extends the liberality, the justice, of this nation to that class who yet linger among us, and who were participators directly, or even indirectly, in the privations, the sufferings, and the sacrifices of the war of the Revolution; and I rejoice, sir, that it is so; for it indicates that deep and abiding gratitude which flows from a just sense and due appreciation of the great benefits which they obtained, a cherishing of the principles which they taught, and a veneration and attachment to the institutions which they established. This truly American feeling may well be indulged, and should be gratified, especially as we have so abundantly the means of gratifying it; for, while it confers upon the aged and worthy remnant of a race of patriots and heroes some just reward for meritorious services and sacrifices, it cherishes and cultivates those sentiments of respect and attachment to the political doctrines and principles of a purer age, which tend to the security of freedom, and the safety of the Union. And why, sir, have you extended your pension system to the widows of those who were entitled to a pension? It is because they, too, have made sacrifices in the cause of their country; it is because they have endured hardships and encountered dangers for their country's freedom; it is because they have united their fortunes and identified their interests from early life with those who fought your battles. It is because of the encouragement which they gave, and the influence which they exerted—an encouragement which never faltered in the gloomiest period of that war, and an influence which was felt wherever there was a tented field, a battle ground, or a soldier to be enlisted for the service. The patriotism, the zeal, ay, and the enthusiasm of that day, was not confined to those by nature constituted to endure the hardships of a soldier's life, but pervaded all classes of society, and was conspicuously manifested by the gender sex; and no matron or maid, in the proud days of Spartan valor, would, as the blush of wounded pride mantled on her cheek, have turned with more of scorn and indignation from the coward who had basely fled from the defence of his country, than would the American women of that period have turned from him whose treachery and cowardice had thrown disgrace upon him. And this influence was powerful in the success of the war; it animated the heart, it nerved the arm of the soldier, and prompted him to deeds of daring and of valor.

But, sir, I need not dwell upon the merits, the influence, and the sacrifices of the American women of revolutionary times; for you have already settled the principle that the widow of the pensioned soldier of the revolution is entitled to a continuance of that bounty of the Government which her husband enjoyed; but you have, as I humbly conceive, unjustly confined it to those, and those only, whose marriage took place previous to the last military service of their husbands. And, sir, is this fact, the fact of marriage previous to the last military service of the soldier, so important as to settle the question whether the widow is entitled to the pension which her husband enjoyed? Should that fact, I ask, be the test by which you are to determine the justice or the expediency of continuing the pension to the widow? It appears to me not, sir. Neither do I conceive that marriage previous to the close of that war is the just criterion by which this question should be decided. If the wife of the soldier, while he was perilling his life in the service of his country, was suffering at home many and great privations, and participating largely in sympathy, anxiety, and solicitude for the safety of her husband, and the success of the cause in which he was engaged, is entitled to the inheritance of that annuity which you since, of right, have granted her husband while living, how much less worthy this favor is the widow, who, although at that period she might have stood in no other relation than that of the affectionate daughter, the anxious sister, of those who were hazarding all in their country's cause, and who, after participating, perhaps, equally in the sufferings peculiar to those times, at the close of the war united her fortune for life with that of the war-worn soldier, or the afflicted maid, whose marriage, from motives of prudence, advice of friends, the perils of the times, and anxiety for the cause in which all were engaged, was deferred until patriotism and valor were crowned, and peace and tranquility restored to the country? And yet, by your present law, the one is entitled to a pension, while the others are deprived, and the number of this class is not comparatively small. Sir, those days were not so much days of marrying and giving in marriage, as they were of toil, of suffering, and of bloodshed in a glorious cause; and if the facts could be precisely known, I doubt not it would be found, that with those actually engaged in the service of their country, more marriages were consummated soon after the war than during the entire period of the revolution; and yet you deprive the widows of all such of that bounty which you bestow upon the others. Is this equal justice? Is it right?

But, sir, my object is not to discuss the question at this time, but merely to bring the subject before the House, with the hope that the committee will give it their immediate attention, and report a bill in conformity to the suggestions of the resolution.

Mr. STORER remarked, that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions had had this subject under consideration, and would report a bill meeting the views of the gentleman from New York.

The resolution was then agreed to nem. dis.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

[As reported by the National Intelligencer.]

In the Senate, Friday, March 3, 1837.—On the fortification bill returned to the Senate, after the House insisted on the clause for a second distribution of the surplus revenue.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the fortification bill, returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, consisting of a second section, providing for the distribution of the surplus revenue in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, among the different States of the Union, reported the same to the Senate, with an amendment to strike out the second section, which had been added by the House of Representatives; and the question being on adopting the amendment proposed by the Committee:

Mr. CALHOUN observed that this was a very important amendment indeed, and one which he deeply regretted the committee had deemed it proper to report. He could not consent to sit by in silence, and suffer the question to be taken, without at least requesting to hear some reason why an amendment of this character had been reported. If there should be a large surplus in the Treasury, as there was every reason to expect there would be, the natural and proper distribution of it was obviously to return it to the people. He could not but express his surprise that the committee should expect the Senate to strike out an amendment of this importance simply on their recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT thereupon said that it was not his purpose to occupy the time of the Senate at this late period of the session. None knew better than the Senator from South Carolina the nature of the amendment, and the bearings of the whole question. The subject was as well understood by every member of the Senate as it could be by the committee. The section which the House of Representatives had added to this bill was precisely the bill introduced at the commencement of the session by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina himself, which had been referred to the Finance Committee, and long since reported on. Surely the gentleman did not expect a written report on a bill referred but yesterday, and embracing a subject of such vast magnitude. The amendment involved as important a question as ever had been submitted to Congress; and if this had been the first time the Senate had ever heard of it, there would have been great propriety in requiring either a written report, or at least some verbal explanation in regard to it. But Mr. W. did not feel bound, as the case stood, to make a long report on a matter with which every body was familiar, and on which he could not suggest a single new idea. A report, under such circumstances, would, if made, change no opinion. This was the simple explanation which he had to make (so far as he was personally concerned) in reply to the call of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. By the committee the subject of a written report had not once been mentioned. For himself, he considered the section which had been added to the bill as completely disconnected with the subject-matter of the bill as it left the Senate, as one thing could be distinct from another. It was in fact an important act of independent legislation. All the members of the Senate were acquainted with Mr. W.'s opinions on the principles of the measure proposed by the amendment, and he should not, therefore, detain the Senate or waste its time by stating them. Mr. W. offered this explanation as an apology for the absence of a report on the amendment; whether it would prove acceptable to the Senator from South Carolina, he could not say.

Mr. CALHOUN said he now understood the Senator from New York to rest the question of concurrence in the amendment on the discussion which had taken place at the last session. This this he could have no objection; for, so triumphant had been the argument last year in favor of the distribution bill, that the gentleman had been left in a minority of six against the whole Senate. As no reason had since intervened to change the circumstances of the case, Mr. C. was content to rest the issue as it had then been made. A more triumphant argument he had never listened to, and such had been its irresistible force, that it had broken through the bonds of party discipline, and compelled gentlemen to leave their party and vote for the bill. He would not repeat it, but he would ask those Senators who had at the last session felt and admitted its force, and had voted for the distribution bill, whether they would now change their ground, without a single argument having been urged in reply. Surely the Senator from New York was bound to show some difference in the case, which should induce those who had voted for distribution last year to vote against it now. The Senator from New York owed this to gentlemen of his own side, if he expected them thus to turn about in the face of the world.

Mr. WRIGHT rejoined. He was bound to say that the principles which had governed his own course remained unchanged, without recriminating on any who now differed from him. It was unimportant to him for what reasons other gentlemen might have changed their ground; but he supposed and believed, and so did the gentleman from South Carolina, that the surplus actually existing at the last session, and that which was then certainly anticipated, and which must be disposed of in some way, had governed the action of gentlemen who then voted for the bill; and if the same state of things were certain now, they would act in conformity with it. Mr. W. had no doubt that all those gentlemen who voted for the bill of the last session, had acted just as conscientiously as he had himself done in voting against it. He admitted that the opinions which he had at that time held on the subject of the surplus had, to some extent, proved erroneous. But surely the Senator from South Carolina would not call upon him for the reasons which actuated others. If gentlemen should act differently on this occasion from the manner in which they had acted at the last session, the Senator would, no doubt, find them ready to vindicate their course, and much more able than himself to explain the considerations which actuated them. He trusted that this would supersede the censure of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. CLAY hoped that the question would be decided by yeas and nays. The proposition adopted, said he, by the House of Representatives, and now sent to this body for its concurrence, is, that any surplus revenue which may remain in the Treasury on the first of January next, beyond the wants of the Government, shall, after retaining five millions, be distributed among the States. If at that time there shall be no surplus, the bill will have, of course, no effect; if there be, it will. What are the objections to concurring? We have been favored with very few on this occasion. I would ask of the honorable Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) whether it is his intention that, in case there shall be a large surplus, it is to remain in the deposite banks which have now the custody of the public money, at an interest to the Government of two per cent.? Does the honorable Senator think that that is a prudent and proper disposition of the public funds? A great central State in our neighborhood has, I understand, directed that her portion of the surplus distributed in January last be placed in banks paying for it an interest of six per cent. and there was not any difficulty in the arrangement. Does the Senator consider it as a wise and proper financial operation to keep the money of the United States in deposite banks at an interest of two per cent. when, for the same money, the Government might obtain six per cent. on adequate security? I am anxious to know what is to be the policy of the coming administration on this subject.

[Mr. WRIGHT. Their policy is to have no surplus.]

Mr. CLAY resumed. Then take the land bill, like an honest man. There is the remedy. That will be better than your restrictive measures on the sales of the public lands, which throw open one hundred and eighty millions of acres at a time. I should be glad, I say, to know what the administration policy

It is to be; the country has a right to know. The honorable Senator was stout last session in his denial that there would be a surplus; oh, no; there would be no surplus, no surplus. At length, however, he was obliged to admit that there would be some a little; but how did it turn out? We all know. Well, if there is to be a surplus in January, what is to be done with it? Is it to be kept in the deposit banks at two per cent. interest? Is that your calculation? Is that the policy you will announce to the people? Why, what do the daily developments which are taking place demonstrate? Do they not prove that these deposit banks are but so many mere political machines? Have you seen the application recently made by one of the banks in the city of New York for a share of the public money? The greatest recommendation urged by the applicants, their strongest argument, is this: "we are cordial friends to the distinguished chief who has so ably filled the chair of the Chief Magistrate," &c. Let me now make an appeal to the majority in this House, and I am glad that what I say will be heard by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives.) This body has been pronounced by him to be the aristocratic branch of the Federal Government. If not positively and avowedly aristocratic, it has at least a squinting toward aristocracy. Well, and who are the majority of the aristocracy here? Are they not the friends of the administration? Now the democratic branch in Congress have determined that it is unwise and improper to leave a large surplus revenue in the deposit banks, to pay the country an interest of two per cent.; and whence does the opposition to the salutary democratic measure proceed? From the aristocratic majority in the Senate. Are you, then, going to confirm your own charges against this body? I take your own words, and I ask, will you oppose the democracy of the country? Will you withstand the people's will? Will you, by a silent report, give your loudly dissent to what they have approved and resolved upon? I call on that majority of this Senate who, at the last session, thought it unwise to leave the public money in the deposit banks, to rally around their own principles, to stand by their democratic friends in the other House, and to take the money of the nation out of the hands of these deposit banks, and distribute it among the people of the States on the principles advocated by me last session. I am glad to hear, however, the Senator from New York cannot be brought to consent to this arrangement. Well, then, I will propose to him, by way of a compromise, that he consent to the land bill. This is a middle measure; it disposes of two great interests at once. Is it possible to conceive of a better disposition both of the question of the surplus and the question of the tariff? If the honorable gentleman will consent to that, I will agree with him; but I entreat the majority of this body not to lend themselves to the plan of retaining this surplus revenue in a few banks to be selected by the administration. I hope we shall not agree to the recommendation of the Committee on Finance, and I trust that its honorable chairman will, when the yeas and nays shall be called, be found now, as he was found at the last session, standing in a small minority. I ask that the question may be decided by yeas and nays.

Mr. RIVES said he did not rise from any wish to lengthen this debate, but merely with a view to submit a few remarks in reply to the appeal which had been addressed to himself and others by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I do not see why he was so particularly anxious that I should hear what he had to say on this subject. I have often listened to that honorable Senator, always with pleasure, and often with profit; but what was it he was so anxious I should hear? In some observations which I had the honor to submit upon another occasion, I took occasion to say that, in a philosophic view of the structure of this Government, the Senate was to be considered as the aristocratic branch of it; not that every individual member of that body was an aristocrat, in the odious sense of that term, but that the body, from the manner of its constitution, was less immediately subject than the other House to the popular will. On that point, I shall enter into no controversy, but I would apply the honorable Senator's argument to his own case. He says that we are bound now to show that we of the Senate are not aristocratic in our feelings and course of action, and we are to do this by obeying the impulses which proceed from the democratic branch in the other House; and he contends that, if we shall refuse to do so, it will be a verification of what I said. There is no propriety in his making an issue with me; but let it be admitted that the argument is properly addressed to a democratic majority, and it amounts to this; that, in order to vindicate their democratic character, they must, in all things, and on all occasions, submit to an expression of the will of the democratic branch of the Government. If this is so, let me remind the Senator of his own course in relation to that very important measure, the Fugitive bill of the last session. He cannot but recollect the appropriation by the House of Representatives of three millions of dollars in anticipation of the contingency of a war with one of the European Powers. The amendment came here, and was sternly rejected. Notwithstanding the gentleman's doctrine of submission to the democratic branch, the rejection was persisted in, until, by means of it, the bill was lost. The Senator himself on that occasion set an example directly the reverse of what he is now contending for. I do not call up this subject from any desire to revive the heats which then prevailed, but I mention it as an occasion of reminding him that, if he means to urge a principle of action upon us, he must at least observe it himself.

Now, what ought to be the course of the Senate? Will the Senate from Kentucky, or any other gentleman, who does not speak merely ad captivandum, say, that when the Senate stands committed before the world to a great system of policy, and an amendment comes from the other House, proceeding on wholly different grounds, this body is bound to surrender the policy it approves, and adopt that which comes from the House of Representatives? Does not the whole system of this Senate proceed upon the ground that there should not be any surplus revenue? Have we not altered the land system, and reduced the tariff, for the express purpose of preventing a surplus? And now, when we are openly pledged to the country, and to the world, not to distribution, but to reduction, must we at once turn about and say that there shall be a surplus, and that it shall be distributed among the States? Is there any fairness in requiring us to surrender all our fixed opinions at the mere bidding of a majority of the other House? There are other channels, beside the acts of that body, through which we may learn the will of the people. Member as I am of that which, according to its essential genius, is the aristocratic branch of this Government, I do hold myself under the control of public opinion, as it comes to me in authentic forms. The House of Representatives is not the only oracular source whence I am to learn it. There are the acts of my own State Legislature; there is the public press; there are a thousand other legitimate exponents of public opinion. Looking at these indicia, what do we see? We see that, even by the temporary distribution of the surplus which had accumulated last year, we have thrown an apple of discord among the States. Such is the language of my own State. While, owing to the pressure of circumstances, she has felt herself constrained to accept the deposit of her quota of the surplus, she warns this Government against the repetition of the measure. And what did we hear from the gentleman from Connecticut? (Mr. Niles.) He tells us that he has received letters from many members of his own State Legislature, describing the conflicts in that body, and all terminating with this oburgation: "For God's sake, send us no more surplus." Such has been the effect in all the New England States; and I do say, that the public sentiment of this nation, as expressed by its legitimate organs, echoes the same sentiment. Let us have no more surplus, but bring down the revenue. In yielding to the public sentiment, thus fully expressed, there is no inconsistency with democratic principles, but the contrary.

We are reminded, however, that many of us voted for the distribution bill of the last session. But what were the circumstances? Then we had a large amount of surplus actually in hand. We could not get rid of it. Ought we to have expended it in reckless and anti-republican extravagance, or should it be left in the deposit banks? I then said that it was infinitely better to leave it among the States. I chose this as the lesser evil; I always regarded it as an evil, more as a good; and I resorted to it only as a means of preventing greater evil. Now there is no actual surplus, although I see that if there is not some change in the revenue laws, there is every probability that there will be one. We have adopted two important measures, which, according to the gentleman from Kentucky himself, are well calculated to prevent a surplus. In saying this, I refer to a part of his speech which I was so unfortunate as to lose; I was not in my seat when, I am told, the honorable Senator referred to them. His remarks I shall be happy to notice at another time, though I cannot say that I am at present so well satisfied that he distinctly took the ground which I am bringing to the attention of the tariff, that that reduction was not necessary in order to bring down the revenue, because that had already been done by the land bill.

[Mr. CLAY here explained. What he had said was this: that, if all the measures passed by the Senate should be concurred in by the House, there would probably be no surplus, in which remark he had alluded to the various extravagant measures which had been voted.]

We viewed these measures which the honorable Senator characterizes as extravagant, as connected with each other, and constituting a whole. I shall not enter upon a consideration of them now. The most important, and those which the Senate chiefly relied on to reduce or to prevent a surplus, were the land bill, and the bill to reduce the tariff, (and which, if passed, will reduce it by two and a half millions.) After a long and painful deliberation and debate, we brought those bills into a shape acceptable to the Senate, and they were adopted and passed. They indicated the course of policy approved and sanctioned by this body. But here comes an amendment which is based upon directly opposite principles: an amendment which proceeds upon the assumption that there is to be a surplus, and that it must be distributed among the States. If this is to prevail, both the tariff bill and the land bill are at once superseded. It is in vain for gentlemen to blink the question. That must be the inevitable consequence. But after we are solemnly pledged to the reduction policy, must we at once surrender it out of our profound respect for the other branch of the Legislature? And we must do this lest we incur the odium of aristocracy! The Senator from Kentucky must surely have apprehended the spirit of my remark as to the aristocratic character of this body. He cannot but have understood me as not referring to the character of individuals, but to the genius of this branch of the Government, to the character purposely given to it by the provisions of the Constitution; and I insist that from its structure it does possess this character. I avow that as my sentiment; I repeat it openly; and formidable as the Senator from Kentucky always is, I am ready to discuss it with him. But this is not the time for such a discussion. I should not have said a word but for the pointed reference of the honorable gentleman to myself. I did hear his remarks, and listened to them with profound attention; but, weighty as they were, they would have been far more so had they been supported by his own example.

Mr. CRITTENDEN followed in some remarks, the introductory portion of which could not be heard by the reporter. He expressed strong surprise that gentlemen who had voted for the distribution bill of the last session should declare that they could see no analogy between that law and the present amendment. Not only was there the most perfect analogy between the two, but a perfect identity. The bill of the last session and the amendment now proposed by the House of Representatives were in the very same terms. The subject-matter of both was the same, and they differed only as to the amount, a difference which involved no principle, but was a mere incidental fact, in no way touching the essence of the amendment or affecting its character. So far as the question of constitutional law was concerned, the two were perfectly identical, and all that prevented their identity in all respects was the difference in the amount of money which might be in the Treasury on the 1st of January next from that which had been there on the 1st of January of last year. Could gentlemen find in this difference sufficient ground to change their votes? If it was right to distribute $38,000,000, why was it not right to distribute $10,000,000? The policy which dictated the one equally sanctioned the other. The policy of collecting revenue for the purpose of distributing it was advocated by none; but if a surplus of revenue legitimately collected did occur, how ought it to be disposed of? Ought it to be thrown into the deposit banks to excite the cupidity of these corporations and encourage reckless speculations? Or should it be thrown back into the hands of the people? This was the question which had been decided at the last session. Congress determined in favor of the latter alternative. But because they had restored to the people $38,000,000 of their own money, was it time for Government to indemnify itself by retaining $10,000,000 to meet the fancies or the lusts of those in power?

But the honorable Senator from Virginia was reluctant to throw an apple of discord into the State Legislatures. The return of their own money might be converted into an apple of discord by State politicians, and to the country at large it was the bond of peace and union. How were the States to be agitated by a measure which gave peace to the Union? Ought the Government, in the excess of its patriotism, magnanimity, and tender mercy, to take the people's money out of their hands and relieve them from discord? Should the Government render itself unhappy and discordant in its disinterested desire to save the people from corruption? The people it seemed, were to be fatally corrupted by banding this money, but the Government might be steeped to the lips in the corrupting stream, and still remain purer than snow. To manage the money would occasion the Government no embarrassment whatever, but the poor silly people were unable to bear so weighty a trust, and to them it would prove but an apple of discord.

Another reason urged in opposition to the measure was, that it would inspire the members of the National Legislature with narrow and selfish feelings: each man would be endeavoring to withhold the appropriations necessary to the general good, from a hope of securing a larger share of surplus for his own State. Nothing could be more idle than such an objection. Did not gentlemen perceive that the same argument might be applied to the ordinary duty of appropriations? Was there not the same temptation to withhold the taxes; and might not gentlemen as well argue that the General Government could never go on, because it would be the interest of the representatives to prevent the taxation of their constituents? The argument was precisely the same, and if it was a valid argument, it went to show that the American people were incapable of conducting a free republican Government. His friend who had last addressed the Senate appeared to have serious apprehensions lest his colleague had repeated what were unpopular opinions, and seemed resolved for himself to eschew such a course as the greatest of misfortunes. Mr. C. hoped he would never fall under so heavy a calamity; but unless the people of that gentleman's State had a distaste for money, which did not belong to Mr. C's constituents, it was possible he might find that he had himself incurred the same disaster which he had so earnestly deprecated in the case of Mr. C's colleague. For his own part, he had not seen a single man in his own quarter of the country who at all disapproved of Kentucky taking her share in the distribution of the surplus. Yet he had never understood that the people of that part of the Union were distinguished by an inordinate regard for money. He did not think that in that respect they went very far beyond the people of the North and of the East. He feared, lest some great change had passed upon the character of the gentleman's constituents, that he would find on his return home that they had again relapsed into at least a due estimate of the value of money. He could not but apprehend that the honorable Senator would find it somewhat hard to persuade them that it was better that millions of the public revenue should remain in the Treasury than in their pockets. The honorable Senator, however, did not, he presumed, need any of his admonition; he doubted not that he would be sufficiently careful of his own popularity.

Some of the States, to be sure, had shown themselves very coy in taking their share; but whatever might have been their scruples, and the throes of their conscience, he believed that as yet not one had refused, and, what was more, they would take the same again and again, whenever it might be deemed necessary to disencumber the Treasury.

The Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) had said that it was the policy of the coming Administration to have no surplus. A very proper policy, indeed; and the present amendment would give to the nation ample security that such a policy should be observed. Give them this security, and then the majority would never be found creating a surplus with a view to retain and manage it. There were several ways to prevent a surplus; one was, not to raise more money than was wanted; another method, equally certain, was to make the expenditure come up to the amount of the receipts. Now, the amendment proposed would tend to preserve the economy of this Government. If virtue, as has a thousand times been observed, was the foundation of Republican Government, then a lavish expenditure of public money, by corrupting the virtue of the nation, must have a direct tendency to undermine public virtue, and the amendment, by preventing the accumulation of an extravagant surplus at the disposal of the Government, would contribute so far to the preservation of virtue, and thereby to the safety of our liberties. In every point of view Mr. C. considered the distribution policy as good. Gentlemen had expressed an apprehension that if the experiment of distribution should again be made, the thing would, in a short time, become habitual, and that all previous measures would be calculated with a reference to that end. He had no such apprehensions. It was proposed to distribute only the superfluous and unnecessary revenue; and what better could be done with this, than to give it back to the people? He trusted that none of those who had supported this policy at the last session would oppose it now. The action of the House of Representatives went clearly to show that the people approved of the measure. So forcible had been the pressure of public opinion, that it had broken down all party trammels. Men had revolted from under party discipline, from a wholesome fear of their constituents. As far as his knowledge extended, the public sentiment of the country was all in favor of distribution. There could be no good reason for leaving the surplus in the banks. The Executive had told the Senate that it furnished great means for speculation; and so strong had been his conviction of the evil to be apprehended, that, with a view to prevent it, he had assumed the responsibility of issuing the Treasury order; and yet the Senate was to be deterred from a measure which was legal and legitimate, and which would remedy the evil. This went to show that, after all, the majority of the Senate were in favor of banks and banking. He remembered well when the President, in commencing his attack on the United States Bank, held out to the nation the golden prospect of a specie circulation. It was the cheap purchase of anticipated glory. It rang from Maine to Georgia, and the bank was destroyed. The nation had all been in the most triumphant anticipation of those halcyon days which were to follow; but when the time was actually come, and all the friends of the administration were asked for what they had received, behold, what a multitude of objections were at once interposed. One was afraid that the money would corrupt the people; another that its possession would create interminable discord; another dreaded the danger of the example, and predicted that it would weaken the Government, and make it a mere collector for the States. Thus, after all the promises, and after the first great step had been taken, gentlemen were likely to fall back into the old position, to keep fast hold of the money bags; and when the people remonstrated, to reply by assuring them that they were incapable of managing their money; that it would only corrupt them; and that their wisest course would be to leave it in the pure and incorruptible hands of those who now had the management of it.

PUBLIC LANDS.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

[As reported for the National Intelligencer.]

Senate, Saturday, February 4, 1837.—The bill reported by Mr. WALKER having undergone various modifications, and Mr. WALKER having declared that, in the shape to which it had been reduced the bill could not receive his support, it was about to be rejected; when, in order to give the bill one more chance, a motion was made to recommit to the Committee on Public Lands, that it might by them be reported to the Senate in a more acceptable form. On this motion

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate. I sincerely hope that the motion for recommitment will not prevail. The session is now far advanced; but a single month more remains, and this bill has already occupied more than its due share of the time and attention of the Senate. The discussion which it has undergone has shown that there exists in this body a great diversity of opinion, not on the details only, but on the principle of the bill. A large portion of the Senate are under the impression that nothing ought to be done; and among the residue who are in favor of some bill, the differences of opinion seem to be irreconcilable. If we recommit the bill, the inevitable consequence will be that we shall have a new set of propositions to amend it, and a vast deal of time will be wasted in vain attempts to reconcile things essentially irreconcilable. For myself, I believe the bill to be radically wrong; and that no modifications which it is likely to assume can ever render it right. I had intended to say something on the general subject, but it is now late, and I forego much of what it was my purpose to have submitted to the Senate. I will, however, as briefly as possible, throw out one or two leading views in regard to it.

The professed object of this bill is to restrict the sales of the public land; to put down speculation, and to prevent the accumulation of a surplus revenue. Plausible objects, I admit, and such as sound well to the ear; but the practical operation of the bill which promises them will, as I apprehend, lead to results very different indeed. So many and so subtle are the means by which those in power are able to fleece the community without the people themselves being sensible of it, that the contemplation of it is almost enough to make any lover of his country despair. I have long been sensible of this; but if I was called upon to select an instance which more than others forcibly illustrates the truth of the remark, I would refer any one who doubted to the present bill. When we closely examine its provisions, we shall perceive that, so far from repressing, its effect will be to secure and consummate the most enormous speculation which has ever been witnessed on this continent. This speculation has been produced by those in power, and the large profits they hope to realize are to be consummated by the passage of this bill. The chairman of the committee himself has told the Senate that a body of the public lands, greater in extent than the largest State in the Union, has been seized upon by speculators. The Senator from Georgia (Mr. King) states the amount at from thirty to forty millions of dollars. This may be an over-estimate, but at the lowest calculation the amount cannot be less than twenty-five millions. What has produced this vast investment? What has thus suddenly rendered the public lands an object of such enormous speculation? What but the state of the currency? Our circulating medium has nearly doubled within the space of three years. It has increased from an average of six dollars and a half per head, to an average of ten dollars. And what has been the natural and the inevitable effect? The rise in the price of every thing, the price of which is not kept down by some legal provision; the price of provisions and of labor has nearly doubled, while the price of land has continued fixed by force of law. Is it, then, any thing wonderful that land under this restraint should have become an object of speculation? There lies the root of the evil. This enormous augmentation of the circulating medium has filled all the channels of ordinary business to repletion, and the overflow finds an outlet in speculation. But who have been the authors of this state of things? Every Senator can answer the question. Every body knows that it has been the work of those in power. They began the experiment in 1833. They were distinctly told what would be the result. They were warned that bank capital would increase, and with it the circulation of paper money; but in the face of all argument and all warning, the experiment went on. The only existing check which had power to control the excessive issue of bank paper was put down. The deposits of the public money were transferred from where the laws had put them, and placed in deposit banks arbitrarily selected at the will of the Executive. The authors of the present state of things are the very men who come here and propose to us this bill as a remedy. These two facts should be put together, and should be kept together in the mind of every Senator who will form a right judgment in this matter. The removal of the deposits was the first step. We are now come to the second step in the process. The men who accomplished the first have already profited by it politically, and, if rumor speaks true, in other ways also. Does any man here entertain a doubt that high officers of Government have used those deposits as instruments of speculation in the public lands? Is not the fact notorious? Is not one in the immediate neighborhood of the Executive among those the most deeply concerned? Will this be denied? Is it not well known that several officers in the Departments purchased lands to sell on speculation, with the funds officially under their own control? How the same combination of persons profited politically by the same movement, I shall show hereafter.

Assuming, then, what cannot be denied, that the excessive increase of the circulating medium produced by the experiment is the main cause of these speculations in the public land, and assuming, on the authority of universal rumor, that high functionaries of the Government have availed themselves of the state of things thus produced, I come now to what is my main proposition, namely, that this bill is calculated to consummate these plans of speculation, and that without this measure, or something equivalent to it, they must end in loss.

[Here some explanation took place between Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. WALKER, as to the statements made in the latter in reference to the probable effect of the rejection of this bill.]

Well, sir, be it as the honorable chairman states. He says now, that if this bill shall not become a law, the purchases of the public land will continue to go on as they have done for the last year. Admit it, and what must be the consequence? Cannot all men perceive that in this, as in all other cases, orer supply must operate to reduce the price? The honorable chairman tells us that the amount of land required for fair and honest settlement, by the progress of the country, is five millions of acres annually; and that the amount taken upon speculation last year was thirty millions. If so, then there is already in the hands of the speculators a six years' supply. Should all the land offices be closed to-morrow, the amount those speculators hold would not be absorbed by the regular demands of the country in less than six years. Now, the greater part of these large purchases have been made upon loans; the interest is running on; and unless the sales shall be in proportion, do not all men see that the accumulation of unproductive land upon their hands must infallibly ruin those who are engaged in such speculations? Under such circumstances, the help of legislation is the only thing that can relieve them. I repeat it. This bill, or something like it, is indispensable. It puts a finish to the work. The land offices being left open, and no obstructions being thrown in the way of the purchase for settlement, we may suppose that one-half of the five millions annually required will be purchased from the Government. There will then remain but two and a half millions to take off the thirty millions stock which the speculators already hold; and at this rate it must be twelve years before that stock can be disposed of; and if the stock is to be augmented by new and large purchases during the present year, the speculation must end in inevitable ruin. The thing is plain; it cannot be denied; it admits of no demonstration.

What, then, is resorted to, to prevent this disastrous catastrophe? The answer is found in the details of this bill. And I entirely concur with the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Davis) in pronouncing them most odious in their character. No American citizen is to be left free to purchase a portion of the public domain, the property of the whole people of the United States, without a license. Yes, before he can buy the land which his own Government has offered for sale, he must first take out a license! Odious as I hold all licenses upon the press or licenses upon trade, I hold this to be fully as odious as either. A license to purchase the public lands! I cannot buy myself a farm, though I have the money in my pocket, till I pay a dollar and a quarter per acre for a license, and then I do not get a title until I have complied with the most onerous conditions; and if, after I have paid my money, I see reason to change my mind, I cannot leave the land without forfeiting all I have paid, if I find the situation to be sickly. I cannot remain there without risking the lives of my family; I cannot sell it to one more accustomed to the climate, without incurring the pain of perjury as a speculator; nor can I remove without forfeiting the purchase money. But supposing the settler remains, he is required to consummate his title, not in a court of law or before a judicial officer, but before the register and receiver of the district. I do not know how Senators from the new States may feel, but I know that, nothing under Heaven shall induce me to place Carolinians in such circumstances. The registers and receivers of a land office to be judges in matters of real estate! Why, sir, these persons, for the most part, are political partisans. They have obtained their offices as a reward for services rendered at the election. Has not the doctrine of the spoils been openly avowed on this floor? Has it not been unblushingly maintained that the party which obtains a political victory has, as a thing of course, a right to all the offices of the State, and to the public money into the bargain, so that they may control it entirely for their own benefit? I have a right, therefore, to assume, that, as a general thing, these registers and receivers will be political partisans. What, then, will be the condition of a large portion of our citizens? Allowing the consumption of public lands to be two and a half millions of acres a year, you will have about a hundred thousand voters, the title to whose earthly all will be in the hands of these registers and receivers. Can any thing be conceived more odious? Would the license of the press itself be a measure more hateful or dangerous? Sir, we have spent too much time in considering so monstrous a proposition. I hope we shall not waste upon it another moment.

But putting the political effects of this bill out of view, let us inquire what will be its moral influence. The Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) told us that he considered the price of public land as already too high, and that he was averse to placing it still higher. Sir, these were his words; but let us look at the face of the bill; its practical effect will be an enormous increase in the price to be paid for the public domain. I put to any man of sound common sense whether he had not rather give two dollars an acre at once for his farm, and get a good title for his land without farther difficulty? I would, most certainly. Consider the terms on which he must buy: the moment he enters his land under this bill, it becomes subject to State taxation; but if he buys from the speculators, it will not be so. The entire mass of land purchased last year, and including some of the best parts of the public domain, is now held for sale free of taxation, while land purchased from the Government must immediately be taxed. What chance will the United States lands have against such a competition? None at all: the speculators will have the complete monopoly. This, then, is a question between the Government and the speculators. Our stock is one hundred and twenty millions, theirs is thirty millions; our land is at a dollar and a quarter, theirs is not less than three dollars, and here is a fair competition. But this bill comes in and throws the market into the hands of the speculators. In any other than these extraordinary times, one would suppose that these objections must be fatal to any bill. It is most obvious that unless you throw restrictions round the purchase of land from the United States, the object of the speculators must be defeated.

But we are asked, what is to be done with all this speculation? I answer, let it alone, and it will run down of itself. The times will react—the present state of things is artificial—it cannot possibly continue. Speculation, after it has run its course, will run down, and that with far less injury than will result from any attempt to put it down by legislation. If, however, you do legislate, there are many expedients besides that proposed in this bill. In the first place, you may raise the price of the public lands. This, to be sure, will confer a great benefit on those who have already purchased; but it will check future speculation. I have, however, no idea that any such measure will be resorted to—it would be very unpopular—and the object which gentlemen have in view must be secured without the loss of personal popularity. Then, in the second place, you may shut the land offices. This expedient, however, would be liable to the same objections with the other, for you can hit upon none which will not either be inoperative also either, or of great advantage to those who have already purchased. My opinion, in regard to the public lands, has undergone a great change in the course of this debate. I thought there was a majority in this Senate who would resolutely object to all rash changes in our land system. I hoped, most confidently, that New England at least would have stood fast. I have been disappointed. I hoped that the public lands would not be drawn into our political contests. But in this, too, I have been entirely disappointed. I see that the era has arrived when our large capitalists are in a fair way to seize upon the whole body of the public lands. This has compelled a great change to take place in my mind. I greatly fear that we have reached the time when the public domain is lost to the Government for all useful purposes. We may, indeed, receive some amount of revenue from it, but it will be accompanied with such agitations, and so much trouble and political corruption, that the gain will not compensate for the evil incurred. I have made up my mind, if a fair concession can be made, to concede the whole to the new States on some fixed and well considered condition. I am for transferring the whole, on the condition that they shall pay us a certain per cent. of the proceeds, and submit to the necessary limitations as to the mode of bringing the lands into the market. The present system of sale not to be disturbed for some years, and after that the principle of graduation to be prudently introduced. I have always felt the force of the argument that the new States are not now placed upon an equal footing with the other members of the Confederacy. They are full of our land officers and of public officers under your control; and in regard to the soil within their limits, they sustain to us a relation which must ever be productive of discontent and agitation. Whether a thing of this kind can safely be done, I do not know; but of this I am fully persuaded, that such a measure would be infinitely better than the scheme proposed in this bill. The Chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands has avowed his own earnest belief that the evils of the existing state of things are such that even a bill like this should be resorted to as a preferable alternative. He considers a surplus in the Treasury as a great evil; (and so do I, too, if it is to be permanent.) And his dread of a surplus is so great that it has prevented him from regarding the details of this bill as I am persuaded he would have done, but for the bias thus produced.

With these views, I conclude by expressing my hope that the bill will not be recommitment, but that we shall either reject it, or suffer it to sleep by laying it upon the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE SURPLUS.

REMARKS OF MR. ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 21, 1837.—On Mr. BELL's proposition to distribute the surplus in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1838.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he was, in general, much opposed to the addition of new clauses to an appropriation bill after it had been matured by the proper committee, particularly such as introduced matters unconnected with the main objects of the bill. This mode of legislation often left no alternative but to adopt a questionable or improper principle, or reject appropriations essential to the public service. But, in the present instance, he should overcome his repugnance, and vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell.) That amendment, it was true, involved a very important principle; but it had undergone a full discussion; indeed, it had occupied the attention of the country for years past, and had received the deliberate consideration and sanction of Congress at the last session. He presumed, therefore, that every gentleman was prepared to vote upon it.

Having formerly expressed my views (said Mr. R.) on the propriety of distributing the surplus revenue, I should not now have risen to say a word on the subject, but for the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, (Mr. Cray.) That gentleman opposes a distribution, if I understand him correctly, upon the ground that his State has contributed more than her just proportion towards the revenue, and that any distribution, therefore, by the ratio of representation, or of actual population, would do her great injustice. How is this, sir? Upon what principle is it assumed that Michigan has paid so much more than her due proportion into the public Treasury, as to be unwilling to receive her proportional part of the surplus? Are we to understand that the gentleman considers the price paid by the people of Michigan for the public lands they have purchased as money levied in the way of a tax? Then, sir, I deny the justice of the pretension. The people of the new States have, by no means, been exclusively the purchasers of the public domain lying within their respective limits. It has been purchased, and is still owned, to a considerable extent, by the citizens of the old States, New York, Virginia, and the rest. But suppose this were not so. Is the ground to be taken that the price of the public lands is to be regarded as a forced contribution to the revenue? Have not the purchasers obtained a full equivalent for what they have paid, as much as if they had purchased from private proprietors? Nay, sir, as is suggested near me, have they not, on an average, realized double and treble the amount of their investments? Will they surrender their purchases? Or will they set up a title both to the land and the money? No, sir, I am well persuaded no gentleman here will advocate so monstrous an injustice. The old States freely gave up, for the sake of harmony, a princely territory, upon the condition simply of participating, according to a stipulated ratio, in the benefits to arise from it. They have shown in this that they were capable of a generous sacrifice for the public good. But they can never acquiesce in an open and flagrant violation of their rights. Nor can their representatives, should such an attempt be made, sit here with their arms folded, and see those rights wrested from them by force or fraud. It would really seem as if this Government had forgotten the nature of their tenure, and meant to disprize the title under which alone they acquired and held possession of that portion at least of the public domain surrounded by the States. We constantly hear of schemes to reduce the price below the fair market value; to yield them up to those who have lawlessly entered upon them; to make even an unconditional surrender of them to the States within which they lie. There is not one of these schemes that does not violate the compact under which they are held by the United States. Let me, sir, at least remind you of the terms of the grant made by the State I have the honor to represent.

After dedicating certain portions for specific objects, among others for compensating her revolutionary soldiers, whose valor had defended them, it explicitly declares that the whole residue shall constitute a common fund, for the benefit of all the States, Virginia inclusive, in proportion to their contributions to the public expenditure. Upon these terms alone was the surrender made and accepted; and so long as the proceeds have been required to meet the public exigencies, all the States have enjoyed the benefits contemplated by the deeds of cession. But for some years past the increased demand for lands, arising from the rapid settlement of the new States, and an inordinate spirit of speculation, in connection with the operation of the tariff, have poured into the Treasury a redundant revenue, which the most extravagant appropriations have not sufficed to consume. It was in this state of things that Congress, during the last session, felt itself imperiously called on to make some disposition of the immense and accumulating surplus in the Treasury among the several States. The ratio adopted may not have done exact justice to each, the new States particularly, owing to the rapid increase of their population since the last census, have not received the proportion to which the ratio of federal numbers, as prescribed by the Constitution, would perhaps entitle them. But still it was a beneficent measure, checking, as it did, the wasteful extravagance of this Government, and restoring to the people what justly belonged to them; and so long as from the same sources—the proceeds of sales of the public property, or the exortions of an unjust tariff—a revenue shall be collected more than adequate to the reasonable wants of the Government, so long will I continue to vote for restoring the surplus to its lawful owners. I need not the outcry raised about the corrupting effects of such a measure. The Government of the United States is a mere trustee, and the States, so far at least as respects the proceeds of the lands they ceded, are no more liable to be corrupted from receiving what is due to them from the United States, than if it were due from France or England. They solicit no favor; they demand only what belongs to them. They insist only upon the performance of the trust this Government has assumed, and which it would be coerced to perform, could the question be brought before any impartial judicial tribunal. It would not be endured for a moment that this trustee should withhold property from its rightful owners, upon the plea that it would corrupt them to receive it. There is vastly more danger in leaving the funds here, than in distributing them among the States. There it may, and I trust will, be applied to the most beneficial purposes, instead of being expended in a partial system of internal improvement, or corruptly wasted, used through the banks or otherwise in political jobs. To my own State, especially, which has paid so much towards the public revenue, and except in this mode of distribution has received so little from it, I should hope for important benefits. Deprived as she is of her population and wealth by a constant emigration to the West, and suffering under the infliction of a protective tariff, the public lands present resources which, judiciously managed, may, for many years, reinvigorate her industry, enable her to carry on the local improvements in which she is now extensively embarked, and provide yet more liberally for the education of her youth. So far from looking with apprehension at the two or three millions poured into her treasury under the act of the last session, I should rejoice if from the sales of the public domain, of which she ceded so large a portion, she could for a century to come annually receive an equal amount. Whatever may be thought of distributing the general revenue, the old States which surrendered their lands, none can doubt, have a perfect right to participate in all the advantages resulting from them. They were ceded by them on the express condition of such participation. The new States, at least, the recipients of their bounty, who have been admitted by them to partake of this common stock without contributing to it, will be among the last, I should hope, who will ever deny their claim. It is one of sheer justice. Did I not think it so, I would not urge it; for it is my pride to represent a State which would disdain to ask or to accept more than her due.

REMARKS OF MR. ROBERTSON,

ON THE SAME PROPOSITION.

Saturday, February 25, 1837.

MR. ROBERTSON said he would not be so unreasonable as to detain the House at that late hour. He rose merely to make his acknowledgments to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Vanderpoel,) who had so kindly undertaken to represent the State of Virginia. The gentleman had only followed the example of the State from whence he came, in taking the old Commonwealth under his especial protection; and as one of her representatives, (said Mr. R.) I feel myself bound, with all due humility, to acknowledge the favor. Those whom she has confided in to represent her, it seems, have mistaken her interest, and their own duty. We have been outwitted, the gentleman tells us; gulled by a yankee trick into the support of a measure which will fasten upon our constituents the present ruinous tariff. The northern gentlemen very consistently urge a distribution of the surplus, in order (says the gentleman from New York) to prevent the success of any plan for reducing the revenue and diminishing the high rate of duties, and we of the South, who vote with them are the dupes of their superior cunning. Sir, the gentleman himself is entitled to great credit for his own wonderful acuteness, which enables him so clearly to see through the designs of these very sagacious politicians; and it is kind in him to apprise us of our danger. I should like to have heard him assign the reasons why New York, some years past, so much in favor of distributing the surplus, is now so decidedly opposed to it. The true reason might perhaps be found to be that, having always a very large share of the public funds, she gains more by keeping what she has than by coming into a fair division. But without attempting to account for the motives which influence others, I will very frankly tell the gentleman the reasons that induce me to vote for a distribution. Sir, it is with no view, as he would insinuate, of keeping up the present tariff, but with a view to counteract it. It is to be endured, that the gentleman from New York, who belongs to the dominant majority—to that party which professes so strong an interest for the South, and so much hostility to this tariff—should tam: Southern gentlemen of the minority with a design to co-operate with the North in keeping it up! If he and his party are sincere in their professions, why have they, who wield the whole power of legislation, permitted the South so long to be plundered by this unjust system of taxation? Why suffer it to oppress us for a day, when they have the power at any moment to repeal it? Why has the scheme of reduction proposed during the present session, been permitted, until this late day, to slumber upon the table?

Sir, it is because we have no confidence in their professions that we are compelled to take the only means left us for redress, by restoring to the people of the South what this democratic majority continues to exact from them. It is this consideration, the conviction that the surplus revenue, whether derived from the sales of the public property or from the operation of an oppressive and constitutional tariff, belongs to the people, and would be worse than wasted by being left to the disposal of this Government, that induced me to support the proposition last year for distributing it. Upon the same principles, until the ruling party shall reduce the tariff, or take some effectual method for limiting the revenues to the just wants of the Government, I will vote for a distribution; I call it a distribution, because in truth no one expects a dollar will ever be called for by this Government. Only consider, sir, what would have been our present condition had the act of the last session not been passed. We found in the Treasury, on the first day of January last, an unexpended balance of about fourteen millions remaining of the sums appropriated for the service of the last year; about six millions more, it is thought, remained unexpended in the safe-keeping of the disbursing officers. We distributed among States about thirty-seven millions, making altogether, about fifty-seven millions; add to this the estimated amount of receipts into the Treasury during the current year, and you would have had an aggregate sum of ninety or one hundred millions of dollars, perhaps even more, to be disposed of at the present session. What, sir, should we have done with it? We appropriated last year about twenty millions more than could be expended. Should we have been called upon still to increase our extravagant and enormous appropriations to accumulate still larger balances? Yes, sir, and then we should have applied all that could not be wasted in useless fortifications, splendid custom-houses, high salaries, and corrupt jobs of every sort to carry on an unjust system of internal improvements in the northern and western States from which the southern people would, as usual, have derived little or no benefit. Sir, it is true, as the gentleman from New York says, the people of the South have been gulled; they have been gulled with promises of retrenchment long enough while suffering from the oppressive exactions of this Government, and have at length, I trust, awakened to a proper sense of their rights and of their interest.

A word, sir, in conclusion, on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann,) before me, proposing a distribution among the States on the ratio of their representation on this floor. I had intended to vote for that amendment, but further reflection has brought me to a different determination. It does not adopt, any more than the provisions of the deposit act which the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell,) has preferred, the ratio prescribed by the Constitution. That ratio, the ratio of federal numbers, as it is called, is impracticable at this time to apply; and though some of the States, particularly the smaller ones, get under the deposit act more than their just proportion, and some consequently less, the standard proposed by the gentleman from New York would, I am inclined to think, rather increase than lessen the inequality. The new States at least would be seriously injured by the change; and as exact justice cannot be administered to all by either plan, I am willing to adopt that which most nearly approaches it, and which is likely to give the most general satisfaction.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOON, OF KENTUCKY,

In House of Representatives, February 7, 1837.—On the resolution proposing to censure Mr. ADAMS.

The resolution proposes to censure the member from Massachusetts, for his conduct in this House in reference to a petition purporting to be from slaves. It is, therefore, in the first place, necessary to inquire what his conduct has been. I will state, sir, my understanding of it. The part which that gentleman has taken at the last and present session of Congress, in regard to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, is well known to have been most extraordinary. It should be noted that at the last session, the gentleman, in a speech which he made and published, declared his opinion to be, that Congress had not only the power to abolish slavery in this District, but that it had the power, under the Constitution, to abolish slavery in the States. This was the first, and, as far as Mr. C. was informed, the only instance in which such a power had been claimed for Congress by any person, in any part of this Union. The consequence of publishing this opinion and claim of power from a person so distinguished, had been to increase to an alarming extent the efforts for abolition. And now, sir, we find it followed up by the gentleman, and attempted to be acted upon by legislative action upon it.

In regard to the right of petition, he would say that, in most countries, it was invaluable to the subject. It was the only mode in which the subject could reach the throne. But how is it in this country, where we have neither a throne nor a subject? Here, sir, the power is in the hands of the people. Ours is a representative Government, in which the people most usually exert their power at the ballot box; they certainly have the right of petition in its most enlarged sense; they have more; they have the right of "instruction;" this right, however, is confined to the free white population of the country, in exclusion to slaves. It had always been so considered under our colonial existence, under the articles of confederation, and under the Constitution, from its adoption to the present time. The history of the colonies may be examined, and no case can be found where the right of petition for any purpose was claimed for, or attempted to be exercised by, slaves. The Constitution of the United States does not alter the rule which had prevailed in regard to the right of petition; it declares that Congress shall pass no law to abridge it; it exists under the Constitution as it existed before, and is not enlarged by that instrument. The Constitution of the United States, so far from weakening the right of the owner to his slaves, does expressly acknowledge that right, by making slavery, to a certain extent, the basis of representation and of taxation.

The Constitution leaves the question of slavery as a mere domestic question for the States. Congress has no power over it, none whatever: certainly none, so far as the States are concerned; and, in my judgment, none, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned. My colleague (Mr. Graves) and myself differ in regard to the power of Congress to abolish slavery in this District. He has very truly said that very distinguished individuals in all parts of the United States concur with him in his views upon this question. I am not, upon this or any other question, to be influenced by distinguished names. I am happy to know that I do not stand alone in my views upon this subject in Kentucky; so far from it, it is a fact, that the Legislature of Kentucky at their last session did, by an almost unanimous vote, declare that Congress had no power over the subject in the District of Columbia. That Legislature did, moreover, instruct the Senators and request the Representatives from that State to oppose all attempts at abolition in this District. Others may do as they please; but concurring, as I do most heartily, in the doctrines of the Kentucky resolutions, I shall use all my efforts to carry them into effect. Without intending, on the present occasion, to discuss at length the reasons upon which I deny the power to Congress to abolish slavery in this District, I will beg leave to remark, that the relation of representative and constituent does not exist between the people of this District and Congress; we are not their representatives, and the rule which applies in the States, that what the people do through their representatives they do by themselves, does not apply here. I acknowledge that the grant of legislative power to Congress over the District is in very comprehensive terms. But still, it is to be considered that the power in this, as in every other case from the beginning of time, has been conferred for the protection, and not for the destruction, of the rights of property. Amongst the most valuable of human rights, is that of being secure in property; and it is a perversion of every principle, which in all countries should be held sacred, to use a power designed to protect the right of property for its destruction. When the Constitution was formed, slavery existed in this District; it was known to the Convention, and acknowledged rightfully to exist by the Constitution; and I contend boldly, that to use a power intended to protect, so as to destroy the thing designed to be protected, is a violation of principles sanctioned by all ages, and of more force than the Constitution itself.

But it is contended by my colleague (Mr. Graves) that we cannot censure the member from Massachusetts without violating that provision of the Constitution which secures the freedom of debate in this House. Sir, I do not think so. The freedom of debate is secured to the members of this House in the same manner that the freedom of speech is secured to the citizens of this country; it is a right which may be abused in both cases. The tribunals for punishing an abuse of this right are different—the House may punish a member, the courts may fine a citizen. Sir, (said Mr. Calhoun,) I am as much in favor of preserving the liberty of speech to the citizen, and the freedom of debate to the members of this House, as any man, anywhere; but still, as a judge, I would fine a citizen for blasphemy or profane cursing and swearing; and as a representative, I would censure a member for acts and words, or for either acts or words, which I believe are calculated to lead to insurrection in the slave States of the Union. I take the gentleman's act of receiving a petition from slaves, and officially asking a question of the Speaker, with a view to legislative action upon it, coupled with his speech, as evidence that he is in correspondence with the slaves of this country to an extent which calls for the rebuke and censure of this House. I shall therefore vote for the resolution, but I shall do so more in pity than in malice. My course towards that gentleman will relieve me from the imputation of improper motives.

FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF MR. GRAVES, OF KENTUCKY.

[As reported by the National Intelligencer.]

In the House of Representatives, February 1, 1837.—The motion submitted by Mr. BELL, for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections, being under consideration—

MR. GRAVES addressed the House as follows: MR. SPEAKER: The highly distinguished gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Bell) whom it is my lot to follow, in the speech with which he has just favored the House, in support of his motion for leave to introduce this bill, has not only shown a degree of research and preparation highly creditable to himself, and very edifying to the House, but has displayed a high order of ability, to which it is the fortune of but few ever to attain. And I am not unapprized that it is bad taste for me to follow in this debate, with the crude remarks which I propose to submit. I had not determined to say a single word, until just before the honorable gentleman concluded his remarks; and I shall have to rely mainly on the impulse of the moment or what I may chance to say.

It would be premature at this stage of the bill to discuss its details. I will not undertake to say they are perfect, or wherein they might be amended, at this time. I do not stand committed for or against any single provision as it now stands, and shall be happy to see adopted as many amendments as are calculated more perfectly to secure the great objects of the bill. This is a very important subject, and I grant you it is as delicate as it is important; and I hope, at the proper stage, the details of this bill will be investigated and scrutinized with all that care and attention which the solemn importance of the subject so imperiously demands. For the present, I shall only attempt to demonstrate, that the ruinous evils enumerated in the preamble of the bill do exist in a degree that threatens the overthrow of our free institutions; and briefly to urge upon the House the most obvious necessity of immediate and efficient action upon the subject.

Wherever the principles of civil liberty have been well understood, this has been thought a subject of the most vital importance; and the severest penalties have been provided against officers of Government bringing to bear any sort of influence upon elections. Whenever the right of electing law-makers has been well secured to the citizen, that right has been protected and guarded by legislative enactments, so as to render the choice of the people at the polls free from all official control. For nothing could be a greater absurdity for a Government to guaranty to its citizens the right to vote in choosing their rulers, and countenance the interference of any power whatever which is calculated in any degree to interfere with or infringe upon the free exercise of that right. In Great Britain, the country from which we derive many of our notions of free government, where but one of the three departments of the law-making power is elective, the most effective safeguards are thrown around the citizen at the polls, so as to render him as perfectly free as it is possible to render him. As early as 1691 that Government was seen providing heavy penalties against officers of Government attempting to exercise influence in elections. And the same course of legislation has been followed up by Parliament to the year 1809, when the fine for such interference was increased to £500, and many other disqualifications.

In 1801 the attention of Mr. Jefferson was called to this subject, and in a letter to Governor McKean he uses the following language: "One thing I will say as to the future interference with elections, whether of State or General Government, by officers of the latter should be deemed cause of removal, because the constitutional remedy by the elective franchise becomes nothing if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the Federal Government." If the patronage of the Federal Government was so enormous in 1801, when its annual expenses were comparatively small, as to set at naught the elective franchise, how great must be the danger now that the annual expenses are between 30,000,000 and $10,000,000, and the number of Federal officers multiplied in about the same proportion.

Again, in 1829, the attention of this nation was called to this subject, in the most solemn manner, by General Jackson in his first inaugural address, in which he employs the following language: "The recent demonstrations of public sentiment inscribed on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; which will require, particularly, the correction of abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections." Anterior to this period we had six administrations, embracing a period of just forty years; and from what I understand to be an authentic account, I have learned during that period but seventy-four officers were turned out of office; of which number nine instances, I think, occurred in the administration which immediately preceded that of General Jackson. And although this nation has no evidence that a single one of those seventy-four officers was turned out for opinion sake, yet General Jackson, apprehending that such might have been the case, and looking upon such an exercise of power with all that horror which it is calculated so naturally to excite in the bosom of every patriot, deemed it his duty to bring the subject before the country in this solemn form. This was the precept of President Jackson when first elected; but, incredible to tell, in the first term of his administration he hurled from office between nine hundred and one thousand officers; and from that time up to this, his course upon this subject has been onward, crushing, as it were, every thing like the freedom of elections with the one hundred thousand officers under his control. He, by the exercise of this power, not only makes the officers slaves to his power, but also constitutes them so many efficient instruments in his hands to bring to bear the fullest extent of their influence upon all over whom they can exercise any control, at the risk of being proscribed and hurled from office. Sir, to witness the deleterious and demoralizing effects of this practice is humiliating in the extreme, and threatens the most disastrous consequences to the country. Whether we live in the East, the West, the North, or the South, we need only to look around in the vicinity of our own residence, and we see daily this influence of federal officers brought to bear on the freedom of our elections. In every county caucus, or State or national convention, we see the office-holders not only the prime movers, but most generally themselves constituting two-thirds of the conventions. I will instance a single case of the great democratic State Convention in Ohio, which assembled at Columbus on the 8th of January, 1834, for the purpose, amongst other party services, to nominate delegates to the Baltimore Convention; then, from a published account of the names of the different officers and of the offices they respectively filled, it appears, of the one hundred and seventeen members attending, one hundred and six were officers; and out of the nineteen congressional committees appointed by that convention for the State of Ohio, consisting of fifty-two members, thirty were office-holders. I have no doubt, if the subject were looked into, quite as large a proportion of office-holders would be found in the numberless public meetings of this sort, which we constantly witness in the various other sections of this country.

Now, when it is recollected that more than one-twentieth of all our voters are, in effect, office-holders of the Federal Government, either directly or indirectly, upon the supposition that there are 100,000 office-holders, which includes, I suppose, all persons receiving a direct emolument from the Government, we may readily have a view of the tremendous power which a President may wield by executive power; having upon an average throughout the country, in every twenty voters, one who is dependent on him for the bread upon which his wife and children have to depend for subsistence, and who knows the only reliance for the continued favor of his Government is his unceasing party services. Sir, under the practical operation of the present party discipline, the President has not only all the office-holders complete slaves to his power, but he also controls rather an indirect, but still a very powerful influence over all the relations and friends of the office-holder; and he exercises, if possible, a still more powerful influence by operating upon the hopes of the numberless hungry applicants for office, outnumbering, by two or three-fold, in all probability, the whole number of offices. In Great Britain a number equal to one-seventh part of all the voters in the kingdom hold office, in consequence of which it was seen that a corrupt and profligate King, holding the appointments to and removing from office in his own hands, might exercise a power over the vote of the citizen inconsistent with liberty. To remedy this crying evil, every lover of liberty in the kingdom set about the work of reform, not by words but acts, and provided a most effectual remedy, which, as was shown by the honorable member from Tennessee, at one sweep disfranchised office-holders to the number of forty thousand, exceeding one-seventh, as I remarked, of the entire voting population of the kingdom. And such were the indignant murmurs in Parliament from all sides, both whigs and tories, when Lord North intimated that he could not perceive the impropriety of a Government officer exercising his personal influence in elections, that the distinguished Lord could scarcely proceed with his remarks.

Sir, I profess myself to be a Jeffersonian democrat; I am for depriving no free white citizen of a vote; I look upon it as a most sacred prerogative, but I am not for extending it to slaves, for the suffrage of a slave would only be the reflected will of his master. Extend to such a population this high privilege, and you thereby only increase the votes of the master to the full number of slaves under his power. At this my democracy revolts; I hold that the poorest and humblest peasant at the ballot box should have the same number of votes and the same power as that of the most potent nabob in the land. The great beauty in our system is, that all men have equal privileges, and if equally honest should be equally esteemed. But unwilling as I am to restrict the right of suffrage, I unhesitatingly go either for making the whole corps of official slaves free, or divest them of free suffrage, because it can do them no good, and, under the control of a bad master, may do the country much harm.

Sir, whether useful legislation shall grow out of this subject at this session or not, I for one am resolved to stir the subject, and hatched as it may seem, as long as I retain my station here, be the consequences what they may, I will never cease my efforts, humble and unavailing as they may prove, until some remedy shall be provided. For unless a change can be wrought from the present state of things, by which one man, by the money and patronage of the Government, controls a half million of voters, this Government has no charms for me. I may have in my nature the elements of a tyrant, but, thank God, not of a slave. Sir, I am opposed to proscription for opinion's sake, under any aspect in which the subject can be presented, and against the slavish principle I swear eternal hatred, and wage an interminable war.

No candid man, unless shamefully ignorant of the history of the times, can deny that, in this the only entirely free form of government on earth, hundreds of thousands of the free born citizens are enslaved in the most inexorable bondage by the patronage and money of the Government.

It is the duty of every patriot to stand by his country in this hour of trial, and call men and things by their proper names. I denounce that man as an enemy to his country and its Constitution, let him be high or low, in or out of station, who will either himself practice, or sanction in others the punishment, by means of Government power, of the citizen for voting at the polls according to his own free choice.

Cassair, give me money, and I will buy men; give me men, and I will conquer the world: he verified, to the entire satisfaction of the world: this declaration. In his day, when there was less light in the world, he bought men with money, and conquered with his men in the bloody field of battle. In our day, men are bought with money, and their masters conquer through the ballot-box. This new pass to conquest I am for barring against every slave, and throwing open to every freeman.

General Jackson, in his veto to the land bill, said "money is power;" this he declared to the world as his opinion, and I believe it is about the only political opinion which he has not changed. In this he seems to have an abiding confidence; and he has not only given a practical illustration of his belief in this opinion, but, in the late canvass for the Presidency, he has constrained all to admit its truth.

General Jackson, in his letter to Mr. Monroe, upon his elevation to the Presidency, said to him: "Now is the time to exterminate that monster called party spirit." Would to God, sir, that he would now say to his commanding majority in both Houses, exterminate this monster, liberate the hundred thousand whom executive patronage and power have bound down in chains.

Slavery begets meanness. Who has not beheld, for the last eight years, with grief and mortification, the standard of public morals lowering its once lofty top, until it is now prostrate in the dust? Who has not seen truth, and virtue, and patriotism all that is beautiful and lovely in the land, sinking, decaying, dying, beneath the onward and blighting power of proscription?

It appears from a slip which I cut from a newspaper, which purports to present an official return from all the States, that a change of five hundred and ninety votes would have changed the result of the late Presidential election in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. The federal officers in those States would much exceed this number; and, if so, Mr. Van Buren surely did not receive the votes of a majority of the free voters of those States. And can any gentleman seriously contend that persons holding office, and consequently under so much terror of the Executive of these United States, were independent voters in the late Presidential election?

I do not deny but that some of the subordinate officers of the Government are of the opposition, but I hesitate not to give it as the result of my deliberate opinion, that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the offices worth having are held by friends of the administration, unless under peculiar circumstances, such as in some instances I have known, and many I have heard of, where the incumbent was required to vote for the Government candidate, and allowed the poor privilege of returning the name of a member of the opposition. There are many little cross-road post offices, where the emoluments are literally nothing, and where there resides but one family; and in such cases, I suppose, an opposition man is occasionally appointed to an office.

Gentlemen have solemnly asserted on this floor that a majority, yea, I think the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Lane) said, the other day, a large majority, of the office-holders under this administration, are opposed to it, and cited, as a proof of the assertion, that even here, in this District, a large majority of the clerks are in the opposition. Sir, I regret to hear such assertions made here, because I feel myself constrained to assert, in my place, that he who ventures such an assertion, says that which, in the very nature of the case, it is impossible he could know to be true; for I will venture my existence, that not a member on this floor knows one-twentieth part of the clerks in this city even by name, much less their politics. If I assert that to be true, of the truth of which, in the nature of the case, I could not know, surely I state that which is substantially untrue. Sir, the clerkships in this District are much sought after, for the officers set well paid for all they do, and without pretending to any knowledge on this subject other than what I infer from that which I have seen and known to exist elsewhere, I venture to say that not one out of twenty, if indeed there be one out of the whole number, openly acknowledges he is opposed to the administration. I know, sir, in confidential conversations with members of the opposition, they sometimes freely rebuke themselves, and think as badly, and speak as unsparingly, of the men and measures of the party, as I do, and yet say, notwithstanding, they call themselves supporters of the administration. Sir, what I speak I know, and so do other members on this floor. No, sir; tell me not that the clerks, here or else, where, in the employment of this Government, even if they disapprove and condemn both the men and measures of the administration, dare express it. I know it is not the case; but, upon the other hand, they are slaves, and fear to speak the truth; and that is not half; their innocent daughters and wives are also afraid to speak out the truth. This I have witnessed, and never before did I behold a spectacle that filled my soul with so much disgust and loathing for their oppressors. The tendency of these things is disgraceful to the enlightened age in which we live. And, sir, I appeal to your party, who have unlimited power in both branches of this Congress, to come forward, and give us a remedy for these intolerable grievances. I invite you to look back to the history of the revolution of parties in all Governments on earth, and say whether you can always expect to keep in the ascendancy; whether you see nothing in the late Presidential canvass which should produce misgivings. Do you not see, with all of Gen. Jackson's unrivalled popularity, and the $30,000,000 of surplus revenue, you were unable to carry for Mr. Van Buren a majority of the votes actually cast; and that your success is attributable more to the weakness of their adversaries, growing out of division among themselves, than to your own strength? Now that you must soon part with these two mainstays of your party, Jackson and the money, had you not better agree on terms before another contest?

Mr. Speaker, I think I fully understand the confident, ardent, and perhaps the too sanguine character of my own organization. But, after making all due allowance for it, I feel the most encouraging confidence that all is not yet gone, but that the elements of a successful resistance are yet in full and vigorous existence in this country; that it requires the happening of no future event, out of which new parties are to be formed, before successful resistance can be made. What proof need I adduce in support of this opinion, other than the result of the late Presidential election, and the circumstances attending it? True, there exist some differences on subordinate points in the great whig party who opposed Mr. Van Buren; but these differences are mainly upon gone-by and now settled questions. And but one principle in the late canvass animated that party; it was that whig spirit which stood up for our free Constitution, in opposition to the ruthless march of spoils and of party. We were divided in opinion, sir, in different portions of the Union, as to the most available opposition candidate upon whom to unite; the consequence was, a want of that inspiring confidence of success, which is ever indispensable to bring the voters to the polls. The people, however, seeing no possible chance to elect, at the polls, either of the opposition candidates, attended the elections barely as a sort of homage to the Constitution; many thousands, however, failed to come out through despondency. Notwithstanding all these disadvantages, Mr. Van Buren failed to receive, by several thousand, a majority of the votes actually given. If then, sir, with all the popularity of General Jackson, all the patronage of this Government, growing out of appropriations, run up last year, in my opinion, specifically in reference to the then pending Presidential election, to exceeding $35,000,000, three-fold as much as the average annual appropriations of any previous administration in time of peace, together with $10,000,000 of surplus revenue, with which to buy up the influence of all the venal banks in the country, Mr. Van Buren failed to get a majority of the votes cast, I ask every candid mind, does it not speak volumes for the purity of the people; and is it not conclusive proof to the opposition that the elements of a successful resistance to the principles of spoils and plunder are with us; that we should wait for the happening of no future event, out of which new parties are to be formed, but fight! Let the watch-word with every patriot be victory or death.

Friends of the opposition, if, in selecting a candidate under whose banner we are to rally in future, there be an unworthy member among us, whose attachment to any particular man, or whose personal views will cause him to stand out against the choice of a majority of our friends, let him retire from our ranks, and take a station among those whose souls are more congenial with his own; he is not worthy of a station in the ranks of those who are now fighting the battles of the Constitution against corruption and bribery. We fight not for office, nor place, nor merely for the sake of ambition and victory; but for the restoration of those constitutional principles for which our fathers fought through the Revolution of seventy-six. He amongst us who fights for a less worthy motive is not entitled to a station amongst us. Another in great political struggles, or on the bloody battle-field, oppressors cannot compete with equal numbers of the oppressed. Sir, the slaves of a tyrant's power were taught by the oppressed, on the field of San Jacinto, the folly of attempting to subjugate those whose hearts were imbued with the principles of freedom; and I now warn the advocates of party and spoils to profit by the example.

Under the fullest conviction of the utter indefensibility of proscription, the most despicable of all political heresies, gentlemen of the administration attempt to justify themselves, not upon principle, by alleging that the opposition, if in their situation, would act as they do. This, sir, I humbly trust would never be the case, but, if it were, surely it would not render right that which is in and of itself so utterly wrong.

Sir, I admit that in some of the State Governments, where the opponents of this administration have gained the ascendancy, they have, to some partial extent, turned out of office their political opponents. This, sir, I admit to have been wrong in them, and I never will attempt to justify it, whether practised by friends or enemies. If, however, any measure which in itself is wrong could possibly be excused, surely there is the best sort of apology for this impropriety in those States where the enemies of the administration have been ground into the dust by federal power, and been swept en masse from every office of the Federal Government. It seems to be a natural impulse of our nation when stricken to strike back, when oppressed to resist oppression; and when it is conducted upon the principles of "spoils and plunder," the savage mode of warfare, where neither sex, age, nor condition is spared, it would be more than human, when pressed to the last extreme of desperation, not to carry the war into the territory of the enemy, and even to use, in a spirit of revenge upon the oppressors, their own savage weapons; and as wrong as this may seem in our judgment upon principle, so long as frail human nature remains what it is, it will to some extent be observed.

But, sir, such policy is at war with every principle of the Constitution, and no true-hearted Whig, who understands the principles of his party, will ever approve this as a correct rule of action. Sir, when I say Whig, I mean every man, to whatever minor division he may belong, who stands up for the country and the principles of our Constitution against the lawless assaults which this administration is committing upon all the dearest and most vital principles of free government; and he who fights for spoils and plunder in our ranks is unworthy of station, and should take his stand in the ranks of those whose hearts are more congenial with his own.

There is not an office holder in this Government toward whom I have one unkind feeling, and I regret that public duty requires of me to allude to the case of any individual, particularly in my own region of country. As this subject has been voluntarily obtruded upon the notice of the House by those who have, in debate here, assumed to take upon themselves the defence of this administration, I, as a representative of the people, do not feel at liberty to consult my inclinations when opposed to my convictions of duty. In Kentucky there are instances where appointments to office under this administration have been conferred on the most irresponsible characters, over the heads of the best citizens. In my own district, the office of postmaster was conferred upon an individual who, though he had lived in the county for twelve or fifteen years, where he has from eight hundred to a thousand political friends, could not procure a single individual who would go his security for paying over to the Government the proceeds of the office. Sir, he had been notoriously and utterly insolvent for the last ten years, and yet he held the office for about six months; and at last, when he could not procure security, and was apprized he could not longer keep it without security, he very civilly did what every man that I ever heard speak of the subject predicted he would do when dismissed. He kept whatever had not been drawn out of his hands, which the Postmaster General informed me in an official communication but the other day. The sum was small; it amounted but to eighty-six dollars and ninety cents. This is truly a very inconsiderable amount, but it answers to illustrate the degrading tendency of the policy of this administration. In another instance the office of postmaster in a very respectable village was conferred on a man that had not credit to hire a horse to ride to his wedding, and was compelled to make the trip on foot. Sir, under such policy as has characterized this administration, corruptions as naturally grow up as does vegetation spring forth in the spring. They imperiously demand some remedy.

The most extravagant and high-wrought eulogies have been poured forth by gentlemen upon this floor on General Jackson and his administration; and in a tone approaching defiance, we are told, with all the solemnity for which the style of the venerable gentleman from Louisiana is so remarkable, that General Jackson is not surpassed by Washington in the field; and Jefferson in the cabinet. He said, we be to that man whose name shall be found on the page of his country's history as the accuser of Andrew Jackson! Sir, it was not my pleasure that this subject should have been brought up upon this occasion; but, as it has been brought before the country, I am not the man to shrink from the responsibility of speaking what I think is the truth of any man; and, sir, with a full knowledge of the import of what I am about to utter, and with the greatest possible deliberation, I say, that, if I were vain enough to suppose my name would ever be handed down to posterity as the friend and defender of the liberties of my country, there is no page of history which I should so much desire to occupy as that of pronouncing upon this floor, as an American Congressman, in the name of General Jackson's administration, that he has done more, in the short space of eight years, to lower the standard of public morals, to corrupt the source of all legitimate power, and subvert the principles of civil liberty, without the spilling of blood, than any one man who has ever lived.

Sir, this Government is, to every practical purpose, thoroughly revolutionized. All power is in the Executive department. We have nothing but the forms of a free government left. But I feel encouraged, from the late Presidential election, to believe there is virtue and intelligence enough in the people to reinvigorate with new life that skeleton of the only free form of government on earth.

I will not, for a moment, allow myself to doubt that all is yet safe, if we but emulate the example of our fathers who bequeathed to us, at the price of much blood, this our beloved form of government.

There is no one cause which will more certainly produce its specific effect, than that the proscriptive policy of this administration, the turning out of office the incumbent for daring to vote according to his own free will, the punishment of the citizen for opinion's sake, unless arrested, must soon render this the corrupted Government on earth. Human nature is the same all over the earth, and is subject to be acted upon by the same causes, whether in a free or despotic government. You will find most of vice and corruption where there is most inducement to lead to crime, and least to deter from its commission. And let it not be supposed, because we have the only truly free and republican form of government on earth, that our citizens are incorruptible. Once establish it as the constitutional doctrine that your President has the power to remove for opinion's sake, and let public sentiment sanction it, and then give him what General Jackson had in the late Presidential canvass, one hundred thousand offices at his disposal, with thirty odd millions of appropriations to expend, and forty millions of surplus revenue in his hands, and if he do not dictate and appoint his successor, it will be because he is a Washington, and not a Jackson. Thank God these principles are not yet sanctioned by the people of these United States; but whenever they are, I now proclaim it, that believing such a Government not worth preserving, I will be for revolution; yes, sir, a revolution, purified by the blood of every traitor who dares to mention such ruinous, damning principles.

Sir, it has been said here, on this floor, that General Jackson should have swept from office every opponent. This doctrine for a while was too chilling for this meridian. It first made its appearance at a distance, in a northern clime, an ominous region, I fear: it was thrown out as a feeler, first, I believe, in the State from which the President-elect comes. Now, sir, we find it advocated in every section of the country, and acted upon as the governing rule of this administration. It is not the doctrine of the Constitution; and no man, it seems to me, can believe it is. Go, sir, to the framers, the authors of the Constitution. Go to that great man, Jefferson, who draughted your Constitution, and what do you learn? Without one exception, the language of all who have spoken upon the subject pronounces this to be an unconstitutional power; that he who, as President, would dare to practise it, should be impeached and hurled from office. Shall I insult the understanding of this House by stopping to prove that every man should be as free and as unrestrained in the natural bent of his feelings as at the ballot-box, as the water that flows along the downward current. Once settle it that your President has the constitutional power, and that public sentiment sanctions its exercise to hurl from office every incumbent who votes against the Government candidate, and you not only make slaves, in the mode already pointed out, of one-fourth of your voters, but you will have arrayed under the control of one man's will, a mighty host to war against the bulwarks of public liberty.

If the President does not derive from the Constitution the power to turn out officers on political grounds, from whence does he drive this most alarming prerogative to take the money of the people, entrusted to him as a public servant, solely to promote the public good, to gratify his own personal malignity in the punishment of an enemy, or to gratify his private and individual attachments to a political favorite who has won his favor by flattery, flattery, and lying? Sir, he derives it from the same source that the outlaws of every nation derive the prerogative of committing piracy on the high seas; the same source from whence the highway robbery derives the prerogative to demand of the traveller his purse under the penalty of death, the same source from which I, as the employed agent of a company that had entrusted me with $30,000,000, to be laid out and expended by me in a specific way, for their benefit would derive the prerogative to use their means as an engine to oppress a personal enemy, or to divide it among my friends or children, which is simply the possession of the physical power, the brute force.

Just as well might General Jackson march the regular army, of which he is, by virtue of his station, commander-in-chief, to the doors of this Capitol, and demand the head of every member or Senator who has dared to speak the truth of him, as to wreak his vengeance, or that of some unprincipled subaltern, upon the helpless officer, by hurling him from his station, for daring to discharge his constitutional right at the polls. Yes, a thousand times better would it be for the country; for, in the one case, the people would see and understand the object of the movement, and would fly to the rescue, and deal out summary vengeance of such a bloody-thirsty despot; whilst, in the other case, the same object is attained by the concentration of all power in the hands of one man, but in a secret, sly, and insinuating mode, which it seems the acuteness of the public vision has not yet so clearly discerned.

If the King of England or France were thus openly to require that every office-holder, under the penalty of dismissal from office, should vote in elections of members to Parliament, or Chamber of Deputies, for the candidate of his office, it would produce an instantaneous convulsion; and nothing short of the head of the King would pay the penalty. Sir, even in those kingly governments, their laws and Constitution guard most sedulously the freedom of the elective franchise. Here the officer is turned out who fails to the fullest extent of his influence in favor of the Government candidate.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

On the correspondence of our Government with that of Great Britain, in relation to the case of the Brigs Comet, Encomium, and Enterprise.

MR. CALHOUN said that it would be remembered that on his motion a resolution was adopted, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain, in relation to the case of the brigs Encomium and Enterprise. He held in his hand the message of the President in answer to the resolution, from which he found that there was another case, (that of the Comet,) of a similar character, of which he was not aware when he made his motion, and which occurred as far back as 1832. He had read with care the correspondence, but he must say, with very little satisfaction. It was all on one side. Our Executive has been knocking, (no, that is too strong a term,) tapping gently at the door of the British Secretary, to obtain justice for these five years, without receiving an answer, and this in the plainest case imaginable. It was not his intention to censure those who had been intrusted with the correspondence on our part. They had written enough, and more than enough; but truth compelled him to say the tone was not high enough, considering the injustice to our citizens, and the outrage on the flag and honor of the Union. His remarks were intended more especially for the latter part of the correspondence, after the long delay without an answer from the British Government. At first, in so plain a case, little more could be thought necessary than a plain statement of the facts, which was given in a very clear and satisfactory manner in the letter of the President elect in the case of the Comet.

Without repeating what he said on the introduction of the resolution, he would remind the Senate of the facts of the case in the briefest manner possible.

The three brigs were engaged in the coasting trade, and among other passengers, had slaves on board, belonging to our citizens, who were sending them to the Southwestern States with a view to settlement. The Enterprise was forced by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda, where the slaves on board were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities. The other two were wrecked on the Keys belonging to the Bahama Islands, and the passengers and crew taken by wreckers, contrary to their wishes, into Nassau, New Providence, where the slaves shared the same fate as at Bermuda.

These were the essential facts of the case. He did not intend to argue the questions that grew out of them. There was, indeed, little or no ground for argument. No one in the least conversant with the laws of nations can doubt that these vessels were as much under the protection of our flag, while on their voyage, proceeding from one port of the Union to another, as if they were in port, lying at the wharves, within our acknowledged jurisdiction. Nor is it less clear that, forced as the Enterprise was by stress of weather, and taken, under the circumstances that the passengers and crews of the other two were, into the British dominions, they lost none of the rights which belonged to them while on their voyage on the ocean. So far otherwise, so far from losing the protection which our flag gave them while on the ocean, they had superadded, by their misfortunes, the additional rights which the laws of humanity extend to the unfortunate in their situation, and which are regarded by all civilized nations as sacred. It follows, as a necessary consequence, that the municipal laws of the place could not divest the owners of the property which, as citizens of the United States, they had in the slaves who were passengers in the vessels; and yet, as clear as is this conclusion, they were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities of the islands, and the Government of Great Britain, after five years' negotiation, has not only withheld redress, but has not even deigned to answer the often-repeated applications of our Government for redress. We are thus left by its silence to conjecture the reason for so extraordinary a course.

On casting his eyes over the whole subject, he could fix on but one that had the least plausibility, and that resting on a principle which it was scarcely credible that a Government so intelligent could assume: he meant the principle that there could not be property in persons. It was not for him to object that Great Britain, or any other country, should assume that or any other principle it might think proper, as applicable to its subjects, but he must protest against the right to adopt it as applicable to our country or citizens. It would strike at the independence of our country, and would not be less insulting than outrageous, while it would ill become a nation that was the greatest slaveholder of any on earth, notwithstanding all cant about emancipation, to apply such a principle in her intercourse with others. It is time to speak out boldly on this subject, and to expose freely the folly and hypocrisy of those who accuse others of what, if there be guilt, they are more guilty themselves.

Ours is not the only mode in which man may have dominion over man. The principle which would abrogate the property of our citizens in their slaves would equally abrogate the dominion of Great Britain over the subject nations under her control. If one individual can have no property in another, how can one nation, which is but an aggregate of individuals, have dominion, which involves the highest right of property, over another? If man has, by nature, the right of self-government, have not nations, on the same principle, an equal right? And if the former forbids one individual from having property in another individual, does not the other equally forbid one nation holding dominion over another? How inconsistent would it be in Great Britain to withhold redress for injustice to our citizens committed in the West Indies, on the ground that persons could not be property, while in the East Indies she exercises unlimited dominion over more than a hundred millions of human beings, whose labor she controls as effectually as our citizens do that of their slaves? It is not to be credited that she will venture to assume, in her relation with us, a principle so utterly indefensible, and which could not but expose her to imputations which would make her sincerity questionable. This she must see, and to the fact that she does he attributed her long and obstinate silence.

But it may be asked, why, then, does she not make reparation at once in so clear a case? why not restore the slaves, or make ample compensation to their owners? He could imagine but one motive. She had among her subjects many whose fanatical feelings on this subject she was unwilling to offend; but while respecting the feelings of her subjects, blind and misdirected as they are, she ought not to forget that our Government is also bound to respect the feelings of its citizens. Let her remember that, if to respect the rights which our citizens have over their slaves be offensive to any portion of her subjects, how much more so would it be to our citizens for our Government to acquiesce in her refusal to respect our right to establish the relation which one portion of our population shall have to another, and how unreasonable it would be for her to expect that our Government should be more indifferent to the feelings of its citizens than hers to any portion of her subjects. He, with every lover of his country on both sides, desired sincerely to see the peace and harmony of the two countries preserved; but he held that the only condition on which they could possibly be preserved was that of perfect equality, and a mutual respect for their respective institutions; and he could not but see that a perseverance in withholding redress in these cases must, in the end, disturb the friendly relations which now so happily exist between the two countries.

He hoped, on resuming the correspondence, our Government would press the claim for redress in a manner far more earnest and becoming the importance of the subject than it has heretofore done. It seemed to him that a vast deal too much had been said about the decision of the courts and the acts of the British Government than ought to have been. They have little or nothing to do with the case, and can have no force whatever against the grounds on which our claims for justice stand. However binding on their own subjects, or foreigners voluntarily entering her dominions, they can have no binding effect whatever, where misfortune, such as in these cases, placed our citizens within her jurisdiction.

If they be properly presented, and pressed on the attention of the British Government, he could not doubt but that speedy and ample justice would be done. It could not be withheld but by an open refusal to do justice, which he could not anticipate. As to himself, he should feel bound, as one of the representatives from the slaveholding States, which had a peculiar and deep interest in the question, to bring this case annually before Congress, so long as he held a seat on this floor, if redress shall be so long withheld.

REDUCTION OF THE REVENUE.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In Senate, Wednesday, December 21.—MR. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bill:

A BILL to extend the provisions of certain sections therein named of the act of the 23d June, 1836, regulating the deposits of the money that may be in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1838.

Be it enacted, &c. That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the first day of January, 1838, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, on the terms and according to the provisions of the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the act to regulate the deposits of the public money, approved the 23d day of June, 1836.

MR. CALHOUN, in introducing the bill, observed that he had not asked leave to introduce this bill without satisfying himself that there would be a large surplus of the public revenue remaining in the Treasury at the termination of the next year, after allowing for very liberal appropriations on all proper subjects of expenditure. From the calculations he had made, he was convinced that the amount of this surplus would not fall short of eight millions of dollars.

He was fully aware that the Secretary of the Treasury, in the report submitted by that officer to Congress, had taken a very different view, yet Mr. C. thought he hazarded little when he said that on this subject the Secretary was certainly mistaken. He knew, indeed, that formerly such an assertion from a member of Congress, in relation to the highest fiscal officer of the Government, would have been deemed adventurous; but so vague, so uncertain, so conjectural, and so very erroneous, had been the reports from that Department, for two or three years last past, that he could not be considered as risking much in taking such a position. That in this remark he did no injustice to the Secretary of the Treasury, (toward whom he cherished no personal hostility or unkind feeling whatsoever,) he would take the liberty of pressing to the Senate the estimates made by that officer for the present year, in December last, and comparing with it the actual result, as now ascertained from the Secretary's own report, made the present season. His estimate of the receipts from all sources, including the public lands and every other branch of the revenue, amounted to $19,750,000, whereas the report stated those receipts to have amounted to $17,691,898, presenting a difference in the estimate, for a single year, of $2,058,102. Thus the excess of the actual receipts had exceeded the estimate by more than one-third of the whole amount of the estimate. Each of the great branches of revenue, the customs and the public lands, exceeded the estimate by millions of dollars.

Again: the Secretary had estimated the balance at the end of the year, then within four weeks of its termination, at $18,047,598, whereas the report showed that the balance actually amounted to $26,749,803, being an error of $8,702,205 for that short period. How these errors arose, whether from negligence or inattention, or whether they were made purposely to subvert certain political views, it was not for him to say; but they were sufficient to show that he ran no very formidable hazard in venturing to say that the views of the Secretary, in respect to what was yet future, might be erroneous.

But further: the Secretary, in his report last year, had estimated the available means of the Treasury for the current year at $37,797,598; they were now ascertained to have been $74,441,701, exhibiting the small error of $46,644,104. We might find, in the compass of history, an error so monstrous. He stated this with no feelings of ill will toward the Secretary, but with emotions of shame and mortification for the honor of the country. How must errors like these appear in the eyes of foreign nations? How would they look to posterity?

But he was not yet done. The Secretary estimates the expenditure of the year at $23,103,441, whereas they turned out to be $31,435,092, making a difference of $8,331,651. He estimates the balance in the Treasury at the end of this year at $14,500,000. He now admits that it will equal $43,005,960, making an error of $28,505,960, and this notwithstanding he had made an under estimate of the expenditure of more than eight millions, which, if added as it ought to be, would make a mistake of nearly thirty-seven millions.

The Secretary, however, had profited by the errors of last year. The estimates in the present report were somewhat nearer to the truth, but were still far removed from it. And, indeed, so small was the amount in which he had profited, that he had risked an opinion that the expenditure would exceed the income, so that of the sum which had been deposited with the States, a portion, amounting to between two and three millions, would have to be refunded. The Secretary held out language of this kind when he acknowledges that the income of the year would be $24,000,000. Mr. C. said he would be glad to see the administration, with such an income, venture to call upon the States to pay back the moneys they had received. No administration would venture the call, except in the case of a foreign war, in which case these deposits would prove a timely and precious resource. With proper management, they would enable the Government to avoid the necessity, at the commencement of a war, of resorting to war taxes and loans. All those gentlemen, and he saw several of them around him, who were here at the commencement of the last war, would well remember the difficulty and embarrassment which attended the operation of raising the revenue from a peace to a war establishment.

Assuming, then, that there would be a surplus, the question presented itself as to what should be done with it. That question Mr. C. would not now attempt to argue. The discussion of it at this time would be premature and out of place. He proposed to himself a more limited object, which was to state the points connected with this subject, which he considered as established; and to point out what was the real issue at present. One point was perfectly established by the proceedings of the last session—that, when there was an unavoidable surplus, it ought not to be left in the Treasury, or in the deposit banks, but should be deposited with the States. It was not only the most safe, but the most just, that the States should have the use of the money in preference to the banks. This, in fact, was the great and leading principle which lay at the foundation of the act of last session—an act that would for ever distinguish the 24th Congress—an act which will go down with honor to posterity, as it had obtained the almost unanimous approbation of the present day. The passage had inspired the country with new hopes. It had been beheld abroad as a matter of wonder; a phenomenon in the fiscal world; such as could have sprung out of no institutions but ours; and which went, in a powerful and impressive manner, to illustrate the genius of our Government.

He considered it no less fully established that there ought to be no surplus, if it could be avoided. The money belonged to those who made it, and Government had no right to exact it unless necessary. What, then, was the true question at issue? It was this: Can you reduce the revenue to the wants of the people?—he meant in a large political sense. Could the reduction be made without an injury that would more than counter-balance the benefit? The President thought it could be done; and Mr. C. hoped he was correct in that opinion. If it be practicable, then, beyond all question, it was the proper and natural course to be adopted. It was under this impression that he had moved to refer this part of the President's message to the Committee on Finance. He not only considered that as the appropriate committee; but there were other reasons that governed him in making the reference. A majority of that committee were known to be hostile to the deposit bill, and would, therefore, do all in their power to avoid the possibility of having a surplus. If, then, that committee could not effect a reduction, then it might be safely assumed as impracticable. If they could agree on a reduction, the Senate no doubt would readily concur with them.

There was one point on which the committee need have no apprehension, that any reduction they might propose to make would be considered by the South as a breach of the compromise act. Her interest in that act is not against the reduction, but the increase of duties. If it be the pleasure of other sections to reduce, she will certainly not complain.

Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to define with exactness the position he occupied in regard to the compromise. He stood, personally, without pledge or plighted faith, as far as that act was concerned. He clearly foresaw, at the time that bill passed, that there would be a surplus of revenue in the Treasury. He knew that result to be unavoidable, unless by a reduction so sudden as to overthrow our manufacturing establishments—a catastrophe which he sincerely desired to avoid. Whatever might be thought to the contrary, he had always been the friend of those establishments. He thought at the time that the reduction provided for in the bill had not been made to take place as fast as it might have been. But the terms of the bill formed the only ground on which the opposing interests could agree, and he, as representing in part one of the Southern States, had accepted it, believing it, on the whole, to be the best arrangement which could be effected; yet he saw (it did not, indeed, require much of a prophetic spirit) that there were those who were then ready to collect the tariff at the point of the bayonet, rather than yield an inch, who, when the injurious effects of the surplus should be felt, would throw the responsibility on those who supported the bill. Seeing this, Mr. C. had determined that it should not be thrown upon him. He had therefore risen in his place, and, after calling on the stenographers to note his words, he had declared that he voted for that bill in the same manner, and no other, than he did for all other bills, and that he held himself no further personally pledged in its passage than in any other. Mr. C. was therefore at perfect liberty to select his position, which he would now state. We of the South had derived incalculable advantage from that act; and, as one belonging to that section, he claimed all those advantages to the very last letter. The act had reduced the income of the Government greatly. Few, he believed, were fully aware of the extent to which it had operated. It was a fact, which the documents would show, that the act of 1828 arrested at the custom-house one-half in value of the amount of the imports. The imports at that time, deducting reshipments, were about sixty-five millions of dollars in value, out of which the Government collected about thirty-two millions in the gross. The imports of the last year, deducting reshipments, amounted to $120,000,000, which, if the tariff of 1828 had not been reduced, would have given an increase of $60,000,000, instead of something upwards of $21,000,000. He claimed not the whole difference for the compromise, but upwards of $20,000,000 may be fairly carried to its credit. Under this great reduction, we of the South began to revive. Our business began to thrive and to look up. But the compromise act had not yet fully discharged its functions. Its operation would continue until the revenue should be brought down till no duty should exceed 20 per cent. ad valorem, and the revenue be reduced to the actual wants of the Government. But, while he claimed for the South all these very important advantages, Mr. C. trusted he was too honest as well as too proud, while he claimed those benefits on her part, to withhold whatever advantage the North may derive from the compromise. His position, then, on the question of reduction, was to follow, and not to lead; and such he believed to be the true position of the South. If it be the wish of other sections to reduce, she will cheerfully follow, but I trust she will be the last to disturb the present state of things.

Having thus clearly defined his own position, Mr. C. said he would venture a suggestion. If the manufacturing interests would listen to the voice of one who had never been their enemy, he would venture to advise them to a course which he should consider as wise on all sides.

It is well known (said Mr. C.) that the compromise act makes a very great and sudden reduction in the years '41 and '42. He doubted the wisdom of this provision at the time; but these who represented the manufacturing interest thought it was safer and better to reduce more slowly at first and more rapidly at the termination of the term, in order to avoid the possibility of a shock at the commencement of the term. He thought experience had clearly shown that there could be no hazard in accelerating the rate of reduction now, in order to avoid the great and rapid descent of '41 and '42; and in this view, it seemed to him that it would be wise to distribute the remaining reduction equally on the six remaining years of the act. It was, however, but a suggestion.

Mr. C. observed, that had not this been the short session of Congress, he should have postponed the introduction of the present bill, and awaited the action of the Committee on Finance. But it was possible that committee might find it impracticable to reduce the revenue, and as there were but about two months of the session left, if something were not effected in the mean time, a large surplus might be left in the Treasury, or rather in the deposit banks—left there to disturb and disorder the currency of the country; to cherish and foster a spirit of wild and boundless speculation, and to be wielded for electioneering purposes. A standing surplus in the deposit banks was almost universally condemned. The President himself had denounced it in his message, and Mr. C. heartily agreed with him in every word he had said on that subject.

Before sending the bill to the Chair, he would take the liberty of expressing his hope that the subject would be discussed in the same spirit of moderation as had characterized the debates upon it last year. It was a noble example, and he hoped it would be followed. Let the subject be argued on great public grounds, and let all party spirit be sacrificed on this great question to the good of the country. Yet, he would say to the friends of the administration, that it was not from any fear, on party ground, that he uttered this sentiment; for he believed there was no subject which, in the hands of a skillful opposition, would be more fatal to power.

The bill was, by consent, read twice; when Mr. CALHOUN moved that it be made the order of the day for Monday next. He saw no necessity for its commitment.

Mr. CLAY was extremely unwilling to interrupt for a moment (and he would only interrupt for a moment) the progress of the debate expected to proceed to-day. But, from the numerous indications which had been given of a purpose to disturb the compromise act, and from the direct allusion to the subject which had just been made, he felt himself called upon to say one word. Considering the circumstances under which that act passed, the manner through this body, the acclamation with which it ran through the House, the cordial reception with which it was greeted by every part and every interest in the country, he did not think that it ought to be lightly touched. In faith of adherence to the provisions of that act, large investments have been made, and under its beneficent operation every interest has prospered, the manufacturing not less than other great interests. The whole country has looked to the inviolability of the act; the messages of the President; the reports from the Secretary of the Treasury; the declarations of members of Congress upon this floor and that of other House, all heretofore have united in stamping upon it that character. Strictly speaking, he was aware that Congress possessed the power to repeal or modify the act, but in his opinion it could not be done without something like a violation of the public faith. He had foreseen, at the period of the passage of the act, the probability of a large surplus beyond the wants of the Government, economically administered, and he had endeavored, simultaneously with the passage of the act, to provide for it by the introduction of the land bill. That bill had passed Congress, but unfortunately had encountered the veto of the President. If that bill had received his sanction, there would have been no surplus at the last session, none now, probably none hereafter, to divide and distract us. For it was from the proceeds of the public lands that the surplus arose. If the land bill which passed at the last session of the Senate had become a law, it would have distributed among the several States a larger sum than will be deposited in their treasuries under the deposit act.

Mr. C. said that he knew well that the preservation of the compromise act did not depend upon him. He well knew that its fate was in the hands of a majority of the Senate, as now constituted, and a majority of the House. But if they choose to repeal it, or to make any essential alteration in the measure of protection secured by that act, he could only deeply regret the reopening of wounds which had been so happily healed. He can co-operate in no such object, but shall, for himself, steadily oppose any material change of the provisions of the act, and insist upon that efficacious and complete remedy for a surplus which is to be found in the land bill, or upon some other competent remedy, which will not unsettle all the great business of the country.

Mr. WALKER moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance; and in supporting his motion observed that he had been one of those who voted against what was now openly avowed to be a distribution bill. Since the money had been distributed, some of the largest States had already come forward and applied to Congress for the repeal of that section of the bill which provided for the refunding of the money by the States when it should be needed by the General Government. He would remind the Senate that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) who had been one of the authors and advocates of this measure, did expressly tell the Senate that it would be but a single operation; and when the Senate were warned that that bill would be only a precedent for the distribution policy in future, the distinguished Senator had assured them of the contrary, and had insisted that it was a single and solitary measure, intended only to meet a contingency. Yet what was the Senate now asked to do? To create a surplus for the purpose of future distribution. Mr. W. really thought that such a proposition demanded examination by some committee, and he hoped the Senate would not consent to take a leap in the dark. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had presented as one ground of his opposition to letting the public money remain in the deposit banks, a desire to prevent the public land from passing into the hands of speculators. But the gentleman's remedy had not met the evil. The distribution bill had not prevented the monopoly of the public lands by speculators, nor would it ever prevent it. If the gentleman did really desire to obviate that evil, let him join in recommending that part of the President's message which proposed to limit the sale of the public lands to actual settlers. Should this recommendation be adopted, there would remain no surplus to be distributed. For how was the surplus created? By referring to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be found, that in the first three quarters of the last year twenty millions of dollars had been paid into the Treasury for the public lands, which was at the rate of about $25,000,000 a year. Yet, what portion of this amount was needed for actual settlers? Not more than $5,000,000; or, according to an estimate made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, not over $8,000,000. Thus there would be a reduction in the receipt of $16,000,000, being double the amount of the surplus predicted by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. Let him then adopt the President's recommendation, and the evil apprehended could not take place. But should the Senate pass the bill which had now been introduced, they would have passed the Rubicon, and the distribution policy would, in spite of all opposition, become the settled policy of the Government.

Mr. W. called upon the Senate and upon the country to remark that they were now invoked by the gentleman from South Carolina to create a surplus for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. CALHOUN, in reply, complained of having been entirely misstated by the Senator from Mississippi. He had not invoked the Senate to any such act, nor had he said any thing like it. But he had said that no administration could honestly plead any necessity for demanding back the deposits from the States, unless in the contingency of a foreign war. So far from having expressed a desire to create and distribute a surplus, he had, on the contrary, expressly declared that he should greatly prefer a reduction of the revenue, if it could be safely effected; and he had expressed his willingness to send the bill to a committee opposed to his own views, that, if possible, this might be effected. Yet, the gentleman accused him of a design to create a surplus.

The gentleman had again said that one of the arguments urged by him in favor of the distribution bill had been, that the deposit of the public money in banks was a great instrument of fraud and speculation. This was a great mistake. He had said no such thing. The President, however, had undertaken to legislate on the subject, and had issued an order, which was much more like an act of Congress than an Executive measure. The President deemed the evil so great, and the remedy so specific, that he had ventured on a great stretch of power to realize the object. Now, after what the President had said on this subject, any man who should vote to leave the public money in deposit banks stood openly convicted of being in favor of speculators.

Mr. C. hoped the Senator would not persist in his motion to refer the bill to a committee which he knew to be entirely opposed to it. Nothing could be more unparliamentary. He hoped the gentleman would at least indulge him with a special committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the bill, was in favor of its commitment. The subject extended itself into so many ramifications, was so complex and so extensive, that no leading measure ought to be adopted in relation to it without its previously undergoing the careful investigation of a committee. There were two counter projects now before the Senate which were essentially incompatible with each other. One had been reported by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States on certain conditions; the other to deposit the surplus that might accrue, under the provisions of the bill of the last session. Both these plans, it was obvious, could not prevail; while the President had recommended the sale of the public domain to actual settlers only. On this matter Mr. B. expressed no opinion, but should be guided in a great measure by the wishes and opinions of gentlemen coming from the new States.

Should the President's recommendation be adopted, there would probably be no surplus. He should like to see a responsible report from the Committee on Finance. On the question whether there would or would not be a surplus on the 1st of January next, he expressed no opinion.

While up, he would add one word on the subject of what was commonly called the compromise act. Never should he forget the impression made upon his own mind, when the news of the passage of that act first reached him. He had then been in a foreign country. The enemies of liberty throughout the world were all looking to this country with anxious eyes, and with hopes highly raised, that this last experiment in favor of human freedom would prove to be a failure. The most exaggerated accounts of the division of opinion in this country on the subject of the tariff, were spread throughout Europe; and the expectation appeared to be general that our Union would be dissolved, and the Republic expire. In such circumstances, when he heard that a compromise had been effected, his bosom had been pervaded by a feeling such as he had never known before. Without being acquainted with the particulars of the bill, he was prepared to approve of it in advance. On further examination, however, he could not say whether he should have supported the bill or no, but the country had received it, the great manufacturing and agricultural interests had welcomed it, and to this moment relied upon it as in some sense the charter of their hopes. Other prevailing interests of the country shared in the feeling; and never would Mr. B. give his vote in favor of touching one of its provisions. That could not be done without extensively and injuriously affecting not only the agricultural and manufacturing, but another great interest of his own State. He referred to the mining interest. On the whole, he hoped that they should have a report from a committee; and should it even be adverse to the bill, yet such were the well known zeal, perseverance, and talents of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that he would still find ways and means to bring the merits of his project fully before the minds of the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said that the Senator from South Carolina had appealed to him to indulge him with a special committee. But that gentleman would do well to remember that, when on a former occasion he (Mr. W.) had introduced a bill of great importance to Mississippi, and asked its reference to a select committee, that gentleman had opposed the motion, and had sent the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, which he well knew to be opposed to every one of its provisions. In insisting, therefore, on his original motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Finance, he had only followed an example which the gentleman had set him.

Mr. W. then went into some explanations to show that he had not misunderstood or misrepresented the objects of the Senator from South Carolina. If that gentleman should oppose the President's recommendation in regard to selling the public lands to actual settlers only, it would, in effect, be equivalent to voting to create a surplus. Mr. W. said he had no wish to alarm the manufacturing interest, toward which he entertained no hostility; but he would not tell that interest throughout this country, that, if they wished to preserve the compromise bill, the mode was to prevent an exorbitant sale of the public lands. If this were permitted to continue, a surplus revenue could not be prevented without touching the compromise bill. Mr. W. had, on the last session, offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report to Congress what reduction in the tariff and in the price of the public lands would be necessary to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government, but in such a manner as not to infringe on the compromise. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) had moved to lay that resolution on the table; not because he was particularly hostile to it, but because he wished to press some other subject which was before the Senate; and afterward there had been no opportunity to call it up. Mr. W. should not now depart from the spirit of that resolution. He had no wish to violate the compromise, but desired that the reduction should be in conformity with the sixth section of that bill (which he read.)

The Senate had been told by the gentlemen from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) that the faith of the nation stood pledged to preserve that bill inviolate. But that bill declared, in the most express terms, that the reduction of the revenue was not to be made by depositing it with the States—that was no feature of the compromise—but by a reduction of duties. He had ascertained that the reduction which his plan would effect would amount to three millions of dollars. Deduct this from the eight millions derived from the sale of public lands to actual settlers, and it would leave five millions of dollars, being just the amount which the Senator from South Carolina had thought it was proper to retain as an unexpended balance in the Treasury. Mr. W. insisted on his motion for referring the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALHOUN rejoined and explained, with a view to show that the case of which the gentleman from Mississippi complained was not parallel to the present, and still insisted on the propriety of allowing him a special committee. If, however, the Senate should resolve to send this bill to the Committee on Finance, he should not be at a loss to understand the movement. He had read the President's message attentively. It was an extraordinary document. He had read with no less care the report of the Secretary of the Treasury; that, too, was an extraordinary document. The perusal had suggested some suspicions to his mind; and should the present bill be sent to the Finance committee, those suspicions would be fully confirmed. Such a measure would go far to convince him that the policy of the administration was agreed upon, and that it would be to make a demonstration on a reduction of the revenue, but, in fact, to leave that revenue in the deposit banks. The end of this session was not far off, and that would tell whether he were not correct in his opinion. He would now, in his turn, venture to become a prophet, and he would predict that, if the present motion succeeded, that very thing which the President in his message had most decidedly condemned would be the thing actually realized. Notwithstanding the President's opposition to the collecting of the surplus revenue, and all he had said on its tendency to promote speculation and corrupt the public morals, that was the thing which would be done. He was sorry he did not see the Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) in his place. On that gentleman, peculiarly, lays the obligation to provide for the reduction of the revenue. Mr. C. well knew the difficulty of touching this subject. He had himself had a full and sound trial of that operation. He knew the efforts by which the existing reduction had been effected, and he felt very sure that the Senator from New York could not be sanguine in the expectation of effecting a reduction to any great amount. He had heard much said in private on that subject, and he could not but regret that the President, when alluding to it in his message, had not referred to the difficulties attending it. Mr. C. thought he saw how things were to go, and he thus openly announced what his conviction was. He believed nothing would be done to reduce the revenue; that the money would still be collected, and would be left, not where it ought to be found, in the treasuries of the States, but in the deposit banks.

If the Finance committee would report an adequate reduction of the revenue, Mr. C. would consent to withdraw his bill. He should infinitely prefer a reduction to a distribution, provided the thing could be done. In the meanwhile the South claimed the execution of the compromise bill; it had not only closed a long and painful controversy, but had enabled them to make some feeble stand against the progress of Executive influence. He concluded by moving for a special committee.

Mr. RIVES was in favor of referring the bill to the Committee on Finance, but as the Senator from South Carolina considered the denial of a special committee as involving some want of courtesy, he would state the considerations which led him to the conclusion that that would be the proper committee. The Senator himself had said, yesterday, that the Committee on Finance was the committee to whom the entire subject of the reduction of the revenue specially belonged. The Senator had entered into a calculation to show that there would be a surplus in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, and on this he grounded his bill. The question, therefore, at the root of the whole matter was, whether there would be such a surplus. This was a question which obviously pertained to the Finance committee. The gentleman, relieving himself from every thing like a pledge to abide by the provisions of the compromise act, expressed his strong preference of a reduction of the revenue to its distribution; but the question whether it could be safely reduced certainly was a question coming within the range of the appropriate duties of that committee. Mr. R. reverted to the history of the compromise bill, and expressed his satisfaction at the reflection that he had rendered it his hearty support. He did not now recede, in the slightest degree, from the ground he had then occupied. But the Senate was now in a different position: they were at the opening of a new session of Congress, and were enabled, from all the lights of past experience, to look ahead with something like certainty. If they foresaw the probability of a surplus of revenue, they were bound to guard against it by attempting a reduction. That, beyond question, was the true policy. Mr. R. adverted to the prophecy of Mr. C. that the policy of the administration was to be a false and deceitful demonstration on reduction while none was to be made, and the money was to remain in the deposit banks. [Mr. CALHOUN shook his head at the words false and deceitful.] Well, a demonstration, at all events, was to be made, and all that had been said by the President in his message against surplus revenue would turn out a delusion. [Mr. C. assented.] Yet the gentleman had, no longer than yesterday, expressed the highest satisfaction with the Finance committee, and been lavish of his compliments on the gentlemen composing it, when the object was to refer this very measure of reduction to that committee. Did the gentleman mean nothing more than a demonstration? Had he not been in earnest? He hoped the gentleman had no such policy, nor could he suppose him to have.

Mr. CALHOUN repelled the charge of inconsistency. He had been in favor of sending the subject of a reduction of the revenue to the Committee on Finance, because he considered the subject as appropriate to their specific duties; but he was opposed to sending this bill to that committee, because they were known to be adverse to its object. In one case he had gone on the great parliamentary principle that propositions were to be referred to committees favorable to the object proposed; and in the other case, he still had sent it to a committee at least not unfavorable to the measure. He was rejoiced to hear the honorable Senator from Virginia declare so explicitly that he did not repent the course he had taken in reference to the compromise bill; he was confident the gentleman never would have reason to repent the able and honorable course he had pursued on that memorable occasion; and he trusted the gentleman would agree in sentiment with those who were opposed to leaving the public money in the deposit banks. Mr. C. had given many evidences of his desire that a reduction should be made in the revenue; and had, on a former occasion, sent a bill to the Committee on Manufactures for that object, which afterwards had passed the Senate almost unanimously, and had been sent to the other House, after which it was never again heard of. He was not the man, however, to disturb the terms of the compromise, which had so happily been effected, unless it should be done by common consent. The South were prepared to assent to such a step, and if the North would also agree to it, there need be no difficulty in the case. The gentleman from Virginia seemed to suppose that, because it was the duty of the Finance committee to consider the question whether there was likely to be a surplus revenue or not, therefore, this bill ought to be sent to them. The argument was too wide; on the same principle every proposition which related to the application of any portion of the public resources must be sent to that committee. It would swallow up almost all the business of the Senate. He concluded by demanding the yeas and nays on the question of commitment.

Mr. RIVES briefly rejoined. As the Senator from South Carolina was only conditionally in favor of the proposition in the bill, in the event that there would be a surplus, and that the revenue could not be reduced; and as the question whether it could be reduced belonged confessedly to the Committee on Finance, it involved no violation of the parliamentary principle to which the Senator had alluded, to send this bill to that committee. Mr. R. hoped he should not be understood as wishing wantonly to interfere with any provisions of the compromise bill; he was far from desiring any such thing. He held the compromise in great respect, as having effected a great national good in the settlement of an agitating and alarming question. But he was free to say that, if any mode could be devised of bringing down the revenue to the wants of the Government without interfering with the enactments of that bill, he should be opposed to disturbing them in any way. But it was a fundamental duty of legislation to dispense with all unnecessary taxes, and reduce the burdens of the people as far as the necessities of Government would permit. If this could not be done without touching some parts of the compromise bill, it must be touched; but if it could, then that bill, in all its provisions, ought to be sacredly maintained.

The question on Mr. WALKER's motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance being now put, the vote stood as follows: Yeas 22, Nays 22. The yeas and nays being equal, the CHAIR voted in the affirmative; and the bill was committed accordingly to the Committee on Finance.

CENSURE OF JOHN Q. ADAMS.

SPEECH OF MR. LINCOLN, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

[As reported in the National Intelligencer.]

In House of Representatives, February 7, 1837.—On the resolution to censure the Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS, for inquiring of the Speaker whether a paper, purporting to come from slaves, came within the resolution laying on the table all petitions relating to slavery.

MR. SPEAKER: It may seem the extreme of rashness that I should attempt to oppose, by my humble efforts, the torrent of invective which is pouring forth, from every quarter of this House, upon the devoted head of my venerable colleague. It was alike my intention to take no part in this debate, and my wish to keep free from the excitement to which it might lead. But whatever my original purpose, I can no longer consent to remain silent, when the subject before the House assumes the form of a direct censure upon my colleague, for an act which he deliberately and solemnly declares, he conscientiously believed to be in the discharge of his representative duty. Such is the reverence due to his age, such the respect paid to his character, and the remembrance of his public services, so high the confidence in his integrity and in the purity and patriotism of his motives, so beloved and honored is he at home, and so known to fame abroad, that whatever may be the result of this discussion, whatever the action of the House upon these most extraordinary resolutions, there are those, and they are not a few, here and elsewhere, who will deeply sympathize with him in the trial to which he is now informally subjected. I plant myself by his side on the principles for which he is contending. I come not, sir, to his protection against the particular occasion of offence which he may have given. To this, he is, of himself, most abundantly able. He needs not, if he would accept, my feeble aid. His justification is in his own mouth, and he is far more capable than I could pretend to be, to make it effective.

It was, perhaps, fortunate for me, Mr. Speaker, that I was not present when the supposed offence was committed by my colleague. [Mr. LINCOLN was then engaged as a member of the select committee of which Mr. WISE is chairman.] I may, therefore, hope to be excused from participating in much of that excitement which is so strongly manifested by others. Besides, sir, I come from that cold region of country so reproachfully referred to by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Alford,) where the passions, like the temperature of the climate, are supposed to be less ardent than in more southern latitudes.

Yet the people of the North, I can assure that honorable gentlemen, are not wanting in all the sensibilities which do honor to human nature. They have, indeed, like passions, and partake of like infirmities, with other men. If they do not always speak "in words which burn," and act with an impulse which startles, it is because they are schooled and disciplined to habits of calm and sober reflection; because they have been taught, from infancy, that reason is a better guide than passion; that it is wiser and safer to regulate the conduct by the dictates of judgment, than blindly to follow those generous and fearless promptings of our nature which sometimes lead to excesses, even in virtue. Sir, will not this House, on the present occasion, profit somewhat, by imitating the characteristic coolness and discretion of Northern men, in yielding something of the excess of feeling to the more calm suggestions of reason, while deliberating upon the conduct of my venerable friend, and deciding the character of the offence which he is charged with having committed? Offence, did I say? There has been no offence. It is a false denomination of the act of my colleague. There are too many lawyers on this floor, to permit a sanction to the mismomer by the deliberate judgment of the House.

The House will bear with me, I humbly trust, while I advert to the conduct of my colleague, which is charged as a premeditated and heinous crime. At a proper time, in order, within the strictest rules of the House, my colleague, being entitled to the floor, propounded a question to the Speaker, in reference to the disposition to be made of a petition, the answer to which he intended to receive as directory to his conduct in the matter. Distrusting his own judgment, he addressed, respectfully, a request for information to the Chair, in the faithful determination, as he now explicitly declares, to regulate his subsequent action by the direction which should be given him. And is such the offence for which the venerable member from Massachusetts is to suffer the severe reprehension of this House? [Mr. PICKENS, of South Carolina, here rose, and desired to say that it was for announcing that he had a petition from slaves, thus destroying all the relations of master and slave, and denying the doctrine that the slave can only be heard through his master: this is the offence.] Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware that this is the understanding of the gentleman from South Carolina. But did my colleague assert or deny any doctrine, or in any wise allude to the relation of master and slave? I will not stop to inquire whether he might, or might not, very properly have done so. It is enough to say that his language was confined to a naked inquiry, in which no doctrine was denied, and the rights of masters in no respect involved. The question put to the Speaker was simply this: Does a petition purporting to be from slaves fall within a rule of the House? The purport of the petition was not even intimated. Again, then, I demand, is it for making this inquiry that my colleague is to answer? It is to the act itself we must look, to determine its character; and that act consisted, wholly and exclusively, in putting the question to the Chair.

But it has been urged, in the course of this debate, that, however equivocal or innocent might seem to be the language of the inquiry, yet that it was made with a sinister and culpable intent.

Is it intention, then, the secret purpose of the mind, which constitutes the crime of which this House is to take cognizance? In what code of criminal jurisprudence, from what law of parliamentary practice do gentlemen gather jurisdiction of the thoughts of the heart? If the external action be not criminal, the inward motive cannot change its character. Who ever heard, in a court of justice, that intention could be imputed as crime, when the act with which that intention was connected, constituted no offence? The wrong, which is cognizable by law, is in the overt act. The plotting of treason is not treason. The design to lie in wait is not murder. The intent may change the apparent character of the act, but, without the act, the intent is nothing. Need I illustrate? A homicide is committed; it may be murder or manslaughter; an excusable or a justifiable act, according to the intention of the agent; but if there be no slaying, the mere purpose to do it, however malicious or premeditated, violates no law. Apply the principle, however incongruous may seem the illustration, to the case before the House. My honorable colleague is charged with a contempt. It has been satisfactorily shown, as I trust, that, in the language of the inquiry proposed by him to the Chair, there was nothing contemptuous to the Chair or to the House. In and by itself, the inquiry was altogether harmless. Wherein, then, is the contempt? It still rests, if intended, in the breast of my colleague, without the form of expression to give it the character of an offence.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Halsey) has objected to my colleague, that by his conduct, subsequent to the inquiry propounded by him to the Chair, he has trifled with the feelings of members, and the dignity of the House. This is distinct and different ground for accusation; but, Mr. Speaker, I put it to the liberality of the gentleman himself to say, whether, after the explicit disclaimer by my colleague, this cause of complaint should further be insisted on. What, sir, have we heard this very morning? After time has been given for the excitement of yesterday's debate to subside, after a night doubtless, of thoughtful consideration and recollection, my venerable colleague has, here, in the presence of the House, made the deliberate and solemn declaration, that to trifle with the House or its members would be the last possible purpose of his heart. And is not this enough? Can it be permitted for the gentleman from Georgia now to argue, by inference, against the sincerity of that declaration? It is asked if no disrespect to the House was intended, wherefore the manner of my colleague, so different from that of other members in presenting memorials? This inquiry I will not undertake to answer. It may be matter of taste or matter of judgment with my colleague. His manner is not my manner; nor do I see in his better success, on this subject, in this House, any encouragement to me for its adoption. But, Mr. Speaker, it was not unreasonable to suppose that the exception taken rather to the character of the memorials than to the manner of presenting them. If the charge of trifling with the House is made upon the ground that the venerable gentleman presents to the House abolition memorials, then is he not the only offender. If to present the petition of abolitionists to be trifle with the House, there are many here who should not cast the first stone. Sir, I am, in the popular sense of the term, no abolitionist. Although I would to God that every human being was enlightened and free, yet I have never advocated, either on this floor or elsewhere, the peculiar views or schemes of the abolitionists. Pure and philanthropic as I believe the motives of most of them to be, I have seen many and most serious obstacles to their progress, and anticipated fearful consequences from their success. But for this cause, in an honest difference of sentiment between us, I have not felt at liberty to withstand their right of petition. Like my colleague, I have presented their memorials—willingly and cheerfully presented them—as the will of that portion of my constituents who have committed them to my charge. I have presented them from men and women of as pure, elevated, and distinct character as any in the world; men and women, kind and generous, and of tenderest sympathies, who would no sooner do an injury or an act of injustice to any human being than the most chivalrous or true-hearted of the sons or daughters of the South. Sir, I shall continue to present these petitions, within the rules of the House, whenever and as often as they are transmitted to me.

But, say gentlemen, my colleague, in presenting these abolition memorials, has eulogized the character of those who have subscribed to them. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson) in an especial manner, excepts to this as an aggravation of the offence, and insists that it evinces, in the technical language of the law, a hearted aid of social obligation, and fatally bent upon mischief. Will the honorable gentleman be pleased to consider whether this supposed cause of exception be so peculiarly applicable to the members from Massachusetts, or to this class of petitions? Sir, do not other members do the same on other occasions, and in regard to every other subject? Is it not usual, common, within the rule of the House, or at least, the practice of the House, so to do? Has not a member, in presenting a petition of any description, a right to declare whence and from whom it comes? May he not say that this one, who subscribes it, is a minister of the gospel of peace; that another is a citizen of the highest intelligence and the purest virtue; that others are intellectual and accomplished women, whose breasts the feelings of kindness and human sympathy ever find a home? To do this, is it an offence? How often, sir, have the character, and influence, and standing in society of petitioners been stated on this floor, to enforce the prayer of their petition? In the memorable panic session, as it has been termed, of the last Congress, on a question, regarded by some who now exhibit peculiar sensitiveness, as one of mere pecuniary concern, involving the simple consideration, whether the revenue of the country should be deposited in one strong box or another, gentlemen in every quarter of the House stated and dwelt upon the character and standing of the petitioners; and who then held this to be a breach of privilege? Sir, it is every day's practice. And may it be forbidden in things of infinitely higher moment, affecting the rights of person and the prerogatives of freemen, the liberty of speech and the right of petition? Mr. Speaker, it has fallen to the lot of my venerable colleague to have been charged with more of these petitions than all of his associates in the delegation together. His age, his character, the stations he has held, and his standing before the world, have brought upon him responsibilities which others might not have borne. The people have thrown upon the shoulders of Ajax the weight which no common man could have sustained. They trusted to his talents, his learning, and his great experience, to secure to him the deference of respect due to these qualifications in the duties he was called upon to discharge. If this shall not now be accorded to him, and these resolutions are to pass, I shall, in common with my colleagues, not cease to lament that we were not permitted more largely to share in that painful pre-eminence to which the preference of our respective more immediate constituents may have contributed to subject him.

Mr. Speaker, there is another topic in this connection upon which I wish to address a few words to the consideration of this House. Coming from the State by which I have been so highly honored, and knowing full well, as I think I do, the character of the people whom I represent, I cannot pass by this occasion without, for the first time since I have been on this floor, expressing something of that feeling with which I have often been compelled to listen to the tone of remark from one quarter of this House. Sir, I have sat day after day, week after week, year after year, and heard the North and the East assailed by every epithet of indignity and reproach. I have seen, honorable, high-minded, "chivalrous" men from the South stand up in their place, and heard from their lips denunciations of a whole section of country, as selfish, sordid, mean-spirited, unpatriotic. In the fury of debate, the vocabulary of opprobrious terms has been exhausted. Respectful petitions, presented by my colleagues and myself, have been characterized as the acts of the vilest incendiaries! Rejoice in the opportunity now afforded me to repel these most offensive and calumnious aspersions. Those who indulge in them are ignorant alike of our character and our doings. What do we now witness? Under a rule of the House, petitions laid on your table without being read, and yet, with no knowledge of their contents, flippantly denounced as vile, incendiary productions! For myself, I say here, in my place, such is not the character of a single paper which I have presented; nor do I believe it applies to any offered by either of my colleagues. On the contrary, they are respectful memorials, clothed in language decorous to the body to which they are addressed, and appropriate to the object they are designed to accomplish, such as no man, in a fit state of mind for legislation, with cool and deliberate judgment, could justly take offence at. If southern gentlemen had done with this class of memorials as, in my humble judgment, it would have been or their peace and happiness to have done, sent them to the consideration of a committee, we should have had fewer of them here, and a better feeling on the part of those of us from the North who are disposed, by every reasonable means within our power, to prevent interference and allay agitation at home, on this most dangerous subject. Great injustice has been done, both to us and to our constituents, in this Hall. Can gentlemen seriously believe what their impassioned feelings, in the ardor of debate, too often lead them to express? There are those among them who have visited at least one portion of the country from whence these petitions come, and have had some opportunity of judging of the character of its population. What say these gentlemen of our New England? We call upon them to stand up here and testify. Did they find the mass of our citizens ignorant, priest-ridden fanatics; incendiaries, prepared for deeds of rapine and blood, and eager to wrap the dwellings of slaveholders in flames? Idle, worse than idle, is every such pretence of apprehension. Those who sign these petitions are among the most harmless, moral, conscientious, pious people of the land. They would be the last to excite to violence, or willingly do their Southern brethren a wrong. They are acting under honest (however mistaken) convictions of duty. They conscientiously believe that a great moral evil exists in the form of slavery, and they believe, as I also believe, that Congress has the power to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Beyond this, practically, I have never found, among my constituents, man, woman, or child, who wished to go. On the point of sound policy, of high political expediency, of the propriety and wisdom of the interposition of this power, of the tendency of the measures which these worthy people propose, to improve the condition of the slaves themselves, of the consequences, here and elsewhere, of sudden and entire abolition, even within the District of Columbia, I do, indeed, differ with them. But I respect their motives. Theirs may be, and I think is, an error of judgment, in urging, under existing circumstances, and in the present excited state of the South, these memorials upon Congress. In my opinion, this is not the time for their favorable reception, or for the proper action upon them. But the memorialists view this matter in a different light. Freemen themselves, they deem it neither consistent with the character of a free people, nor creditable to the nation, that their representatives should be legislating here, in the midst of slaves. They plant themselves upon the Constitution, and, honestly believing that they bring their petitions within its spirit, they earnestly implore you to remove this stigma from the land. And will you not, sir, look into the matter? Dare you not trust yourselves with a question over which you have exclusive control? Believe me, there is nothing to fear. These thousands of women, these hundreds of clergymen, the kind-hearted, the sympathetic, and the devout, who sign these petitions, are not the incendiaries to apply the torch to southern dwellings. May no pious utter his prayer for the relief of human misery? May not female tenderness heave a sigh for the condition of the oppressed, without giving occasion for alarm? This is no scheme of ambition, no plotting of selfish, designing, reckless politicians. It is principally the unsophisticated, the artless, the simple, and the unoffending, who thus approach you; who, regarding duty in its remote relations, and taking counsel of their kinder feelings, believe it safe to ask you if you cannot interpose, within your own limited jurisdiction, to alleviate a crying evil, without prejudice to the public weal. And will you not even hear such a request, from a humiliating distrust of the exercise of your own judgment, to grant or refuse it?

One word more on this point, with the indulgence of the House, in reference to the State from which I come. The people of Massachusetts are a just, a faithful, and a liberal people. They are devotedly attached to the Union, and for its preservation will ever seek to cultivate the truest sentiments of affection and respect for their brethren of the South. There is none other than kind feeling in the North towards the South. I know this to be the fact. I full well know that even those who sign these abolition petitions have nothing further from their hearts than harm or danger to the southern States. They call slavery a sin, but they charge not upon the present generation the responsibility for its existence. They look into the Constitution, which the North will be the last to violate, and they see and recognize there the guaranty of this peculiar institution of the South in the States of the Union. They dream not of mischief to their southern brethren from the freedom of the slave.

Not a man among them but would stand appalled at the very thought that what he was here attempting would incite servile insurrection or civil war. If the time and the occasion shall ever come, which may Heaven in mercy avert! when, however insigated, the hand of the slave shall be raised against his lawful master, and the tocsin of alarm shall be sounded from our southern borders, then shall it be known that the cords of affection, of a common kindred, and of ancient friendships with our southern brethren, are closely knit in every northern bosom, and that the hour of trial with them cannot pass, without our sympathy and generous participation in their service and suffering.

Mr. Speaker, I represent, with my colleagues, the people of a State who were early taught the value of civil liberty. They know of no freedom without the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the right of petition. They derive not these enjoyments from any parchment charter of Government, but claim them as the absolute, unqualified inheritance of freemen, the prerogative of civilized social man. The Constitution of Massachusetts was adopted in the midst of the great struggle for American liberty; and there it is written, in letters of gold, in her glorious Bill of Rights, that the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition is an inalienable right, and cannot be impaired; that the liberty of speech and of the press is essential to freedom in a State, and ought not to be restrained. It is upon these fundamental principles, first proclaimed by themselves, and afterwards ingrafted into the frame of the Federal Government, mainly by the action of the Convention of Massachusetts, that the people of Massachusetts claim the right to speak, and write and petition. Having this right, they send their petitions here; and all they ask or hope is, that their requests may be considered, and such disposition made of them as best comports with the honor, peace, and welfare of the nation. They mean no offence; they mediate no wrong; and in vindicating them, I do but vindicate and assert those great principles of civil liberty, to enforce and carry out which this Government was founded, and the subversion of which this Republic cannot survive.

Mr. Speaker, I have risen and made these unprepared remarks, not knowing that I shall even be sustained by a single member from my own State, or the North, in protesting against the passage of the resolutions upon your table. But whether I stand alone, or am supported, I can never consent that my venerable colleague shall be brought to your bar, to be censured for a conscientious discharge of duty. What he has done, he has manfully, righteously, nobly done, in defence of the inalienable right of petition, and the freedom of speech in this House.

REMARKS OF MR. ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 7, 1837.—On the proposition to censure Mr. Adams.

Mr. ROBERTSON desired that the resolution before the House might be again read.

The following resolution offered by Mr. DROMGOOLS of Virginia, and accepted by Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, as a modification of one previously offered by him, was then read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member of this House, by stating in his place that he had in his possession a paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it came within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted, (as preliminary to its presentation,) has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ; and that, for the same, he deserves the censure of this House.

Resolved, That the aforesaid J. Q. ADAMS receive a censure from the Speaker, in the presence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBERTSON resumed. Mr. Speaker, I wished the resolution proposed by my colleague (Mr. Dromgoole) read again that I might be certain I correctly apprehended its import. I cannot vote for it. Called upon as the Southern members are to unite in one phalanx to sustain it, I cannot obey the summons without, as I conscientiously believe, overleaping the barriers of the Constitution, and violating in the person of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) that liberty of speech guaranteed to every member in this Hall. I am sorry, sir, to stand in the way of gentlemen who seem so impatient for the floor; but I cannot forego the opportunity allowed me of explaining the reasons which govern my vote. I will detain them but a few moments.

I have taken no part, Mr. Speaker, in the stormy debate which the extraordinary conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts has elicited. I was, sir, I confess, unwilling to trust to the emotions which that conduct could not fail to excite in the bosom of every southern man. There was danger the first impulse might hurry us too far; for it is ever in moments of high excitement, of exasperation—such as we have just witnessed—that the most fatal precedents are established; and that, too, often under the influence of high and honorable motives. It is due, therefore, to ourselves, to the member implicated, and to the country, now that some degree of calmness is restored, to weigh well the consequences of the measure proposed under such circumstances for our adoption. To drag a member to the bar of this House, and cause him to be publicly censured by the Speaker, must be regarded by him and by all as a heavy punishment, and we ought to be able to give satisfactory reasons for inflicting it. Let us look to the resolution which professes to assign them. It declares that the member in question, by stating that he had a petition purporting to be from slaves, and inquiring whether it came within the meaning of a certain resolution, as preliminary to its presentation, has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ. Yes, sir; we charge that by stating a fact, and making an inquiry, he has given color to an offensive idea, and it is for the crime of intimating that idea we demand his punishment. I cannot go this length. So long as I have the honor of a seat here I will never consent, be the consequences to myself personally what they may, to censure or expel any member for the utmost latitude of enquiry or remark in which he may indulge, whilst acting in what he may regard, however erroneously, as the discharge of his duty, and keeping within the limits of parliamentary order. Let me not be understood as approving the conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Far from it: no one more strongly condemns it.

concur with those who think that he has trifled with the patience of the House, to the great delay of its business, and wantonly tortured the feelings of a large portion of its members, by the minuteness with which he has dwelt upon the contents of offensive petitions, and the names and characters of those who signed them. I cannot hold him guiltless in unnecessarily introducing and enlarging upon this irritating topic of abolition; especially he seems to me much to blame for leaving the House so long under an evident and painful mistake in relation to the petition in his possession, by suppressing information of its contents. Nor do I believe that he has succeeded by the explanation he has offered in convincing one human being, except himself, of the propriety of his course. Indeed, in one respect that explanation must rather be regarded in the light of an aggravation, reiterating, as it did, the offensive doctrine that slaves have a right to send their petitions into this Hall. That gentleman is too intelligent to assert, in his calmer moments, the preposterous position, that those who under the Constitution are recognized as property, who constitute no part of the body politic, can exercise political rights. He ought to have foreseen the consequences which have ensued from suggesting a doubt upon that subject. But whatever may be my opinion, or that of the House, of the absurdity or impropriety of raising such a question here, it by no means follows that we can make it the ground of a penal proceeding.

The gentleman has cleared himself of any supposed contempt, by disclaiming, in the most solemn manner, any intentional disrespect. He has declared that his real object was to obtain the Speaker's construction of one of our standing orders, and to conform to that construction. We are not authorized to discredit this statement. But if we were, or if the disclaimer had never been made, with what propriety can we censure him for making an inquiry which the Speaker himself seems to have regarded so doubtful as to decline answering, and referred to the judgment of the House? How punish him for inquiring of the proper organ of the House, whether he had the right to present a petition under a subsisting order, which right one of my colleagues, (Mr. Wise,) and other members, explicitly assert that order clearly gave him. It is true, sir, I do not agree with those who entertain this opinion. Broad and comprehensive as is the resolution of the 18th of January, requiring, in terms, all papers relating to slavery to be laid upon the table without reading, it could not have contemplated the reception of petitions from slaves; and it was matter of surprise to me that the Speaker should have hesitated for one moment so to decide. But if the Chair doubted, more especially if members in their places maintain the construction that such petitions must be admitted under the resolution, how is it that we can single out the member from Massachusetts, and censure him for suggesting a doubt, or making an inquiry relative to its proper interpretation? But it may be said he is not to be censured for asking the question, but because that question gives color to the idea that slaves may petition, and that he is willing to be their organ. Absurd and offensive as such an idea certainly is, I am yet to learn that members of Congress may be proceeded against criminally for intimating or uttering opinions here which a majority may consider heretical or odious. On the contrary, I hold the proposition in its broadest extent, that no member can be challenged here or elsewhere for the assertion of any principle or sentiment, however preposterous, unconstitutional, or monstrous, so long as he keeps within the limits prescribed by our rules for the preservation of order. He may undertake, if he will, to prove that Congress ought to repeal the Constitution, or to abolish the Union. Nothing, surely, could be more absurd, nor more insulting. It would be to invite the House to violate the instrument it has sworn to observe; in effect, to commit perjury and treason. Yet who will say that he could be subjected, on that account, to censure or expulsion? What member will be safe for a day, if such a doctrine shall prevail? A minority, at least, should beware of a precedent which, once established, would not long tolerate any difference of opinion with the dominant majority. The power of the House to prescribe rules for the presentation and reception of petitions, must be admitted; but I deny that the resolution of censure now under consideration can be justified under any subsisting rule of the House, or any law of the land; and I trust that gentlemen will pause before they set a precedent which may recoil upon themselves, and give a death-blow to the freedom of discussion secured to us by the Constitution, and which is the best guarantee of the public liberty.

While up, Mr. Speaker, I will correct a misconception into which the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Granger,) seems to have fallen in regard to the views of myself and other southern members who voted against the resolution of the 18th of January. That gentleman, if I correctly understood him, considered our vote as influenced by the motives which governed his—the belief that it trampled upon the right of petition.

[Mr. GRANGER explained. He said the gentleman from Virginia had misapprehended him. He had understood the gentleman from Virginia, and other southern gentlemen who voted with him, as doing so on the ground that they were opposed to the reception of memorials on the subject of abolition, and had given them credit for their manly and consistent course on that occasion.]

Mr. R. said he was pained to learn that he had been mistaken; but the vote had been misinterpreted here and elsewhere by those who had thought it worthy their notice, and he desired then, so far as he was concerned, to correct the erroneous construction. I voted, sir, (continued Mr. R.) against the resolution in question, because, by requiring all abolition memorials to be laid upon the table, it necessarily implied that such memorials should be received. I have uniformly denied the propriety of their reception, and am daily more and more convinced that the greater part of the annoyance and agitation experienced here from the abolitionists has arisen from this favor shown to their memorials. The power of the House to refuse to receive them cannot be justly denied. The parliamentary rule itself, which, upon the presentation of a petition, regularly requires the question to be put whether it shall be received, necessarily implies that power; for the moment it is admitted that this question may be put, it follows that it may be answered either affirmatively or negatively, and consequently that the reception, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may be refused.

The right of petition, like all other human rights, must have some limits. It is generally admitted that the House may refuse to receive petitions indecorous or insulting in their language. But where is the rule, or the reason, of confining this power to objections on the score of language? Why not refuse to receive them where the subject-matter is beyond our jurisdiction, or the application so palpably immoral, unjust, or unconstitutional as to require no deliberation, and deserve no favor? The rights of the petitioner may be co-extensive with the constitutional power of Congress, but cannot transcend it. It is an absurdity in terms to talk of a right to petition, where there is not a correlative power to grant. Why ask what cannot be given? Where there exists a rational doubt, petitions, I agree, ought to be received and considered; and no one will go farther to respect the right within just and reasonable bounds. But where the petition is plainly unjust or unconstitutional; where it cannot be granted without robbing others of their property or their rights; without violating that instrument we have sworn to observe; or endangering the Union it is our duty to guard; it is insulting in its character, whatever may be its language, and ought not to be entertained. It is idle to receive a petition we are predetermined to reject; and no wrong is done by refusing to entertain an application which it is indecorous or unjust to make, or unlawful to grant. Suppose a petition praying to take away a man's life by act of Congress, to abolish the trial by jury, establish a national church, or do any thing else prohibited by the Constitution: to what end receive it? And do not these abolition memorials propose to violate the Constitution? Do they not seek to take away what that Constitution recognizes as property, and forbids to be taken except for public use? But gentlemen say it is more respectful to receive them, and lay them upon the table without reading them. Sir, I deny it. They who tell them at once, frankly, that they will not receive them, because they ask what ought not to be granted, treat them with full as much respect as those who, boasting to be the exclusive friends of the right of petition, receive them, and lay them aside without deigning to look at them. It is a mere pretence, a mockery, to call this respect for the right of petition.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the view I took of the resolution of the 18th January. Believing that the abolitionists demanded what Congress had no moral or constitutional power to concede, I was not willing to give their memorials admission. I was not willing that this Hall, devoted as it should be to harmonious deliberations for the common good of the Union, should be made a receptacle for foul and odious libels upon the character and institutions of the Southern people. But the House have ordered otherwise. These offensive memorials, in many cases signed by women and children ignorant of the institutions under which we live, and not knowing, it is to be hoped, the consequences of their folly, have been received—out of respect, it is said, to the right of petition—and are to be preserved for ever among the archives of the nation. If there were any hope of success, I would ask a reconsideration of the resolution under which this outrage is inflicted upon us, and an order to the Clerk to deliver them back to those who presented them. Sir, I have told gentlemen from the North, and I tell them again, that they do not, and will not, I fear, until it shall be too late, appreciate the motives or the feelings of the Southern or South-western people. Perhaps they cannot: for it is a law of our nature that we do not, without difficulty, enter into the feelings of others differently situated from ourselves. A parent only can know the extent of parental affection; he only who has experienced it can realize the strength of that tie which binds the husband to his wife. So, sir, Northern men can have but a faint conception of the emotions we experience at the unceasing assaults aimed at our peace, our property, our rights, and our institutions. They sit secure and unmoved, while the missiles destined to assail and annoy us are prepared before their eyes, and coolly and most philosophically wonder at the warmth of the South. How, sir, would they bear similar aggressions upon themselves? Would they sit calmly, and listen to petitions for the re-establishment of slavery in the non-slaveholding States? It seems, sir, they think they would. Will they receive petitions from the South to abolish the abolitionists?—And let me tell them that the people of the South regard abolitionism and abolitionists as grievances full as hard to bear with as they can possibly consider us or our institutions. Will petitions be received here to banish them? to put them to death? (Several Northern gentlemen appeared to assent.) Gentlemen, I am to understand, think such petitions would be admitted. Then, sir, I go further; I put a stronger case. Suppose the southern people had organized societies to seize upon the wives and children of their northern brethren, to make them hewers of wood and drawers of water, in lieu of the slaves sought to be wrested from them; suppose these societies boasted of their growing strength, while their petitions were daily flowing by hundreds into Congress for aid in their nefarious schemes; suppose there were really some ground to believe that their anticipations of success might be realized: I demand to know whether northern gentlemen would still sit quietly in their seats and submit to such an outrage. No, sir; no man will say it; no man will believe it. If they could, then, indeed, are they destitute of the best feelings that belong to the human heart, and colder than the ice-bound region they inhabit. Let them judge what would be their feelings in such a case, and they will begin to understand what are ours under the daily attempts made in the non-slaveholding States, and countenanced by the favor shown them here, to wrest from us our property, blacken our character, and endanger the safety of our wives and our children. It is time that the further progress of these schemes should be arrested. I will yield, sir, to no man in devotion to the Union. God grant it may be perpetual. But it is impossible to doubt that these persevering efforts to trample upon our rights and disturb our peace are every day alienating the attachment of our people, and endangering the stability of our Union. It is because I would have it to endure that I would never give entrance here to any petition that should bring the institutions of the South into question before a tribunal having no power to judge them. If we cannot succeed in that, I would agree to recede this District—so particularly aimed at—to Maryland and Virginia, reserving only the national property, and power to protect the public functionaries in the due discharge of their duties. Or, sir, I will unite with the western delegation to remove the seat of Government itself, if no other means can be devised of preserving the Union, and putting a stop to the harassing interference and mischievous designs of the abolitionists.

But, sir, this topic has carried me from the question properly before us. It is always a fruitful source of disorder, and it is much to be regretted it has been again introduced. I promised not to detain the House, and I will conclude with adding my request to that of a gentleman who preceded me in the debate—though I fear it will be unavailing—that the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw the inquiry propounded by him to the Chair, so that we may return to the business of the House, already too long neglected.

REMARKS OF MR. ADAMS, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, March 2, 1837—
Mr. PEYTON, of Tennessee, having called upon Mr. ADAMS to make a statement in relation to a report of the minority of the bank investigating committee in 1832—

Mr. ADAMS said, that after the course which he had deemed it his duty to take throughout the whole of this investigation, that is, of taking no part in it whatever, he had hoped to be spared the necessity of saying one word to the House in relation to it, or having any connection with it, or with the individual whose very name he had no disposition to pronounce. But as the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) after reading a passage from the report of the minority of the committee appointed to investigate the condition of the Bank of the United States in April, 1832, to which report his (Mr. Adams's) name was subscribed, had thought proper especially to call upon him to confirm the statement which he had read, he felt it was no longer proper for him to remain silent; but in what he was about to say to the committee, he should confine himself strictly within the call of the gentleman from Tennessee, with the exception of a very few remarks upon what had fallen from the member from Maryland, who had also been a member of the bank investigating committee of 1832, (Mr. Thomas.)

There were three reports made from that committee to the House of Representatives, with a considerable mass of documents appended to each: the report of a bare majority, which had the assent of the gentleman from Maryland; a report written by the chairman of the committee, Judge Clayton, of Georgia, who afterwards, in a manner highly honorable to himself, and with a magnanimity as generous as it was rare, publicly retracted, in this hall, every word of it that was disparaging to the character of the president of the bank; the report of the minority, from which the gentleman from Tennessee has read the extract which he now called on Mr. Adams to avouch; and a separate report made by Mr. Adams himself, and signed by one other member of the committee. The report from which the extract had been read was written, not by Mr. Adams, but by a member then among the most eminent men in the House, and since that time Governor of the State of South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie.) It had also been subscribed by Mr. Adams, who, in his own report, had given his own views in relation to the transactions referred to in the extract just read. That extract, he repeated, was not written by him, but he had subscribed his name to the report in which it was contained; and as he stood in presence of God and of the House, he now believed every word of the extract to be true, as he did believe when he signed the report.

With regard to the explanations and revisions of opinions of the gentleman from Maryland, with which he had favored the committee, Mr. Adams would not have thought himself called upon to notice them, but that they had an appearance, he could not believe intentional, of reviving and countenancing dark suspicions of dishonor against a man as honorable as any one that breathed upon earth; a man basely slandered and persecuted, and whom he numbered among the dearest of his friends: he meant the president of the Bank of the United States.

The resolution read by the gentleman from Tennessee, "that the charges brought against the president of the bank, of lending money to Thomas Biddle and Co. without interest, and of discounting notes for that house, and for Charles Biddle, without the sanction of the directors, are without foundation; and that there does not exist any grounds for charging the president with having shown, or manifested any disposition to show, any partiality to those individuals, in their transactions with the bank," is stated in the report to have been unanimously adopted by the committee. It was so understood at the time. But now, the gentleman seems not to know whether he voted for it or not. He says that if the yeas and nays had been taken, he should probably have voted for it then; but, after time for reconsideration and re-examination of the evidence, he has had occasion to alter his opinion. He withdraws now, at the end of five years, whatever credit his assent to that resolution may have given to the unanimous acquittal by the committee of the president of the bank from a charge maliciously and infamously false. He is not yet quite willing to assume the burden of defending the general character of the delator. He knows very little about him, and has been but once in his house; but he thinks his charges against the president of the bank were true, or, at least, not wilfully false; because, notwithstanding they were flatly contradicted and denied by every individual witness to whom he appealed for confirmation of his statements, they were yet confirmed by the entries on the books of the bank; and because Mr. Philander Stevens, then a member of Congress, did, even while the committee were at Philadelphia, obtain a loan by order of the president, and without a vote of the directors. The transaction with Mr. Stevens was not within the commission of the investigating committee, and was satisfactorily explained and accounted for at the time. But the charge affecting the integrity of the president of the bank was, that, by his direction, Thomas Biddle and Co. brokers, and his relations, were habitually allowed to take large sums of money out of the bank, giving merely their notes for the amount, or depositing mere slips of paper, or pledges of stock, in the teller's drawer, all without the knowledge of the directors, and without payment of interest, while they had the use of the moneys. This was no occasional irregularity, or incidental and inadvertent looseness of practice in the hurry and multiplicity of business; it was a direct charge of gross malversation in office against the president of the bank, and as such it was first brought forward in the committee. To substantiate this, a dirty old paper, containing a minute of two sums of money, thus alleged to have been taken from the teller's draw, on the 25th of May, forty-five thousand, and on the 26th of May, twenty-four thousand dollars, was produced, and sworn to be minutes taken at the time; and it was sworn that when this practice was thus detected, Mr. Whitney ordered these sums should be entered upon the books, which was accordingly done; that he immediately went into the president's room; there expostulated with him against this practice; that the president colored up very much, and promised that it should not happen again. The criminality of this charge had it been true, consisted in the allowance to the brokers to take out money and use it without payment of interest; and the pretended interview and expostulation with the president, and his blushes upon detection, were to prove a consciousness in him of dishonesty and breach of trust. Now, all this was not only positively and most solemnly denied by the president of the bank himself, but every individual to whom Whitney appealed to sustain his allegation of facts, as flatly denied them—the teller, the discount clerk, the cashier then of the bank, every one of them, denied every part of such a transaction as having occurred within their knowledge. When every individual named as having acted in the transaction, had thus explicitly denied his statements, he resorted for confirmation of his narrative to his own testimony as he had told the story to others shortly after the dates of his minutes. He had told it to a Mr. Wilson Hunt; and Mr. Hunt was examined by the committee. Mr. Hunt stated that Whitney had spoken of certain loans which he said had been made to Thomas Biddle and Co. without the knowledge of the directors, and had shown him a memorandum which he had taken of such loans; but he denied unhesitatingly, and with a strong expression of surprise, that he had ever told him they were without interest, and said he was very sure if he had told him so, it was impossible he should have forgotten it.

[Mr. ANTHONY interrupted Mr. Adams by raising a question of order, and objecting that these statements were not relevant to the subject under consideration. The chairman (Mr. Pierce of New Hampshire,) said, the debate had taken so wide a range already, that he did not feel himself authorized to call Mr. Adams to order, but thought he might proceed, unless the committee should direct otherwise. Mr. Adams said he had very reluctantly risen at the sudden and unexpected call of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton.) He had added a few remarks, which he thought called for by those of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Thomas,) but nothing could be farther from his intention than to proceed a hair's breadth beyond the rules of order; nor would he now proceed without express authority so to do from the chairman or from the committee. Some debate then arose; the chairman referred the question to the committee, and two successive divisions, by tellers, took place; on both of which a majority of the voters were for authorizing Mr. Adams to proceed, the want of a quorum on the first division having rendered the second necessary. The chairman then directed Mr. Adams to proceed. He was twice or three times interrupted or replied to by Mr. Thomas. The following is the substance of what he said, though possibly some of the preceding, and some of the following observations may be transferred from the order in which they were spoken.]

Upon Mr. THOMAS's last replication Mr. ADAMS said:

Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Maryland is anxious to have the last word, and he shall have it. He bore an honorable testimony to the unsullied integrity of the president of the bank by assenting to the resolution read by the gentleman from Tennessee, and now he does not know whether he voted for it or not. He has had new lights, by a re-examination of the evidence; and, above all, he believes Whitney's story, because his minute of the two sums taken from the teller's draw on the 25th and 26th May, 1824, is confirmed by the entries on the books of the bank. Now, sir, there are two ways of accounting for the conformity of Mr. Whitney's minutes and the books of the bank: one, that the entries and the books were conformed to the minutes; and the other, that the minutes were made conformable to the entries on the books. The gentleman from Maryland chooses to believe the first of these alternatives, and thence derives all his confidence in Whitney's testimony. I believe (said Mr. A.) that the minutes were made from the entries on the books, to which Whitney, as a director, always had access. Whitney swore at first that the entries on the books of those sums taken out of the teller's draw on the 25th and 26th of May, were made by his order. The clerk who made the entries swore not only that they were made without his order, but that if he had assumed to give such an order, it would not have been obeyed; no single director having any right to give such an order. Whitney then, with the permission of the committee, revised his testimony, to correct what he called discrepancies, and said his impression was that he directed the two loans to be put upon the books, or, that he was informed that they had been placed there, and that he confirmed their having done so. Confirmed their having done so! What was there to confirm? His charge was that there had been no entry on the books till he had ordered they should be made. The gentleman from Maryland relies upon the confirmation of the entries on the books. There is not one tittle of evidence on the books to show that there ever was such a transaction, as Whitney's going with Andrews and Wilson to the teller's draw, and to the discount clerk's desk, nor that Whitney's memorandum was made at that time. Andrews, Wilson, Patterson, the first teller, and Burtes, the discount clerk, denied positively all recollection of any such transaction having occurred, and these are the four persons with whom, and in whose presence, he had sworn that it took place. With regard to the non-payment of interest upon the loans to Thomas, Biddle and Co. of which Whitney swore Wilson had told him; Wilson denied with indignation that he had ever told him of, or known any such thing. Was there any confirmation of this charge on the face of the books? Not a particle. The face of the books, and all the witnesses, proved directly the reverse—and in this consisted the gravamen of the charge. It was not the mere hasty, incautious practice of loaning money upon deposits of stocks for three or four, ten or fifteen days, charged as cash, and repaid with interest to a day and hour; it was the embezzlement of the funds of the bank by unlicensed loans, to favorites and kinsmen, without interest. That was the charge to which Whitney swore against the president of the bank, and which the books of the bank, and every witness to whom he appealed for confirmation of his testimony, contradicted and disproved.

There was not a shadow of evidence that any such a transaction as his going to the teller's draw, or the discount clerk's desk, with the cashiers, ever occurred. They all denied any recollection of such an incident; but the remainder of his story, of an immediate private interview with the president, his remonstrance against the continuance of the practice, and the president's blushing promise that it should cease—of the falsehood of all this there was either conclusive proof besides the positive denial upon oath of the president himself. The dates upon the memorandum corresponding with the entries on the books of the bank, fix this transaction, if it happened at all, upon the 27th of May, 1824. Now it turned out that the president of the bank, on that day, and for a week before, and several days after, was not at Philadelphia, but at Washington; so that the loans and the deposits of stocks were made in his absence, and altogether without his knowledge—General Cadwalader then acting as president of the bank. The dates of the memorandum had fixed the time of the discovery and expostulation so unalterably, that if it did not happen then there was no pretence that it could have happened at all. The whole foundation of fact upon which this fabulous fabrication was erected, appears to be, that on the 25th and 26th of May, 1824, Thomas Biddle and Co. received upon interest from the bank considerable sums of money, on the security of deposited stock, and perhaps at other times upon their notes. That these loans were not for definite terms of thirty, sixty, or ninety days, but for an indefinite and small number of days, after which the cash was replaced, and the interest paid for all the time they had had the use of the money. One of the occasions of this practice was, that Thomas Biddle and Co. as brokers, were agents of the bank itself for the purchase of bills of exchange, sometimes to the amount of millions in a few days. As they purchased the bills in the market, they needed the money to pay for them; and in the process of such negotiations the money for payment may be wanted before the equivalent can be delivered. In such cases, moneys to a very large amount might appear to be borrowed by the brokers, when their real debt to the bank would be little or nothing; and such was the amount of all the charges against the bank which formed the subject of inquiry to the investigating committee of 1832.

Especially was every charge against the integrity of the president of the bank, at that time, signally defeated and confounded, notwithstanding the candor of the gentleman from Maryland—that candor of which he now makes such liberal profession, and of which that committee had abundant demonstration throughout the whole course of their labors. Even a majority of that committee, hostile as they were to the Bank of the United States, did, in the resolution read now by the gentleman from Tennessee, bear their unequivocal testimony to the integrity of the president of the bank, upon the very point with regard to which it has been impeached. The gentleman from Maryland accepted that resolution as a substitute for one of non-committal, which he himself had offered; and now he withdraws that acceptance, and does not know whether he votes for the resolution or not.

It is not, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of interfering in the good offices of the gentleman from Maryland, in behalf of the individual whose character and conduct have recently occupied so much of the time of this House, that I have said thus much. Of them I have no disposition to discourse, or to open my lips. I rose merely to answer to the call of the gentleman from Tennessee, and to vindicate the untainted honor of my friend, which I am not disposed in silence to hear assailed in this place, either by open assault or by insidious insinuation.

[The publication of the foregoing remarks of Mr. ADAMS has been delayed for the purpose of publishing, at the same time, those of Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, on the same subject: but we have not been able to procure Mr. THOMAS's remarks; and as our subscribers to the APPENDIX are anxious to have it completed, we shall put this number to press without them.

Should we be so fortunate as to procure Mr. THOMAS's remarks in a short time, they will be published, and sent to subscribers.]—Ed's.

THE END.

The CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE and APPENDIX will be published during the called session and the first session of the 25th Congress, for $2 each. They may be had separate.
